The Bondholders' Report.

The report of the Corporation of Foreign Bondholders for 1922, which has just been issued, states that beyond the conclusion of an agreement for the settlement of the Mexican Debt, there is not much change to record, "the unsatisfactory position of the exchanges and the reaction in trade after the post-war activity having constituted a serious impediment to the settlement of debts in arrear." We give the following extracts from the report dealing with the Near Eastern countries:—

Bulgaria.

The arrangement made with Bulgaria in 1921 provided for the payment in French francs of the coupons and drawn bonds of the Loans of 1902 and 1907 up to April 1, 1922, after which date payment in accordance with the original contracts was to be resumed. Early in 1922, however, the Bulgarian Government applied for an extension of the arrangement for three years, on the ground that the financial and economical situation of the country was more precarious than when it was entered into, exchange especially having shown a heavy depreciation. In conjunction with the Association Nationale des Porteurs Français de Valeurs Mobilières of Paris, the Council informed the Bulgarian Government that they would not oppose an extension for two years, provided that the Bulgarian Government would not make any new issue of banknotes without previous agreement with the delegate of the French bondholders at Sofia, acting in accord with the Inter-Allied Commission of Reparations.

Turkey.

In 1920-21 the gross receipts from the revenues assigned to the service of the Unified Debt and Lots Turcs amounted to £T12,622,446 (paper), against £T11,782,953 in 1919-20, the increase of £T839,493 having arisen from improved yields in the tobacco revenue, the Customs, and in Treasury operations. Deducting from the above £T12,622,446 (a) expenditure to the amount of £T3,925,420, (b) receipts from Palestine not at the Debt Council's disposal (£T509,651), and (c) the annuity for the Unified Debt and the Lots Turcs (£T2,157,375), there remained a balance of £T6,030,000, which was carried to the special reserve account with the Treasury, opened in the previous year to cover loss of exchange on coupons payable in foreign countries. The total standing to the credit of that account stood at £T12,983,881 at the end of February, 1921. The receipts from Konia, Angora, Erzeroum, Sivas, Seerd, and Trebizond, of which the bondholders have been deprived since 1920, are estimated to have amounted to £T16,000,000, reckoned up to June, 1922.

In 1921-22 the gross receipts were £T12,114,216 (paper), and deducting from this total (a) expenditure to the amount of £T3,999,228, (b) receipts from Palestine not at the Debt Council's disposal (£T473,676), and (c) the annuity for the Unified Debt and the Lots Turcs (£T2,157,375), there was a balance of £T5,483,937, which was carried to the special reserve account mentioned above. As regards 1922-23, the Council understand that the approximate net receipts, after deducting expenses of administration, etc., and the annuity of £T2,157,375, should amount to about £T3,000,000.

In June, 1922, a payment of 9d. per £20 bond of the Unified Debt was made on the eleven coupons due March, 1915, to March, 1920 (making 2s. in all), and of 75 per cent. of their face value on the four coupons due September, 1920, to March, 1922, and the September, 1922, coupons were paid on the 14th of that month at the same rate, certificates for the unpaid balance being given in the case of the five last-mentioned coupons. The claims of the bondholders against Germany for repayment of the sums, amounting to some £T7,500,000 gold, which were deposited in Germany during the war, have not yet been adjudicated upon by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunals constituted under the Treaty of Versailles.

During 1922 a distribution was made from funds in hand on account of the arrears of loans outside the Decree of Mouharrem.

Greece.

The total gross receipts in 1921 applicable to the service of the old gold loans amounted to 149,185,640 dr., against 123,662,708 dr. in 1920, and out of these the receipts from the Monopolies and the Stamp and Tobacco Duties, from which the plus values are derived, were 73,493,141 dr. and 65,630,414 dr. respectively. With the addition of the portions of the receipts from the Monopolies, etc., which are not applicable to the plus values (viz., 51,326,645 dr.), together with the Customs receipts of the ports of Corfu, Patras, Laurium, and Volo (viz., 18,205,906), which are an additional contingent security of the old gold loans, and those of the ports of Salonika and Kavala (viz., 40,374,277 dr.), on which the 5 per Cent. Loan of 1914 has a first charge, the total gross receipts of the year 1921 amounted to 259,192,277 dr., against 209,811,097 dr. in 1920.

Including balances from the previous year and the interest saved on bonds redeemed from 1898 to 1921, the net amount available for increase of interest and sinking fund in 1922 was 14,066,429 francs, against 24,497,688 francs in the previous year, and out of this sum, as anticipated in the Council's last report, the distribution in 1922 by way of increased interest was 42 per cent. of the original interest to the first and 40 per cent. to the second and third groups, and, by way of increased sinking fund, 24 per cent. to the first and second and 26 per cent. to the third groups.

In 1922 the gross receipts for the service of the old gold loans were 222,178,507 dr., and the proportion applicable to the plus values was 74,689,417 dr. With the additional receipts from the Monopolies and other sources mentioned above, the total gross receipts in 1922 were 462,541,543 dr. Up to the end of July, 1922, the proportion of the gross receipts applicable to the plus values showed an increase of 9,404,000 dr., as compared with the same period in 1921. By the end of November, 1922, this increase had been reduced to 789,500 dr. owing to the fact that, by agreement between the International Financial Commission and the Greek Government, the proportion of the increases derived from the sales of Monopolies hitherto included in the plus values were, from August 1, 1922, excluded therefrom. Recognising that recent issues of paper without the consent of the Commission had contributed to the fall of the drachma and thus been prejudicial to the interests of the bondholders, the Greek Government consented to grant an annual addition to the revenues assigned to the service of the old gold loans, and the Council understand that this should diminish, or perhaps even neutralise, the effect of the unfavourable rates of conversion of the plus values in 1922 as compared with 1921. The sums available in 1922 should permit of the payment in 1923 of 42, 44, and 42 per cent. respectively to the three groups by way of additional interest, and of 18 per cent. to each group by way of additional sinking fund.

NEW BRITISH INDIA STEAMER.

The twin-screw motor vessel Dumana, built by Messrs. Barclay, Curle, and Co., Ltd., Whiteinch, Glasgow, for the British India Steam Navigation Co., Ltd., completed, on the 18th inst., a series of trials on the Firth of Clyde. The Dumana, which is of 11,000 tons d.w. on a draft of 28 ft., has accommodation for 150 cabin passengers. In the accommodation everything that experience has shown to be desirable for Eastern voyages has been incorporated, and the public rooms and cabins are distinguished by spaciousness, simplicity, and comfort. The propelling machinery consists of two sets of four-stroke cycle, single-acting, internal combustion engines, each set having eight cylinders, 96½ in. in diameter, and with a stroke of 47 in. The installation develops a collective power equivalent to 4,000 steam i.h.p. The vessel is intended for a sea speed of 13 knots, and during the trials this speed was exceeded by about one knot, the machinery working throughout with the utmost smoothness and to the entire satisfaction of the representatives of the owners. Under normal conditions the work of handling cargo in port will take only about one-tenth of the fuel which an ordinary steam-equipped vessel would require.

Whilst at Alexandria the majority of the passengers visited Luxor.

FOREIGN EXCHANGES.

Movements of the exchanges of any significance have been few and far between this week; in many cases, indeed, the quotations are unchanged from a week ago. The strength of French francs, which have risen to 72.60, has been an outstanding feature. Belgian francs have recovered in sympathy to 84.35, while Italian lire are also better. In the Near Eastern exchanges, the Turkish exchange is again better at 660, Greek drachmæ have risen slightly to 427½, while Bulgarian leva are 50 points higher at 775.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Business Improving.

The Commercial Company of Egypt, in their report for the week ended March 9, state:—Since our last report, the futures market has been fairly firm for both Sakellaridis and Ashmouni, the turnover of business being a good deal larger than during the preceding weeks. The low level of prices touched early in the week and their relative cheapness compared with Americans has attracted spinners' attention to our market, resulting in considerable business being put through, which had the effect of drawing the market out of the apathetic state in which it has been since the end of January and of encouraging local speculators to re-enter the market. The demand has been principally on Sakellaridis, and a widening of the difference between the prices of this variety and Ashmouni has resulted. This difference during the session of last Wednesday touched $1.15, the lowest on record, but since then it has reacted and at to-day's close is again $2.25 (March Sakellaridis $33.70, April Ashmouni $31.45). We expect to see a further widening during the coming weeks. International politics are far from helping to produce the peaceful atmosphere indispensable to normal commercial and financial conditions in Europe and the Near East. The exports of the first week of this month are satisfactory, and total 25,890 bales. We have now shipped, since September 1, 5,092,935 kantars, being 1,312,331 kantars in excess of last year's corresponding figures. The visible stocks held abroad not being superior to last year's figures, it may be deduced that Egyptian cotton consumption this year has absorbed up to now about 1,300,000 kantars more than last year, but what principally strengthens the statistical position is the fact that the cotton still held up country is considerably less than last year, probably by about 1,400,000 kantars.

Spot.—Total sales this week amount to about 19,000 bales, of which we estimate 13,700 bales Sakellaridis, 5,100 bales Uppers, 100 bales White, 100 bales Brown.

Sakellaridis.—A good business has been done this week in all grades, an especially notable feature being the increased demand for the better cottons. Fully Good Fair to Good and Good have changed hands with a considerable increase in the premiums paid as compared with last week. Fully Fair and Good Fair also show a stiffening of the spot prices in relation to futures, due mainly to the growing scarcity of these cottons. There has been a small turnover in low cottons, but the prices paid are somewhat easier.

Uppers.—Towards the end of the week the demand for this variety fell off considerably. Practically all grades have been dealt in, but buyers have not appeared keen to push prices. The price of spot against futures remains about unchanged.

Various.—There has been a good inquiry for White, but owing to the extreme scarcity of this variety very little business has been concluded.

Crop, 1922.—In view of fresh reports received from the interior, we are again compelled to increase our crop estimate and also our estimate of the carry over in the interior at the end of last season. It looks now as if the 1922 crop will yield about 5,600,000 kantars, and that the amount held in the interior last August was about 750,000 kantars. Thus we estimate that the total arrivals in Alexandria from September 1, 1922, to August 31, 1923, will reach about 6,250,000 kantars, and that about 100,000 kantars will remain up country. The increase in the estimate of the carry over in the interior is due to the fact that the native cultivators last year retained considerable stocks of cotton; of these stocks, however, a good proportion consisted of Afrita and Scarto held in the interior in order to avoid the heavy tax which had to be paid if the cotton was sent to Alexandria. The Ministry of Agriculture has just published the following report on the state of the crop during February:—

"Preparation of land for cotton is in advance of last year, and there is a general tendency for early sowing. Small areas have already been sown, and seedlings have appeared in some localities."

The Bengal Dooars Railway Co. has declared interim dividend of 3 per cent. on ordinary stock, payable, less tax, April 18.

The progress report of Roumanian Consolidated Oilfields for February shows that the crude oil production for the month was 1,099 tons.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Inquiry Well Maintained.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended March 14:—

A good inquiry has again been witnessed in this department. The usual well-defined lines have been followed, and spinners as a whole show but little inclination to depart from the conservative policy which has governed their buying for so long.

Sakellaridis and Uppers have both been largely in request, the former at from 17d. to 18½d. and the latter from 16d. to 17d. In Sakel, there is little cotton to be found that is attractive, from a spinner's point of view, under 17½d., but as the eighteenpenny figure is approached, plenty of F.G.F. cotton, which is "well up," both as regards grade and staple, comes into sight. Spinners fight hard to obtain their cotton on a cheaper basis, but holders for the most part are firm, and the basis for this cotton continues to advance slowly and steadily. Cotton grading "Good" and above has received very meagre support. Throughout the week only two inquiries reached the 19d. figure, and only on one occasion was that figure actually exceeded by a genuine transaction. The tendency is still for the finer grades to close in towards the medium, but this will probably right itself as the season progresses. The demand is working steadily upwards, and we consider it highly probable that Good Sakel purchased at to-day's premium over F.G.F. will command, later on, a much better price. The demand for Low cotton is still in evidence, and, here again, the basis has hardened. A week or two ago, the inquiry was practically all between 10d.—12d., but buyers are not finding their cotton, and inquiry is now being forced upwards into the 13d.—14d. market, and even there the selection is already of a very limited description.

Of Uppers, there is practically nothing offering on the spot under 17.00d., and spinners are showing a marked disinclination to exceed that figure. Prices quoted from Egypt appear very dear and are meeting with very little response from this market, where there is still left a fair quantity of speculation cotton, which is offered on a comparatively cheaper basis. A limited business has taken place in white cotton, prices paid being round about 18½d. Brown, Pillion and Sudan have been more or less neglected. C.i.f. business has been very quiet. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending 9th inst. were returned as 6,996 bales. Total sales, 3,300 bales (includes 150 Sudan). Quotations of Sakellaridis and Brown cotton are advanced 35 points for Good and under, and 10 points for Fine, whilst Extra Fine remains unchanged. In Upper, Good and below are advanced 35 points, Fine and Extra Fine 10 points each. Fully Good Fair Sakel to-day, 17.95d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Transactions on Small Scale.

The "Manchester Cotton Trade Review" of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended March 17 states:—

Business in this market remains on a small scale, and there is no change worthy of mention from the state of affairs prevailing recently. Inquiry is on a fair scale, but the price basis is usually unworkable. Possibly a lower level of values for the raw material would enable a larger business to be done, but there seems little prospect of this coming about in the present condition of the New York market.

Yarn.—The Federation of Master Cotton Spinners have already decided to recommend the closing of the mills spinning American cotton for a fortnight during April as is being done this month, and it is said that many firms outside the Federation are adopting this policy. A mass meeting of those engaged in the spinning trade was held on Tuesday last, and certain resolutions were passed having for their object the placing of the trade upon a better basis. The principal one was to the effect that no yarn should be sold except at a price which fully covered the cost of producing it. Since that meeting spinners have been showing a much firmer front, and there is undoubtedly a strong determination to alter the unprofitable state of affairs which has existed for so long. Whether this determination is sufficient to overcome the very numerous difficulties at present besetting the industry remains to be seen. Exports of yarn last month amounted to 10,881,600 lb., against 12,814,700 lb. in January and 14,913,200 lb. in February of last year.

Cloth.—No improvement can be recorded. The business placed is described as being of almost retail dimensions, and there is nothing worthy of special mention with regard to any particular market. Exports last month amounted to 342,558,000 sq. yards.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS

Adana, January 31.

During this month rain and good weather have alternated throughout Cilicia to the advantage of agriculture in general. The peasant regarding the alternation as of good augury, has devoted himself most assiduously to the work of the fields, and has profited by every good day to prepare the lands in view of the approaching sowing of cotton seed.

Mersina.—The season having been favourable and abundant rain having fallen, the cultivators have been able to sow 60,000 deunums of lands (about 65,925,900 yards), as against scarcely 30,000 last year.

Tarsus.—Everywhere the peasant has devoted himself to the work of the fields, and all the adjacent territory of the town has been tilled to a much greater extent than at Mersina and Adana. A good crop is expected.

Djihan.—The yield of the approaching crop of cereals promises to be much greater than that of the past year. The seed utilised is estimated at 1,000,000 kilos of wheat, 800,000 kgrs. of barley, and 2-300,000 kgrs. of oats, haricots, maize, and sesame.

Jaffa, February 24.

Considerable rain fell during the week. Everything suggests that the coming barley crop will be above the average. Prices for oranges in the United Kingdom continue to be good.

Kermanshah, January 31.

During the month of Djaddie (December 21 to January 21) the Customs receipts of Kermanshah were 1,342,203.85 krans for imports and 35,481.45 krans for exports, which compared with the previous month shows a decline of 282,374.15 krans as regards imports and an increase of 7,659.05 as regards exports. These totals do not include the receipts on merchandise which has been dealt with at the frontier port of Kasre-Cherine. These goods can be estimated at about 10 per cent. of the trade via Mesopotamia.

The terminus of the Baghdad-Persia railway line has been brought back from Tairog to the town of Kanakin (Iraq), which has notably increased the cost of the transport of goods destined for Persia, as well as the difficulties of communications. However, at the request of Persian traders, a project is being considered of extending the line again up to the Persian frontier and establishing at the terminus a combined Irak-Persian Customs.

The accounts of the Steaua Romana (British) for the year to June 30 show a profit, subject to income and corporation taxes, of £78,572, making with the balance brought in £103,882. The report states that these accounts include the revenue earned by the company upon its holding in the Steaua Romana (Bucharest) Company in the preceding financial year of that company, and it is proposed to carry forward into the current year's accounts the balance of profit carried into the balance-sheet from the profit and loss account.

An extra-ordinary meeting of the Chartered Bank of India, Australia and China is to be held on April 4, after the general meeting, to approve of an application for a supplemental Royal Charter, authorising the company to issue and have in circulation (subject to conditions therein mentioned), promissory notes to the amount of $20,000,000, and with due notice to the Treasury to the amount of $30,000,000, and also authorising the company to carry on as part of its business trustee and executor business.

LONDON PRODUCE REPORT.

Oil Cakes Lower.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

Sugar.—Home refined has been in fair demand. Tate's cubes have been done at 66s. 9d., an advance of 6d.; Lyle's granulated has come to business at 61s. 3d., at which it shows a gain of 6d., while London granulated is 6d. firmer at 61s. West Indian crystallised has gained 6d. at 55s., while white Mauritius at 56s. 6d. is up 1s. White Java shows a gain of 2s. at 58s. 6d. Futures are: May, 32s. 3d.; August, 31s. 6d.

Coffee.—The spot market has been very firm. East Indian has gained 6s. at 112s.; Costa Rica has risen from 100s. to 104s.; while Nairobi is unchanged at 90s. Futures are: May, 59s. 6d.; July, 58s. 6d.

Rice.—The market has been steady, and in general a very firm tone has been in evidence. Burma "Two Star" has been in good demand, while Spanish Japan has been a very firm spot, showing an advance of 6d. on the week.

Green Fruit.—There is no lack of supplies of oranges at the moment, as heavy arrivals have been forthcoming. It has made little difference to prices, however, as a very strong demand is in evidence. Quotations are:—Jaffas, 21s. box (144's); Denias and Valencias, 13s. 6d. to 45s. box (240's to 504's). Lemons are now plentiful, ample supplies having arrived, but, as in the case of oranges, prices have not been affected owing to the strong demand. Quotations are: 13s. to 17s. 6d. box (300's); 18s. 6d. to 35s. case (300's). Apples have again been a good market; indeed, if anything, they are moving off better than before. The demand for onions has continued, and prices have advanced somewhat.

Dried Fruit.—Business has been fairly good in all lines. Currants have been a good spot, and most varieties have moved off well. Sultanias have been a steady feature. In view of the conditions in Smyrna district (which are described in a report in another column), it is to be anticipated that before long higher values will be seen for this commodity. At present, however, the market is rather weak. Bosnian plums, as usual, have been in excellent request; indeed, they are moving off more freely than any other dried fruit. Figs have again been in good demand, and prices are about 2s. 6d. higher. Dates have been in only fair request, and prices are considerably lower.

Oilseeds.—Linseed has been steady. Indian is unchanged at 20s. 3d., while La Plata is 1½d. down at 18s. 1½d. Rapeseed has been weak, with Toria 7½d. down at 18s. 7½d. and real bold Ferozepore 10½d. lower at 17s. 7½d. Cottonseed has been variable. Indian is 1½d. up at 9s. 3d., Egyptian black is 3d. lower at 11s. 9d., while Sakellaridis at 11s. 7½d. is 4½d. up.

Oils.—Linseed has been steady, closing 6d. up at 41s. Rape oil has been firm. Crude is unaltered at 44s., while technical refined remains at 47s.

Cotton oil has been steady. Refined common edible remains at 44s., Egyptian crude is 1s. up at 39s., technical is unaltered at 41s., while deodorised is unchanged at 46s.

Oil Cakes.—A very weak tone has characterised the market. Linseed cake at 260s. has shed 25s.; coconut cake is also 25s. down at 180s.; cottonseed cake is 20s. lower at 140s.; while cottonmeal cake is 15s. down at 250s.

CONDITION OF EGYPTIAN CROPS.

The bulletin of the Egyptian Ministry of Agriculture gives the following particulars of crop conditions in February:—

Wheat.—The weather was generally favourable to the growth of the crop. There was a good deal of rain in several districts which had a good effect on the plants. Watering and manuring were carried out. The use of chemical manures seems to be more extensive than last year. The growth of the crop is satisfactory, on the whole, and early sown wheat is coming into ear. Very slight attacks of rust and smut have been recorded from some districts.

Barley.—Weather conditions same as for wheat. The crop is in ear almost everywhere, and is ripening in early sown fields. The general condition is satisfactory, except in Beni Suef, Faiyum, and Minya Provinces.

Beans.—The weather was somewhat unfavourable in Lower and Middle Egypt. Winds and heavy rains have caused a certain amount of flower-shedding. Water supply was sufficient. Podding is general in early sown fields, and green pods are being gathered in some fields. Attacks of rust, aphid and broom-rape have been reported, but the damage is limited. The condition of the crop is below the average.

Bersim.—The crop had suffered from the unfavourable weather, but rains have somewhat improved it. The second cut is general, while the third has begun in several localities. Part of this crop is being ploughed in for cotton. Slight attacks of dodder in certain districts and aphid and cut-worm in Asyut and Girga have been reported. The condition of the crop is below the average.

Helba.—Cutting green continued throughout the month under review. Flowering is general, and pods have formed in early sown fields. Harvesting will begin towards the middle of March. The cold weather in Faiyum checked to a certain extent the growth of the plants, and the crop suffered in Asyut Province from a severe attack of aphid in the Basin lands. The same pest and dodder have also caused considerable damage in Girga Province. The yield is expected to be below the average.

Onions.—Preparation of land for seedlings is general in Lower Egypt, and transplanting has already begun in some localities. In Middle and Upper Egypt the crop is ripening and is being harvested in some parts of Upper Egypt. The condition of the crop is slightly below the average.

Lentils.—Pod-formation is general. A slight attack of dodder was reported from Asyut and Girga. Harvesting will soon start, and the general condition of the crop is almost normal.

Sugar-cane.—Cutting for factories is in progress and will soon be completed. The land is being prepared for the new crop, and in some localities planting has already commenced. Mealy bug and stalk-borer were reported from almost all provinces, causing some damage.

Cotton.—Preparation of land for cotton is in advance of last year, and there is a general tendency for early sowing. Small areas have already been sown and seedlings have appeared in some localities.

CONDITIONS IN ASIA MINOR.

The Effect of the Deportations.

In the following illuminating report, dated March 1, Messrs. C. J. Giraud and Co., of Smyrna, deal with the position regarding the fruit and other crops of the district and with the outlook generally:—

In our report of October 10 we stated that although the yield of sultanas for the season had been estimated at about 37/38,000 tons, not more than some 20,000 tons would be available for shipment. Basing ourselves on our experience and knowledge of the country, and although deprived of any reliable data at the time, we expressed the fears that the military operations of September—the destruction, devastation, and loss of population resulting from the retreat of the Greek Army of occupation—would cause the loss of some 15/17,000 tons of fruit. Our forecast was criticised in several directions, but has unfortunately proved only too accurate.

The total shipments to January 31 as per our last report amounted to the following:—To the United Kingdom, 10,200 tons; to the Continent, United States, etc., 7,270 tons—17,470 tons. The only shipments effected this month have been per s.s. Hector for Holland and Belgium, 350 tons, per s.s. Calypso for Holland and Belgium, 180 tons. Total shipments to date say, about 18,000 tons. Estimated remaining stocks, 25,000 bags, or 3,000 tons. Total result for the season, 21,000 tons. The s.s. Siptah is in port loading for Liverpool, her fruit engagements at present amounting to about 100 tons.

The above figures are closely confirmed by an official report which we have had the occasion to see a few days ago. In this statement, the total exports to the end of January are shown to be slightly in excess of 17,000 tons, whereas our estimate as above indicates a total of 17,470 tons to that date.

Attention is now concentrated on the prospects of the vineyards for the coming summer. Atmospheric conditions, to start with, could not have been more unfavourable this winter. The rainfall has at present exceeded 50 ins., against the average of about 25 ins. Rain continues falling. In the winter of 1919/1920, the rainfall reached up to 60 ins. The yield, which up to the last moment that season had been estimated at 23/25,000 tons, eventually proved 15,890 tons. Conditions this year in our province are, unfortunately, very unsatisfactory in other respects as well. In 1919/1920 we had a Christian population of over two hundred thousand, which has since been entirely expelled from the country. At the Economic Congress recently held in our town, a report was read from the Governor of Vourla, the substance of which was to the following effect:—"There are 72,000 Turkish acres under vine cultivation at Vourla. The yield in sultanas and red raisins averaged about 11,000 tons. The population amounted to about 35,000, which was further supplemented by immigrant labour from Chios and Samos during the spring and summer months. The produce of the district in fruit alone represented a value of £74,000,000 or £600,000. The population is now reduced to 1,000, no cultivation of any sort has been done, and all the yield of grapes will be lost this year."

Scarcity of labour exists all over the province. Wages are high, and many large farmers are unable to face the heavy expense of cultivation. Credits are restricted, and the advances usually given by Smyrna dealers to farmers all over the country, and running into substantial sums, are not available. Continuous rains have seriously impeded work in the vineyards. From reports coming in from the principal districts it is estimated that barely 40 per cent. of the vines have so far been pruned or cultivated. Under the most favourable conditions the cultivation that may be hoped for this season is reckoned as follows:—Nymphio, about 70 per cent.; Magnesia, about 50 per cent.; Cassaba and Salihli, about 50 per cent.; Axar, Phocaea, Menemen, about 30 per cent.; Vourla, Cesme, and other remaining districts, nil. The season is advancing, and the outlook generally could not be more unsatisfactory. We give it as our considered opinion that, under the most favourable atmospheric and labour conditions henceforward, the yield of sultanas in the coming summer cannot exceed 15/18,000 tons, but in the event of a wet spring the consequences are calculated to be disastrous, and the yield might be easily reduced to even under 10,000 tons.

We shall report monthly on the general outlook. The accuracy of our reports since last September cannot be questioned, and the forecasts we made very shortly after the September events could not have proved more correct. Our pessimistic views to-day are based on a very close study of the whole situation and on information continually reaching us from reliable sources from all districts. We have been on the spot here since September, and have been able to watch all developments very closely and un-interruptedly.

Figs.—The rainy winter is not calculated to improve the outlook for this crop. With the destruction of the majority of packing establishments, the impossibility at present of manufacturing cases and boxes, scarcity of labour, etc., the coming season threatens unusual difficulties. It is too early as yet to forecast the probable extent of the yield, but the conditions attaching to the vineyards will, in a lesser degree, however, also apply to the fig orchards.

Valonea.—As indicated in our October report, it is estimated that the total quantity which will be available for export this year will not exceed 18/20,000 tons. Under normal conditions over 30,000 tons should have been gathered last autumn, in addition to the stocks which already existed in the country from the previous year.

Olive Oil.—The yield this winter had been estimated at about 45,000 tons. With the destruction of mills, loss of population, and heavy and continuous rains, it is now becoming evident that not one-third of this quantity will be taken in. Supplies are small, and with the delay in picking and milling the fruit acidities are running high. There has hardly been any business for export so far, nor are prospects generally favourable to any increase in shipments.

Cereal Crops.—The authorities have stimulated all efforts to increase cultivation. Seed has been distributed in many of the devastated districts, and all spare cattle available has been placed at the disposal of the small farmers. There should be sufficient barley and wheat for the wants of the population, but heavy rains have restricted the area under sowings and no surplus for export is likely to be available this year.

Peace appears to be near at hand. Turkey is emerging from one of the severest ordeals that any country in recent years has undergone. Twelve years of warfare; financial and administrative chaos; heavy depopulation; changes of Government; in a few words, a complete upheaval throughout the country of all previous systems, administrations, and establishments. Turkey has won her way through, and is now claiming the right to live and to work out her salvation in her own way. A government of the people by the people has been introduced. There is full freedom of speech, and the wants and the requirements of the country are freely discussed. The great problem now facing the people's leaders and representatives at Angora is its economic recuperation and the development of its resources. There are Moderates and Extremists; both sections are keenly alive to the difficulties of the situation, and to the thousand-and-one changes which will have to be introduced in order to permit of the country moving on more modern lines and taking rank among civilised States. There is still a period of evolution before the Turks. Those long resident in the country, and knowing the Turk, cannot for a moment deny that there is a deep longing, an intensity of desire, in all sections of the population to progress and develop. If moderate and liberal views prevail and the co-operation of more advanced States is obtained, a brighter era is in store and the future is full of great possibilities. Time alone will show how the experience gained in recent years will be utilised and whether the existing suspicion and fear of foreigners and foreign capital will enable extremists to close the doors of the country to the elements without which no real, permanent, and speedy progress can be realised.

SUDAN PRODUCE.

The report of the Central Economic Board of the Sudan Government for January gives the following particulars:—

Gum.

The exports of gum during January were as follows:—Via Port Sudan, 2,015 kilos. of bleached, 877,187 kilos. of hashab, and 23,209 kilos. of talh; and via Halfa, 1,916 kilos. of hashab.

Kordofan Province.—10,269 kantars of 100 rottles (45 kilos.) were sold in El Obeid market during January, as against 18,520 kantars in the same month last year, at an average price of £E1.396 m/ms. per kantar. Arrivals from Nahud were 10,685 kantars, as against 6,971 last year. 8,262 kantars were sold at Nahud, at an average price of £E1.180 per kantar, as against 8,396 kantars same month last year. At Um Ruaba 5,219 kantars were sold, as against 5,093 kantars last year. The average price was £E1.355 per kantar. At Rahad 9,110 kantars were sold during the month, as against 3,631 kantars last year. The price varied from £E1.550 to £E1.200 per kantar.

Nuba Mountains Province.—200 kantars of hashab and 2,543 kantars of talh gum were exported from Kaka during the year 1922. 375 kantars of hashab and 109 kantars of talh gum were exported from Kaka during January, 1923, the average prices being £E1.100 m/ms. and 330 m/ms. respectively.

White Nile Province.—9,363 kantars of 100 rottles (45 kilos.) of gum were exported from Tendelti. Market prices of gum at Kosti and Tendelti were £E1.125 and £E1.200 per kantar of 100 rottles (45 kilos.).

Cotton.

Red Sea Province.—December, Tokar.—Rain has fallen and the prospects have improved. The crop may now reach 60,000 kantars of 100 rottles (unginned), or thereabouts, provided there are no visitations of pests. January.—Cotton is looking well and prospects are bright. White ants are doing a considerable amount of damage, and Assal is present on small isolated patches. Picking has begun.

Blue Nile Province.—December.—The erection of the Wad el Nau pumps has begun, and very good progress has been made.

Berber Province.—Kitiab Pumping Station, December.—403 kantars of cotton of 315 rottles (unginned) were received during the month. Several feddans of the new demarcation at the North of Kitiaab have already yielded more than three kantars per feddan. Some of the Gabrah karu will not yield 2 kantars per feddan in all.

Dongola Province.—Ghaba Pumping Station, December.—Cotton is looking very well. The cold weather is delaying the opening of the bolls.

Kassala Province, December.—The condition of crops in general continues to be satisfactory. The Inspector of Agriculture reports as follows on the Gash: Wad Sharifai.—This area has all been planted with Cairo Sakel, which gave very good results last year. The present prospects are good, the best parts being much stronger and healthier than last year. Much of the cotton will be late, owing to delayed sowing, but the yield should be considerably in excess of last year's and of better quality. Rabakassa.—Much more land has been sown with cotton in this area, owing to the large area flooded by the Tukruf cut. The cotton is looking very promising, and the yield and quality will be good. Guluset.—Cotton very late in this region, as planting was delayed. The area under cotton is slightly increased, but a forecast as to yield is rather difficult to form, owing to backward condition. Adarief.—Area much enlarged and of better quality. There should be a much increased yield. Gammam.—The cotton in this area was the best I have seen this season. Area much increased and quality far superior this year. Mekali.—Large area of very good cotton. This land is all new and should give a very good quality, as the land was fallow last season. Hadalia.—Cotton backward, but better than last year's. Area increased. Various.—Very good cotton at Ragat and Aigr. That at Galsa and Illibilli is poorer and the total quantity sown small.

The Indian cotton crop of 1922-23 is estimated to yield 20,784,000 centals, or 16 per cent. more than the previous year.

The progress report of "Orion" Societate Anonima de Petrol for February shows that the crude oil production for the month was 3,810 tons. The throughput of the refinery was 3,155 tons; converted into lubricating oils 404 tons. Owing to heavy snowfalls and difficult roads only a small amount of transport could be effected. This interfered considerably with the drilling progress and the production.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Turkish Counter-Proposals.

The sub-Committees appointed last week in London to examine the Turkish counter-proposals to the draft Lausanne Treaty were able to present their reports at the beginning of this week, and while these pages are being printed the reply of the Allied Governments to Ismet Pasha's letter accompanying the counter-proposals is expected to be on its way to Angora. It is unlikely that the Allies will agree to the Turkish request that the Angora Agreement between France and Turkey should be embodied in the Treaty; even the French, it is understood, are entirely opposed to such a course. Equally improbable is it that the Allies will consent to the separation of the Economic Clauses from the rest of the Treaty. On the other hand, further modifications of the Clauses are possible, and may be supposed to have occupied the attention of the particular sub-Committee dealing with the subject.

The Scope of the Allies' Reply.

It is still permissible to hope that in their reply to Angora the Allies will not attempt to discuss any of the subjects raised in the Turkish counter-proposals. All discussion should be postponed until the Conference is resumed. The only point on which an answer should be necessary was whether the counter-proposals provided a basis for a renewal of the negotiations. An affirmative answer was given at the first meeting of the Allied representatives, held on March 21, and the object in submitting the Turkish proposals to a detailed examination was that the Allies should be in a position to meet the Turkish delegation with a united front and save as much time as possible at the resumed conference. By raising afresh the question of reparations the Turks compelled the Allied Governments to summon to London M. Venizelos, who had been Greece's chief representative at Lausanne. That exception should have been taken in some quarters to the invitation is a testimony to the profundity of the misgivings caused by the late Government's Near Eastern policy, but suggests a misreading of the present situation.

Greece and the Allies.

It would have been well if advantage could have been taken of M. Venizelos's presence in London to prepare the ground for a settlement of the Greek problem at the same time as the Turkish settlement is under discussion. Unfortunately, however, the way to this course is blocked by the indeterminate position in Greece itself. The Revolutionary Committee protests the disinterestedness of its policy and its single-minded devotion to the country's interests, but it delays the one step that must carry conviction in regard to this matter—abdication of its unconstitutional power and the appointment of a Government elected as the result of a free general election. It is true that in the meantime drastic steps are being taken to cope with Greece's financial difficulties; but the success of the measures depends largely on the willingness of the people to submit to them. There can be no co-operation in this respect on the part of the country as a whole with a régime which proclaims itself a temporary expedient, and not representative of the nation's considered judgment, and the measures themselves help to embitter the people without achieving the end in view. As far as the Allies are concerned, however, and, in particular, Great Britain, they have a duty to perform by Greece which cannot be met by sitting still with folded hands until such time as the Revolutionary Committee chooses to conform with their wishes. The Greeks should at least know exactly of what it is that they are depriving themselves while the present unsatisfactory state of affairs in their country lasts. The Revolutionary Committee has given Greece an army with its morale restored. That counts more than mere platitudes on the part of the Allies; but may possibly be held to be of less practical value than a substantial loan and a guarantee of security, under certain reservations, from outside aggression.

Britain and a Balkan Settlement.

The cruelty of Greece's position lies in the fact that her external difficulties are not over when she has signed peace with Turkey. They will never be settled so long as she holds the northern littoral of the Ægean Sea, and the countries in occupation of the interior are dissatisfied with their opportunities of access to that sea. An attempt is being made to come to terms with Yugoslavia, but misgiving already prevails in Athens over the prospect of a friendly settlement. Bulgaria, it is held, can be ignored, and no uneasiness is felt over the Allies' failure to carry out Article 48 of the Treaty of Neuilly. It is already noted, however, that Yugoslav comments on international affairs are now apt to be characterised by friendly allusions towards Bulgaria and by a cold reserve about Greece. From the point of view of European peace it is folly to leave this problem unsolved after a settlement of the Turkish question. We should like to see Great Britain, as a friend of all the parties concerned, and as the one country to whom Greece can look for help in her difficult problem of reconstruction, offer her services as mediator between Greece, Yugoslavia, and Bulgaria. At a conference—which need not be plenipotentiary—under a British chairman, the three countries could thresh out the vexed question, and when a practical solution has been found the chances of its being accepted by all concerned will depend largely on the ability of Great Britain to satisfy the State which feels most aggrieved that there are compensating advantages. Left to itself, each of the three countries will see, as through a magnifying glass, only its own contribution to the compromise. Under an able chairman a final solution of the Near Eastern problem might be evolved.

A Policy of Negation.

Quite a number of countries in the Near East have offered the spectacle of a considerable section of the population refraining from participation in the Parliamentary proceedings—Transylvanians in Roumania, Croats in Yugoslavia, Venizelists in Greece, Greeks in Cyprus. It is doubtful whether in any single instance the results of these tactics have been satisfactory to the party indulging in them. Certainly in each of the four cases quoted the boycott has sooner or later been abandoned or is in process of being abandoned. In Palestine the Arabs have now attempted to boycott the elections. Although their numbers invest the movement with some seriousness, it is difficult to understand what they hope to gain by a policy of pure negation. In the three Balkan States the dissident parties have been conscious of being in a hopeless minority, and have consequently used a withdrawal from Parliament as the most effective form of protest at their disposal. The Palestinian Arabs are not in this position, and a little reflection would convince them that the better way to substantiate their case is to give public evidence of their administrative capacity. Nobody challenges their numerical superiority; it is their experience in modern constitutional government that is held to be backward enough to justify a period of tutelage and training.

Fiume and Shushak.

It was generally anticipated that the Abbazzia Conference between Italians and Yugoslavs would be a prolonged one, and, for this reason, that it should adjourn over Easter without having reached agreement on any one point need not be taken too seriously. The main difficulty lies in the regulation of Fiume and its immediate neighbourhood in such a way that both Fiume and the Yugoslav port of Barosh may develop pari passu, and not one at the expense of the other. The Italian proposal would seem to be that the consortium responsible for the administration of Fiume should also take charge of the rest of the territory up to the Italian frontier; but as this body would presumably consist of an equal number of Italians, Yugoslavs, and Fiumans, the effect would be to place control in Italian hands. A satisfactory solution of the problem will, no doubt, ultimately be found; in the meantime, however, the whole territory suffers from the existing indeterminate state of affairs.

Roumanian Oil Anxieties.

As Roumania in the past had earned an unenviable reputation for allowing herself to be exploited by foreigners, owing to a reluctance on the part of the moneyed class to indulge in commerce or industry, it was natural that among the earliest of her post-War resolutions should be one to encourage the development of Roumania by the Roumanians. It was laid down at first that all mineral and oil rights were to be held by Roumanians alone. When it was found impossible to give effect to this principle, it was proposed that all land should be nationalised, and a sub-committee was appointed to elaborate the details of this policy for incorporation in the new Constitution. The Government's scheme is now before Parliament, and it is hardly matter for surprise that, as our Bucharest Correspondent informs us, the measure is evoking severe criticism. The proposed law provides that the rights of existing companies shall be respected, but only for the duration of existing contracts, and it is estimated that, if the measure becomes law, within less than thirty years all the mining lands of Roumania will be in the hands of the State. Companies already in existence may be able to look after themselves, although they have become alarmed over the State control of petroleum products; but it is clear that any new company being formed at this time on the strength of comparatively short leases of ground can hardly claim to have very attractive prospects. It may be, of course, that the project will not pass into law; there is certainly a suspicion in Roumania itself that it is intended mainly as a move for a special purpose in the political game rather than a serious State policy. Be that as it may, the investor in this country would do well to examine carefully the details of all new ventures.

The Indian Budget.

The Legislative Assembly at Delhi has so far shown very little originality in its handling of the Budget. Minor changes have resulted in a slight diminution of the prospective deficit, but no substantial reduction has been found possible, and the attempt to throw further recurring charges on capital instead of revenue—an attempt described by Sir Basil Blackett as faking the accounts—has very properly been met by the exercise of the Viceroy's exceptional powers. The deficit thus remained, and the Assembly shrank, as was generally expected, from meeting it by an increase in the salt tax, the only resource available at the moment. The Council of State, acting on a constitutional recommendation from the Viceroy, has restored this provision by a substantial majority, and the Assembly has now to decide whether it will gracefully concur or see the measure passed over its head. It would be futile to forecast its action, which will have been taken by the time these lines are in print, and we must be content to record the general satisfaction felt in this country at the Government's firm stand for honest finance, satisfaction which is clearly reflected in the prices of Indian securities on the Stock Exchange.

The Effect of the Viceroy's Action.

We do not share the apprehensions expressed by some of our contemporaries lest the constitutional sky should fall as a result of the Viceroy's use of the emergency powers conferred on him by Parliament. It is, of course, an unpleasant thing for politicians to have to go to the constituencies they as yet scarcely know with the news of an additional tax of threepence in the year, and most of the members have probably been manœuvring for position, so that they could put all the blame on a callous and extravagant Government. We suspect, therefore, that there is a good deal of unexpressed satisfaction just now among politicians who wished to balance the Budget, but had not the courage to do so, and while they will rail at the authorities in public, they are not likely to take any violent steps. It is rather a pity they will meet no Government candidates in the constituencies, because the public will not be told that members who refused to make salt dearer have voted consistently for a protective policy, which must raise the price of clothes and most other things that country people buy, but that must be borne as one of the inconveniences of a transitional Constitution.

Indian Free Traders.

It looks as if the high protectionists are not going to have it all their own way in India. The townsmen, of course, still hold to their secular ideal of cheap food and low wages, but in the recent discussions in India the voice of the country has been heard, rather faintly, indeed, but more strongly than ever before, and the country, which wants fair prices for the food it grows, is beginning to realise that high protection is sure to injure its foreign markets. The Pioneer goes so far as to forecast an immediate organised attempt to educate the electorate on the effects of a protective policy, and, though there is very little time for such an effort before the elections, we still hope that the next Legislature may contain, at any rate, the nucleus of a country party, drawn from provinces like Madras and the Punjab, with sufficient self-confidence to put the majority on its defence. The experience of this country shows that agriculturists are helpless against a preponderant urban population, but in India the preponderance is the other way; and there will be very little talk of protection when once the peasants have taken charge.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

The Boat Race.

Oxford won the Boat Race on Saturday by three-quarters of a length. Not since 1913 had they defeated Cambridge, and, whatever one's personal opinion about the desirability of the result may be, their victory was a popular one, so little does the British public like any side to be continually losing. It was not, perhaps, judged by the highest standards, a great race, but it was certainly a terrific struggle, and the emotions aroused when Cambridge spurted from two and a quarter lengths behind to within half a length will not soon be forgotten. Oxford rowed well, and were coxed magnificently, for twice they forced their opponents to row across the tide; no one will deny that they deserved their victory.

The aftermath of the race, round Piccadilly Circus, was well up to pre-War standard. There are people who pool-pooch the wisdom of hatless undergraduates in dinner jackets endeavouring to stand up on the top of taxicabs, but the general public not only tolerates but is genuinely interested in such ebullitions of youth. Enormous masses of Londoners regarded with merry pride the successive spectacles (each in the main details a replica of the preceding one!), and the greatest good-humour prevailed, even among the "Roberts," who were a very different brand from the University type.

A Debate on Capitalism.

Last week, in the Commons an hour or two was devoted to a discussion of Capitalism; Mr. Snowden being deputed to establish its failure, and Sir Alfred Mond to pronounce its necessity. It caused much stir in the Press; most journals, indeed, did not wait for Sir Alfred's demolition of the Socialist case, but replied to the Labour speech before it was uttered. Yet it was all rather shooting arrows into the air, for the "debate" was unreal and unfinished. The chosen defender of Capitalism had not much difficulty in riddling the bureaucratic attacker's case; but the merits of his speech as an exposition of a system were only relative. Most thinkers are now agreed that an economic system of life cannot be altered by political means; in other words, Mr. Snowden's suggestion of Parliamentary methods is useless; and equally it was extravagant to talk of modern Capitalism as purely a question of management, as if the profiteering middleman did not exist. Parliament is the place for the discussion of politics; when it comes to economics some men can scarcely be supposed to forget their personal raison d'être. Probably the members felt this, for the discussion was listened to rather glumly.

The Revival of F. E. Smith.

In the House of Lords during the last few days Lord Birkenhead has been galloping rather recklessly; at times, indeed, he has gone so fast that we can recognise only F. E. Smith in the saddle. I do not go so far as to impute political sincerity to this staunch supporter of the ex-Premier, but one must admire the enormous gusto and assiduous drumming with which he works up his artificial cases. First, he overwhelms the Bishop of London in a discussion of a Licensing Bill—no difficult task that, perhaps; next he seizes on our deficiency in aeroplanes to let off a little superfluous steam against France; and, finally, he takes advantage of a debate on the House of Lords to publish a jibe at Lords Salisbury and Selborne—"the Dolly Sisters," as he tastefully called them.

It is strange that this brilliant adventurer succeeds in deceiving people, though in influential quarters his bounce is measured at its correct value. These tempestuous displays of the Kruschen feeling do him no good, though one or two papers may stunt him for a while; and one need only compare his indiscreet conduct with the compelling silence of Mr. Winston Churchill to be able to guess who will return to power the sooner.

A Week of Sport.

Saturday was, indeed, a black afternoon for Cambridge, for not only on the Thames were their darkest fears realised, but also at Queen's Club, where Oxford won the Sports by seven events to four. How the result would have been affected if W. R. Seagrove (down with influenza) had been able to run for Cambridge in the mile and the three miles it is difficult to say, but, at any rate, though Cambridge lost, they provided a record. Their president, H. M. Abrahams, not only won the hundred in evens, the quarter in 50 4-5 seconds, but he beat the late H. S. O. Ashington's record in the long jump by an inch, achieving 23 ft. 7½ ins.

At Twickenham at the same time the English Army's fame at Rugger was gravelled by the French Army, who won by five tries to two. It seems to have been a thoroughly poor game, but all the same we feel that there is something rather wrong in such a result, and are duly disconcerted. As a matter of fact, we would in our relations with the French far rather have more goals than aeroplanes.

The Grand National was won by a thirteen-year-old, Sergeant Murphy, with a very gallant performance. Only about half a dozen horses finished, and the "tortoises" easily proved their superiority over the "hares." It was an infinitely more satisfactory race than the Lincoln, which had in the first three home horses at sixty-sixes and fifties!

The Farming Stoppage.

The issue between the farmers and labourers, to which I referred last week, is not yet decided, for at a conference at Norwich on Saturday no agreement was reached. A general strike has been declared, and it is estimated that 15,000 men came out to-day. The most hopeful, and yet perhaps natural, feature of the dispute is the utter lack of bitterness on both sides, for it is realised that in the agriculture of modern England the question for masters and men is not to stand out for respective terms, but to stand together for national recognition. In other words, both parties are looking to the Government for a solution. They have not, despite recent dampers by the Prime Minister, entirely abandoned the hope of Protection. Catch-words like "better organisation" and "scientific farming" do not mean much to the practical agriculturist; he wants definite support and the dispelling of uncertainty. The matter at present rests with the masters discussing the labourers' suggestion that there be a three months' postponement, during which period wages and hours should remain as at present. It is scarcely probable, seeing that spring is here, that the farmers will agree to this.

Greater London.

The demand for a Greater London is often represented, on the one hand, as a progressive scheme of efficiency and, on the other, as a grasping machination of an impersonal octopus. There is little doubt that, from the scientific engineer's point of view, the administration of local government is chaotic and lamentable, but equally there is no doubt of the very strong local feeling which resents any attempt on independence. The report of the Royal Commission on London Government has just been issued, and in effect leaves the position where it was—that, at least, is the tenour of the Majority report. In the Minority report there are many recommendations, and there are also such suggestions as the placing of transport under a Supreme Traffic Authority, and the Equalisation of Rates within a radius of ten miles from Charing Cross.

It may be that in the Government's good time we shall suffer various improvements in the administration of London, but it is a considerable opinion that the capital is already too big, and that decentralisation is not only desirable but a distant necessity. However, the movement to resist uniformity and standardisation is not yet organisedly afoot, and it looks as though we had some way to go down the road of progress before we retrace our steps.

Some Recent Books.

There is really much more interest in lost civilisations than in decadent ones like our own, and "Inca Land: Explorations in the Highlands of Peru," by Hiram Bingham (Constable), is extraordinarily fascinating. The author discovered, among other things, that the "bottomless" lake of Parinacochus was but four feet deep, that Mount Coropuna was lower than Aconcagua; and he identified Uticos, the capital of the lost and mysterious Incas.

Many people other than musicians—readers of Hardy's novels, for instance—are familiar with the instruments that were used in church before the disastrous advent of the organ, but they will find many new sidelights in the Rev. K. H. Macdermott's "Sussex Church Music in the Past" (Moore and Wingham). One likes, in particular, the spiritual flavour of an incident that happened on a hot Sunday afternoon in church between the flautist and the clarionet player. The clarionet stopped playing to mop his forehead, whereupon the flute said, "Play up, will ye!" Back came the answer, "I can't play no more; I do sweats that bad I can't see!"

"The Last Poems of Alice Meynell" (Burns and Oates) bear such marks of sincerity and reticence as are very rare in this generation, by whom, however, her genius is by no means overlooked. ALTER EGO.

Continuation of Ministerial Crisis.

There is no change in the situation. The Ministerial crisis continues, and the perpetrators of the recent bombing outrages are still undiscovered. There would appear to be little prospect of the formation of a political Cabinet in the near future, and the proposal has been much ventilated of the formation of a Cabinet d'affaires, under a Prime Minister having no party attachments, to carry on the government of the country.

In the event of any obstruction by the clique who try at all costs to make everything as difficult as possible for the King and the British Government, a way out of the impasse may possibly be obtained by forming the permanent Under-Secretaries into an administrative council with the legiferous powers of a Cabinet. For this a Royal rescript will be necessary. Admittedly a Royal rescript would be a move in the direction of a return to autocratic power, but in the circumstances such a step will be abundantly justified. It is in the interests of the country that machinery should be created to enable the administration to be carried on by Egyptians, and, failing the formation of a Cabinet d'affaires, a Royal rescript is the only means by which such machinery can be created.

Of course, the administration of the country could be assured without any Cabinet or any substitute machinery by means of martial law, but no one, not even the militarists, desires the adoption of this expedient. Everyone is, indeed, agreed upon the advisability of avoidance of recourse to any but Egyptian channels, and so efforts are being made to devise some machinery for carrying on the administration of the country during this much-required interlude.

There is one very good reason why no delay should be incurred in this matter. Unless a Cabinet d'affaires is formed or the Under-Secretaries are equipped with the powers mentioned above within the next ten days, the financial administration of the country will legally become impossible. The Budget for the financial year which starts from April 1 has, according to the existing Organic Law, to be approved and promulgated on or before March 25. If it is not so promulgated, the power to spend money will automatically cease, as there is no provision in the Organic Law for any emergency like the present. To ensure the continuation of the administration of the country, some means must, therefore, be found for promulgating the Budget before March 26.

The situation is admittedly a complicated one, but the solution to the immediate problem and the means of providing a much-required respite for the political situation are really not difficult, provided all those intimately concerned show courage and patriotism.

Public Security.

As regards public security, very energetic efforts are being made to trace the bomb-throwers. It is generally admitted that the Wafd has no direct hand in these outrages, though undoubtedly its ill-considered utterances have served as an encouragement. Also by this time a study of the circumstances of all these outrages has convinced most of us that those responsible for them are a small band, probably Bolshevistically inclined Egyptians.

While there is no intention of casting any reflection on the zeal or efficiency, in public security matters generally, of those to whom falls the task of dealing with these outrages, it is becoming more and more apparent that public security organisation in Egypt is not adequately equipped for meeting a serious emergency like the present, and that there is no one in Egypt possessing either the knowledge or experience to create the proper organisation which the present situation demands. It has, therefore, been suggested, and I think very sensibly, that someone expert in dealing with political crime of this description should be brought either from Scotland Yard or from India for the purpose of advising the Egyptian authorities in regard to the present very serious situation, and I, personally, think no time should be lost in putting into effect this suggestion.

Zaghloul Pasha.

During the last week there has been much talk of Zaghloul Pasha. His return to Egypt at the present juncture has been declared in many circles, mostly interested, to be the only solution for the present impasse, and certain of the vernacular papers have tried to make out that the British Press, headed by The Times, is in favour of his immediate release from Gibraltar and of his return to Egypt. We have not as yet received the London papers in question, but we have sufficient evidence from the texts of the telegrams quoted to show that the statements referred to have to a large extent been entirely misinterpreted. The bulk of instructed European opinion in Egypt has for some time been agreed on the point that the continued detention of the national leader was a political and a moral mistake, that he ought long ere this to have been liberated, and that admirable opportunities for doing so have recently been neglected. But, on the other hand, there is equally strong agreement that, while desirable a month ago, such a step taken to-day, immediately after a series of anti-British bomb outrages had been perpetrated, would be a colossal blunder, since it would undoubtedly encourage the Opposition in the belief that we had been terrorised into this action by these outrages, and would merely conduce to a continuation of such tactics. It is considered that so long as outrages continue there can be no talk on our part of anything in the nature of concessions nor, much as we may desire it, can we release Zaghloul Pasha. If the Egyptians want us to give effect to our promises, which no one is keener on redeeming than ourselves, if they want us to release their "hero," there must be an end of these acts of violence and of the political pother that has characterised the situation during the past year. We cannot go on giving way and invariably find ourselves confronted with a situation more serious than the one which we sought to relieve by our concessions.

The opinion is, indeed, general that we have been far too lenient and conciliatory, that we have in certain respects overstepped the limit of concessions in our sincere desire to bring about an improvement in the Egyptian situation, and that our well-meant efforts have been entirely misunderstood and taken undue advantage of. The Allenby declaration of February 28, 1922, constituted the limit of our concessions, and should, in fact, have been regarded by everyone as the guiding point for the conduct of Egyptian affairs, just as the famous Granville despatch constituted the keynote during the Occupation. Latterly, however, attempts have been deliberately made to get round the limits set in the Allenby declaration on the excuse that local political difficulties made some further concession necessary, but at no time has any compensating quid pro quo been offered. No doubt the difficulties of the governing class are very great, but they are, after all, in a great measure of their own making. They have not had the courage to grasp the nettle and frankly admit to the people that nothing further can be obtained until the conditions contained in that declaration have been fulfilled. Nor have we been altogether blameless in the matter, for we have repeatedly given reason to think that we were prepared to make further concessions before those conditions could be fulfilled.

What we have to do is definitely to take our stand on the Allenby declaration and refuse categorically to be jockeyed from the position which we voluntarily agreed to take up. In other words, we must be firm, and let it clearly be understood, in the first place, that we can enter on no further discussions until the conditions accepted by Egypt are fulfilled, and, secondly, that any continuation of the present situation, where not only is normal government rendered difficult but public security is threatened, will compel us to reconsider our position. In the circumstances Mr. Bonar Law's declaration in the House of Commons is warmly welcomed, and in both the British and European communities, as well as among the more far-seeing Egyptians, the hope is expressed that this foreshadows the adoption of a policy of firmness, as regards both concessions and government of the country, which is the sole hope for a satisfactory solution of the Egyptian question.

ROUMANIA.

Bucharest, March 12.

Nationalisation of Sub-Soil.

Prior to the meeting of Parliament nothing of particular note had happened for some time in the field of politics. The policy of the Liberal Government has, however, taken on a more and more definitely anti-foreign character, as is illustrated by the suggested new taxation laws, to say nothing of the projected nationalisation of the sub-soil, which has formed the chief subject of discussion in the debates on the new Constitution now occupying Parliament. This last project has roused severe criticism from all sections of society, and, if carried out, will have far-reaching effects upon existing mining enterprises in the country. It is true that the proposed law provides that the rights of existing companies shall be respected; but this will avowedly hold good only until the expiry of their present contracts, when their holdings of land will be taken over by the State, some compensation being allowed to them for the buildings and installations they have erected. The State then proposes to parcel out the land in small lots to be leased for exploitation. At a congress of Roumanian engineers held in Bucharest last autumn the subject of the nationalisation of the sub-soil was also discussed at some length, and the bulk of opinion appeared to be in favour of it. The carrying out of nationalisation will mean that within thirty years all the mining lands of Roumania will be in the hands of the State.

Criticism of the Government.

With regard to the taxation of commercial companies, the proposed project gives certain advantages to companies of which the whole of the capital is Roumanian, and all or most of the directors of Roumanian nationality.

To the credit of the Roumanians as a whole, it must be said that the general policy of the Liberal Government does not appear to be increasing its popularity. Especially is this the case in Transylvania, where that policy is anathema, inasmuch as in this province it is held to be directed mainly towards crushing the competition of non-Liberal industrialists. As one instance of this aim is cited the withdrawal from the Agrarian Bank of Cluj of all the privileges granted by a previous Liberal Government and confirmed by the Avaresco Government in 1921. To this bank had been entrusted all the financial operations connected with agrarian reform in Transylvania. By a decision of the Council of Ministers early this year these privileges were withdrawn. The bank made a formal protest, but without result, and it is now suing the Government for damages.

Winter in Roumania.

Last month Roumania was visited by a heavier snowstorm than any that has been experienced for many years. In the town fully two feet of snow fell, accompanied for the first twelve hours by a half-gale of wind, which heaped it in drifts of a much greater depth. All tramway traffic was completely stopped for at least a week, and even for sleighs the roads were difficult in the soft snow until tracks were gradually beaten down. For several days no trains entered or left Bucharest, and many were snowed up on the lines and had to be dug out. One train started from Brashov (Kronstadt) with some important passengers for Bucharest, but left half its carriages behind before reaching Predeal, and the next day these were buried in snow up to their windows. It was reported that in Brashov tunnels were made in some parts through the snow for pedestrians, presumably to permit them to cross the roads through the heaps of snow that had been cleared on to the side. The effects of the long winter and the severe weather have been disastrous to the streets of Bucharest, which are still bathed in mud and have many deep holes requiring repair. Great things are expected of the new mayor, Mr. Costinescu, whose task, however, is not an enviable one.

GREECE.

Athens, March 17.

The Exchange of Prisoners.

The Greek Government has now definitely authorised the exchange of Turkish hostages and prisoners of war which was so unexpectedly stopped about a fortnight ago. All the hostages and prisoners had been cleared out of their camps and moved to the various concentration camps in Athens and Piræus in readiness for embarkation when the disappointing news to the effect that their return home had been indefinitely postponed came through. The military prisoners were promptly sent back to their camp at Liossia and elsewhere, while the political prisoners were embarked on transports—the same transports which were to have conveyed them home—and taken to Crete, Milo, and some of the other Ægean islands where prisoners' camps have been established. The Greek Government's reason for putting a stop to the departure of the Turks was the fact that news had just been received from M. Pallis, the Greek diplomatic representative attached to the Spanish Legation at Constantinople, to the effect that the Turks, violating the convention signed at Lausanne by virtue of which both Greece and Turkey undertook to abstain from further deportations until May 1, which is the day fixed for the beginning of the exchange of populations, had commenced with renewed energy the deportation of the Greeks concentrated on the shores of the Pontus. On being informed of the Greek Government's decision, the Turks in turn ordered all the Greek prisoners who had been moved to Smyrna ready for embarkation back to the interior, and at the same time threatened reprisals in the form of wholesale expulsion of all the Christians—whether Greeks or Armenians—still left on Turkish soil. Fortunately, however, an agreement has now been concluded between the Turks and the Greeks whereby the former undertake to put a stop to the exodus of the Pontus Greeks on condition that the repatriation of the Turks commence immediately.

Five Greek steamers are leaving this afternoon for Crete and Milo, whence they will convey the prisoners direct to Smyrna and Constantinople.

The Albanian Minister.

The arrival in Athens of the new Albanian Minister, M. Midhat Frasheri—which was immediately followed by the appointment of M. Panourgias as Greek representative at Durazzo—is no doubt a happy augury and an indication that both Greece and Albania have made up their minds, at least for the time being, to forget their old differences and to work together as two good progressive neighbours.

I had the pleasure of a long talk with M. Frasheri at the Grande Bretagne, where he is staying. He is about forty-two years old, and is a constant reader of THE NEAR EAST, which has always dealt fairly with the questions of his country. Needless to say, M. Frasheri is thoroughly acquainted with the whole Albanian question. Upon my asking what he thought of the Northern Epirus business, he very calmly remarked that his geographical education did not include any such country, and suggested that I was perchance referring to Southern Albania! When, again, I asked him whether George Castriotis was a Greek or an Albanian, his Excellency declared most emphatically that that gentleman was a thoroughbred Albanian. He was indeed surprised at my ignorance! A few hours later a Greek professor almost convinced me that George Castriotis had not possessed a drop of Albanian blood in his veins! Besides, he added, is not the name sufficiently Greek?

It is thought, however, that the question of the birth of this famous Albanian (or Greek) patriot is not likely to cause a hitch in the good relations between the two countries, and that as for the question of Northern Epirus (or Southern Albania) and Chimara, some sort of an arrangement satisfactory to both parties concerned will be arrived at in the near future. There is no doubt that while the majority of the villages ceded recently to Albania are absolutely Albanian, a considerable number still have a predominant Greek element.

M. Frasheri will not remain in Athens long, as he is about to be appointed Albanian Minister at Washington. His post in the Greek capital will be taken up by some other Albanian diplomatist who, it is understood, will arrive here shortly.

A Naval Tragedy.

A terrible naval accident, with an exceptionally heavy death roll, occurred last week off Piræus. The tugboat "Alexander," one of the small boats utilised for the service between the naval arsenal at Salamis and the Piræus, had left Salamis on Saturday afternoon, conveying to Piræus about 250 naval officers and men who had been granted home leave for the week-end. Despite the strong gale which was blowing at the time, the "Alexander" succeeded in getting safely through the narrows. However, on reaching a point about a quarter of a mile from the exterior breakwater of the harbour, the tugboat was suddenly completely overturned by the force of the wind, and sank immediately with all hands. It is impossible yet to ascertain the exact number of those who perished, but it is estimated that with the exception of a very few—probably not more than twenty—all those aboard the ill-fated steamer were drowned. Amongst these is Commander D. Panas, one of the twelve officers who court-martialled Prince Andrew.

Miscellaneous News.

A twenty-two-year old Russian student named Christo Seminof has been arrested by the Greek police in connection with the robbery that took place at the British Legation in Athens three weeks ago. Seminof confessed his guilt, and informed the police that his confederates were another Russian, a Roumanian, an Armenian, and a Jew. The value of the jewels stolen from the Legation, which belonged to Mrs. Bentinck, the wife of the First Secretary, was estimated at £700. Most of the jewels have now been recovered.

The Cypriot brotherhood of Athens has passed a resolution protesting against the reply of the British Colonial Minister to the effect that no autonomy will at present be granted to the Cypriots. In its protest the Cypriot brotherhood of Athens asks for special privileges for the Cyprus people, but at the same time expresses its "affection and deep gratitude towards the great English Nation."

The Government has suppressed the Greek

Legations at Tokio, Rio Janeiro, Christiania, Copenhagen, Berne, Brussels, Budapest, and Tirana. Numerous Greek Consulates, including those at Tunis, Rio Janeiro, Buenos Aires, and Budapest, have also been suppressed. It is estimated that by the abolition of these Legations and Consulates the Greek Exchequer will save about ten million drachmæ annually.

PERSIA.

Teheran, January 30.

A Military Review.

A military review was held on the 18th instant on a hitherto unprecedented scale. The Shah was present, wearing the undress uniform of the new army, this being the first time a Persian monarch has appeared in khaki. Between 7,000 and 8,000 troops were on parade in the spacious drill square, which has been very greatly improved by the Minister of War, who has erected a most imposing gateway at the southern entrance. Above the gate, in the ironwork, Sardar Sipah has placed a life-size bust of himself in brass in colours, which is quite realistic.

The smartness and efficiency of the parading troops were much commented on by the foreigners present, and the men appeared better drilled and better clothed than ever before. It was interesting to notice the twelve Lewis guns, taken over by the Persian Government from the British forces on their withdrawal from North Persia, and also the batteries of guns drawn by British horses from the same source, which dwarfed the much smaller native-bred horses. Another reminder of the British military in Persia was furnished by the large mules carrying the Lewis guns. These mules were imported by the South Persia Rifles and taken over by the Persian Ministry of War on the disbandment of the former. Altogether, the Minister of War has good reason to feel satisfied with the army he has called into being.

The Fall of the Cabinet.

As forecasted in my last letter, the Cabinet has fallen, and Ghavam-es-Saltaneh, on January 25, tendered his resignation to the Shah, who accepted it. The Parliament immediately proceeded with the nomination of a new Premier, and this resulted in the election of Mustaufi el Mumalik by a large majority. The Shah was thereupon advised of this by the President of the Mejliss, and Mustaufi el Mumalik was called in audience and agreed to form a Cabinet. The members of this are at present unknown, but the new Ministry is expected to be presented in a day or two.

The Work of the Late Cabinet.

Towards the end of his seven months' Premiership, Ghavam-es-Saltaneh, although he did his best to remain in office and had declared in the Mejliss a week or two beforehand that he had no intention of resigning, found his position no longer tenable, and the majority in Parliament which he had hitherto possessed having turned against him, he had no option but to tender his resignation. He had been attacked in the local Press for some months past, and hardly a day passed without some paper or other containing an article attacking him and criticising his actions and Government, which resulted in the suspension of a number of the papers. Twice his Ministry was impeached before the Parliament and asked to give an explanation of their actions, but, on the whole, his Cabinet must be given credit for some real attempt at progress and reform, the most notable of which was the engagement of Dr. Millspaugh as Administrator-General of the Finances, and his Assistant Financial Advisers, whose advent has already marked a most decided step towards the reform in the Ministry of Finance of which the country stood so sorely in need.

The Northern Oil Concession.

Much discussion has been taking place lately in the Mejliss with regard to the Northern Oil Concession, and all the clauses are in turn being thrashed out to the best advantage of the country, which realises that this is not a matter to be lightly decided, in view of the large profits and increasing dividends paid by the Anglo-Persian Oil Company the last few years.

General News.

The first German Minister appointed to the Court of Persia since the departure of Prince Henry XXXI. of Reuss in the first year of the War arrived here on January 18, and his arrival was significant as being the first occasion on which the representative of a foreign Power was not officially received outside the gates of the city by the Persian Government, accorded a ceremonious reception, and provided with a State carriage and escort for his entry into the capital. The Government has now done away with this interesting ceremony as being antiquated and not in keeping with modern custom. The last head of a mission to whom this was accorded was our own Minister, Sir Percy Loraine, on his arrival in December, 1921.

The new Turkish Ambassador, Mohy ed Din, the first appointed by the Nationalist Turkish Government, arrived a few days ago in Enzeli from Angora, but is delayed in Resht owing to the bad state of the road consequent on the recent heavy falls of snow. The Turkish Embassy, like the German Legation, has, since the beginning of the war, been in charge of a Secretary of Legation.

Constantinople, March 20.

The Question of the Capital.

With the prospects of peace becoming an accomplished fact before many weeks are past, the choice between Angora and Constantinople as the capital of New Turkey is once more being discussed in the Constantinople Press, and many reasons are being urged in favour of Constantinople. If one may judge from impressions gained by visitors to Angora and from their conversations with certain Nationalist deputies on the subject, it should not require much persuasion or conviction to induce the Angora Parliament to transfer its affections and activities to the more comfortable and civilising atmosphere of the Golden Horn. Among the arguments against the selection of Angora is that of the expense that will be involved in transforming it into something worthy of a capital town; in the erecting of a Parliament and administrative offices, the much rebuilding that would be necessary, the remaking of streets which at present are in a deplorable condition, and the like—all at a time when Turkey is sorely in need of funds, and all with the appurtenances to a ready-made capital already existing in Constantinople.

The Tanine expresses itself rather succinctly on the subject. It says:—"When we hear of all the privations endured by those who lived at Angora during the War, we feel a great respect for these patriots who made such great sacrifices. However, it must be confessed that if this fashion of life which was so praiseworthy during the War continues after peace, then it loses all its value. As long as we have a capital endowed by nature with incomparable gifts, it would show the absolute lack of the common-sense of civilisation to go and live in the desert a life deprived of the most elementary conditions of comfort. Angora was an excellent War capital, and we shall piously preserve its memory, but we can never abandon Constantinople as our peace capital."

One can well understand, from the point of view of the Nationalist leader and his Government, that, whereas doubtless they yearn for the gay banks of the Bosphorus, the glitter and glamour of the Golden Horn, and the general comfort and life of ancient Byzantium, that there are many little disabilities guarding them against the choice. It might even be considered impolitic for the seat of the Khalifat and of the sovereign power of Turkey to be in one and the same town. Be this as it may, and for many and various reasons, one is led to believe that the votes and influence of the present Nationalist Government, at any rate, will be cast in favour of the retention of Angora as the legislative capital of Turkey.

THE POSITION IN YUGOSLAVIA.

The results of the General Election in Yugoslavia offer little prospect of the political situation in that country being straightened out in the immediate future. Last December the coalition between the Radicals and Democrats, which had enabled the centralised form of government favoured by the Serbians to become law as the Constitution of the new State, came to an end, and M. Pashitch formed a Cabinet wholly of Radicals. Lacking a majority in the Chamber, he was obliged to appeal to the country. He has been returned at the head of the strongest Party in the State, but able to rely in the Chamber on only 120 out of 313 deputies. As his former allies, the Democrats, can claim only fifty-one seats, M. Pashitch will be compelled, even if he secures the support of the majority of these, to cast his net rather widely among the numerous small groups into which the rest of the deputies are divided, in order to obtain a working majority. For such support the inevitable price will have to be paid, and in these circumstances the position of the veteran politician is not likely to be more secure than it has been at any time during the last three or four months or with the Coalition. The most significant feature of the election is the increase in the relative strength of M. Raditch's Croatian following, which now numbers seventy deputies. As a protest against the character of the Constitution this party absented itself from the last Parliament, but towards the end of the session satisfaction with the policy of negation was on the wane among the Croats. It was found that in the absence of a strong Croat party in the Chamber the interests of their country were being overlooked; there had been a marked increase in the revenue that the Croats contributed to the public exchequer, and an equally marked decrease in the State expenditure on Croatia. Now that M. Raditch commands the second strongest party in the Chamber, a continuation of the policy of abstention would be a grave mistake. With a skilful handling of his opportunities he could seriously embarrass the Pashitch Government, and this possibility, no doubt, is responsible for the fears expressed in some quarters that M. Pashitch may be tempted to end a deadlock by dispensing with Parliament and establishing a dictatorship.

For the present, M. Raditch remains the unknown factor. He is credited with having dropped the Republican flag; he has purged his party of the group that paraded its sympathy with the Austro-Hungarian régime, and stands now for a wholly Yugoslav platform. If he could in his own person command the necessary confidence, there can be little doubt that his programme of a decentralised federation would find wide acceptance in Yugoslavia. The country is tired of party strife. The Serbian policy of centralisation may make for strength in international dealings; but it would seem to be associated too much with political bickerings and the use of the heavy hand to be worth the cost at this stage. Points of difference between the various sections of the new State are still too pronounced to admit of them all taking kindly to being forced into one particular mould. The enthusiasm of irredentist days appeared to warrant the system that has been adopted; but experience has proved it to be premature. The union of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes will be the stronger if free play is allowed at the first to their racial, cultural, and temperamental diversity. A policy that tends to increase the tension between Serbs and Croats can have little to commend it. On the other hand, M. Raditch has hitherto shown no signs of any willingness to advance by gradual stages towards his goal. He was no less eager than M. Pashitch to enforce upon the new State his policy in its entirety, in which the main stumbling-block for the Yugoslavs as a whole was his republicanism. If he is to win support for the scheme of a decentralised federation, he will need to reassure public opinion that this part of his original programme has been eliminated. He is responsible for the saying that the rôle of the Croats and Slovenes is to Europeanise the Balkans and not to allow Croatia and Slovenia to be Balkanised; but one of the misgivings that he will have to overcome in the new Parliament is that he may not be big enough to keep a grasp on Yugoslav affairs while championing the interests of one section of the Croatian people.

Federalism, even according to M. Raditch's views, would leave Foreign Affairs and Finance centralised. Four years ago the Croat leader was inclined to hold that a standing army was unnecessary for Yugoslavia. If he should still be of the same opinion, he will have to admit the impossibility of winning the rest of the Yugoslav people to his way of thinking at this precise moment, and the third centralised Ministry for a federal Yugoslavia will be that for Defence. It is in regard to the finances of Yugoslavia that political instability bears most hardly to-day upon the country. M. Pashitch has done well to go outside his own and other political parties for his Minister of Finance. In the short time that M. Stoyadinovitch has been at his post he has been able to inspire considerable confidence in the ultimate recovery of Yugoslav finance. No more paper money is to be printed; the reckless policy of granting credits has been abandoned, and there has been a reduction in export taxes. The decision in regard to the issue of paper money presses hardly on a number of banks, which under the old policy had tied up a considerable amount of capital in industrial enterprises, and now find themselves unable to carry out their ordinary operations. Their position has been the subject of a special inquiry, but it is unlikely that the Ministry of Finance will yield to their request to have the printing press brought into action again for their benefit. In the meantime, the revenues of the State are showing a gradual increase, and the money so obtained is being used by the Government to pay off old debts to domestic industrial enterprises, in order that the development of local industry may be stimulated. A heavy fall in Yugoslav exchange coincided with the political crisis in December, and there was a further break towards the end of January. Since the latter date the value of the dinar has risen steadily, although it has not yet recovered the position that it held last November. If the balance of the Blair loan that has not been issued can be cancelled by mutual consent, it will be to the advantage of Yugoslavia. There are other and more economical ways of developing the country under present conditions than by constructing a difficult railway to the Adriatic. What is of most importance to Yugoslavia just now is that her financial policy should not be made the sport of political changes.

THE TURKISH NATIONALIST MOVEMENT.*By NIHAD RESHAD BEY.

If there is a country about which much has been written, much spoken, but which, nevertheless, still remains unknown and misunderstood, that country is Turkey. The Turkish situation has during the last few years once more become a burning question. The Turkish Nationalist movement and its consequences have been discussed at great length, and the object of this article is to give a survey of the origin of this movement and of its position at the present time.

Although the Nationalist movement, which was born in Asia Minor nearly four years ago, might be attributed to local and particular causes, in reality its origin is in the distant past. The immediate cause of its existence was the invasion of Smyrna by the Greeks immediately after the signature of an armistice which had been considered by the Turks as a first step towards the pacification of the East. As to the distant causes of the movement, they are to be found in the history of the Turkish people, and in order to arrive at its essential features it is necessary to throw a retrospective glance over this history.

First of all, it can be said that this movement represents the ultimate expression of uninterrupted and prolonged efforts of the Turkish people to save the last vestiges of their national inheritance, and to assure to themselves through the reorganisation and modernisation of their country a vigorous and independent future existence.

This effort towards reorganisation and reform began at the end of the eighteenth century. It was Sultan Selim III., whom the French historian Albert Vandal called "the first of the Young Turks," who, under the pressure of events, felt a necessity of reorganising his country, taking the Western States as a model, and who set himself courageously to carry out this work. It was quite plain to him that the Janissaries formed the principal obstacle to all ideas of internal reform. He therefore decided to begin his work by modernising the army. He instituted the Nizan-Jedid, a corps of regulars organised on Western methods. He created a military school, an artillery school, and other schools for the Navy and for the Engineers, and finally erected a foundry for the production of cannon; but, meeting with strong resistance from the Janissaries, Selim III. was not only unaided in his efforts, which failed to fructify, but fell a victim to his ideas, and was deposed in 1808. He was succeeded to the throne by Mahmoud II., surnamed "the Second Founder of the Empire" on account of the many reforms he introduced into the country, which overthrew the old régime. He continued with success the reforms initiated by his brother, and finally abolished the Janissaries in 1826, creating in their place a modern army. In administrative affairs the decrees published by him are clearly inspired by the systems of government then in vogue in Europe. He abolished the feudal chiefs, known as "Dere Beyi," and dispersed certain religious communities which showed marked hostility to every project of reform. It was noticeable in this reign how readily and whole-heartedly the nation welcomed these reforms, which were made without any animosity.

Under the following reign of Abdul Mejed I. the nation became still further conscious of the need for reforms. The Sultan was fortunate in having two remarkable statesmen, Rechid Pasha and Khosrew Pasha, who adopted enthusiastically the royal policy for reform, and seconded, encouraged, and guided their master. In 1839 was proclaimed the now famous Hatt Humayoun of Culhane, called the Tanzimat. This solemn proclamation, which constituted the first serious attempt to bring the State into line with modern Governments, recognised the equality of all citizens before the law, without distinction of race or creed. It also laid down the measures to be undertaken for sweeping administrative reforms. Public education was reorganised by making it free and obligatory, while secondary schools were created similar to those of Western States, more particularly in France. The Tanzimat also dealt with reforms for the collection of taxes, the reorganisation of the courts, and of legislation in regard to penal and commercial matters. To show his regard for religious liberty, this monarch said, in speaking of his subjects: "I make no difference between the followers of different religions. I know the Christian only in his church, the Jew only in his synagogue, and the Mussulman in his mosque." Abdul Mejed was entirely absorbed in his thoughts of reform, which were unfortunately interrupted by the Russian aggression in 1853, an aggression based on futile pretexts, but which was really aimed at the Turkish movement towards reforms.

Under the reign of his successor, Abdul Aziz, the work of reform was continued in spite of all intrigues. The teaching of French was made obligatory, and a school of medicine was established, where instruction was given in French, a language, moreover, which became a diplomatic language of the Sublime Porte. Thanks to the reorganisation of education and to steadily increasing intercourse with the West, the Turkish nation succeeded in creating a small circle of intellectuals, fully awake to their duties and realising the needs of their country. It is easily understood that among these were many who were animated by a desire to transform Turkey into a really modern State. In the very beginning of Abdul Hamid's reign an eminent citizen, Midhat Pasha, succeeded in proclaiming a Constitution. Then once again Imperialist Russia appears on the scene. While the cannon thundered at Constantinople to announce the inauguration of a Constitutional Government, the Russian Ambassador was ceaselessly employed in inciting his colleagues to intervene in the internal affairs of the country. His intrigues finally resulted in the war of 1877. In the same way as the Crimean War put a stop to the reforms instituted by Abdul Mejed, the war of 1877 hindered at its very birth the development of a constitutional régime, and once more struck a fatal blow at the movement towards regeneration and reform. The Treaty of Berlin, which ended the war, once more gave the lie to the solemn acknowledgment given by the European Powers in Paris in 1856 to respect and guarantee the integrity of the Ottoman. From this date, 1878, Turkey, which was referred to in the Chancelleries of Europe as the "sick man," a title invented by Emperor Nicholas I. of Russia, became a prey to covetousness and intrigues, which were given a free hand to tear her in pieces; so much so, in fact, that towards the end of the last century the periodic dismemberment of the Ottoman Empire had already become a principal factor in European diplomacy. It is, above all, in a later period of European history that the Western Powers, wishing to hasten the disintegration of the Turkish Empire, multiplied their excuses to interfere with the interior affairs of the country on a pretext of demanding administrative or judicial reforms for religious or ethnological minorities. Thus proposals were made at the Sublime Porte for projects of reform, sometimes in favour of the Bulgarians, and at others in favour of the Armenians, but never in these projects could there be discovered the slightest desire to serve the interest of the Turkish population, and the idea of bettering the condition of the Turks themselves did not occupy the slightest place. The object, which was hardly dissimulated, was the prospective amputation of province after province, and, in fact, the European Powers had openly allocated to themselves political spheres of influence which would serve, as occasion offered, as a pretext for, and even as a right to, annexation.

The élite of the Turkish nation did not remain indifferent to this policy of humiliation and dismemberment, and the Young Turk movement grew larger and larger, and gathered in its ranks even far-away masses of the population. At the same time, while European Chancelleries prepared plans of partition, Turkish schools were turning out generations of young men inspired with Western ideas, and deeply sensible of the unhappy condition of their country. In spite of an exterior opposition, reforms in public education had borne fruit, and had spread throughout the country the ideals of patriotism and liberty. The progress realised in education was even reflected in the Turkish language, which became thoroughly purified and, endowed with a scientific and technical vocabulary, developed into a more perfect instrument of expression, by which the same precision and shades of meaning and the different manifestations of human thought could be manifested.

This spirit of change was closely allied to a new conception of patriotism, which manifested itself during the period that followed the European conferences of Muersteg and Reval. These conferences, at which the partition of Turkey was agreed upon, had the effect of precipitating the revolution of 1908, which put an end to the policy of absolutism that Midhat Pasha had tried, unsuccessfully, to suppress some thirty-five years before. On this occasion also Europe, as if impelled by an implacable mistrust, saw fit to oppose the movement, which aimed at the regeneration of Turkey. A few weeks later Austria-Hungary, whose only motive was to put difficulties in the way of the new régime, declared her intention of annexing Bosnia-Herzegovina. Simultaneously Bulgaria proclaimed her independence, thus severing herself completely from Turkey, and at the same time upsetting the Balkan status quo. The Albanian insurrections inspired by Austria and the Kurd revolutions inspired by Russia then began. The landing of the Italians in Tripoli followed closely on the heels of these events, which had already paved the way for the coalition and for the Balkan War.

While laying at the door of outside influence blame for what has occurred, there is no doubt that a portion of the responsibility devolves upon the Turkish Government; but it is equally true that the responsibility is, to a great extent, shared by other European Powers. It is only when this fact comes to be recognised that friendly relations, so vital to all nations concerned, can become an accomplished fact.

In 1914, Turkey, unhappily, was not able to escape the whirlwind which dragged nearly the whole world into a catastrophe, from the effects of which she is still suffering. It is not possible within the legitimate limits of this article to deal with the political circumstances which involved Turkey in the struggle, for the question is not so simple as it appears, and its causes reach back even further than the last decade. The fact remains that Turkey became involved in the Great War, with consequences so disastrous for herself.

On the other hand, in spite of continuous fighting, intellectual intercourse with Europe had made great strides; and thousands of Young Turks were enabled to profit by a Western University education. In this way the number of intelligent Turks, conscious of the needs of their country and imbued with modern ideas of progress, was growing steadily day by day.

This is a rapid survey of the original causes of the Nationalist movement.

Egypt.

The Outlook of March 17 contains an article on "The Egyptian Deadlock," in which is discussed the possibility of a return of Zaghloul Pasha. It agrees that the only way to restore the Egyptian situation is to let Zaghloul Pasha return and form a native ministry, but argues that this has not been done because "we have to look ahead." After expanding on the generous treatment we have offered "to a people who have not governed themselves since the days of Julius Caesar," it states that Egypt has, through Zaghloul Pasha, refused our terms "by laying claim to the Sudan and by failing to provide compensation for the British officials who will lose their posts." And on these two points we cannot, whatever happens, give way. Notwithstanding, "Egypt's future does seem to lie upon the knees of Zaghloul." He may change his mind, as he has changed it already. By such an orientation he would lose little, because in Egypt it is personalities and not politics that count. Hence the conclusion:—

We are not without hope that Zaghloul Pasha may presently come to see that his own interests, not less than Egypt's, are bound up with an early restoration of normal government, and that this can only be obtained by a frank and full acceptance of the Treaty terms. Half a loaf is better than no bread, even this Treaty is better, from the Nationalist point of view, than continued martial law. But he should make no mistake about one point: there is no other alternative.

In the Star of March 14 is an interesting article on "Anglo-Americanism in Egypt."

written by Charles Thomas Halbrian. The writer of this article remarks that it is not generally realised how much we owe to America for our residence in Egypt. When, he says, England was standing irresolute after she had defeated Arabia in 1882, America advised her to stay and keep order. "Go the whole hog," was the American injunction. And when, says this writer, Roosevelt in 1910 told Great Britain to govern Egypt with a firm hand or get out, he was only being consistent with the whole American attitude towards the Nile experiment. He submits that there has over Egypt, as there has not in other matters, been "a true Anglo-American understanding."

The Future of Yugoslavia.

Commenting on the results of the recent Yugoslav General Election, the Manchester Guardian of March 20 says that political confusion is now worse confounded. Yugoslavia, it states, is rent within itself, and the election returns do not help matters in the least. The Radicals have no absolute majority even in combination with the Democrats, who are now more than ever opposed to the Serb hegemony of M. Pashitch. It speculates thus on what will happen:—

Some alarming whispers are current suggesting an attempt at a non-Parliamentary Radical dictatorship. But that is what the Government has in reality hitherto been. Should M. Raditch, whose Croat party now numbers almost seventy strong, be able to produce some kind of heterogeneous coalition, the results would be most important in Balkan politics, for Yugoslavia would then definitely join hands with Bulgaria as a "green"-peasant State, and the Pan-South Slav dreams of M. Stamboulsky might be realised.

YEMEN AND ITS PEOPLE.

Lectures on "Yemen and Its People" have recently been given in London by Lieut.-Colonel H. F. Jacob, C.S.I.—on February 22, under the auspices of the London Moslem League, at 74, Grosvenor Street, and on March 19, before the Near and Middle East Association. Colonel Jacob, who was at one time Acting Resident at Aden, and was Political Officer to the Aden Field Force during the war, gave an interesting account of Arab life and Arab characteristics, illustrating his remarks with numerous lantern slides.

He traced our earliest political nexus with the Yemen, dating from 1799 A.D. at a time when Napoleon had invaded Egypt, and went on to describe the capture of Aden, "The Eye of the Yemen," by Commander Haines, of the Indian Navy, in 1839. Haines' régime, that of the first British Political Agent in Aden, lasted till 1854, when he was treated with ignominy by the Bombay Government, died and was buried in a Bombay cemetery.

Colonel Jacob dealt with the Turkish régime in the Yemen, and he declared that their policy of "divide and rule" was a damnum hereditas thrust upon the Turks by the exigency of events, and was the result of factions amongst the Arabs themselves. He compared the situation in the Yemen with what confronted the British in India, where the various creeds compelled us to adopt a similar policy. He was opposed to "mandates" and "spheres of influence" as dangerous and costly toys, and advocated the expediency of letting the Arabs alone to work out their own salvation—after the exit of the Turks, who, at any rate, in their Yemen Province, were almost universally popular—not so much owing to their administrative measures, as because the Khalif of Islam was a Turk. The lecturer dealt with the Arabs' craving for gold, which prompted them to court the British Government. The Turks, better than any other Power, understood the Arab mentality. He derided the pretensions of King Hussein of the Hejaz to the leadership of the Arab nation, and asserted that there were yet others who affected the style of Amir Al Muminin, whose claims were no less cogent than King Hussein's.

The Yemen had nothing in common with the Hejaz, and did not recognise King Hussein's suzerainty. Colonel Jacob showed some three dozen slides of the Yemen, and related many anecdotes illustrative of the Arab's character and genius. Finally he touched on the vast potentialities of trade in the Yemen and advocated private enterprise unhampered by Government interference, which spelled trade paralysis.

THE LAUSANNE DRAFT TREATY.

As Turkish objection to the draft Treaty submitted at Lausanne is likely to concentrate mainly on the economic clauses, we give below the text of some of the clauses in dispute. The proposal submitted by the Turks is that this section should be separated from the rest of the Treaty, and be reserved for subsequent discussion.

Article 1.—From the coming into force of the present Convention, the commercial régime arising from the Capitulations as well as from the Convention of April 25, 1907, revised on April 23, 1911, is abrogated between Turkey and the other contracting Powers.

Article 2.—From the coming into force of the present Convention, the tariffs applicable on the importation into Turkey of the produce of manufactures originating and emanating from the territories of the other contracting countries should be those of the Ottoman specific tariff which came into operation on September 1, 1916, payable in Turkish money.

Article 3.—The co-efficients of increase applicable to the duties prescribed by the tariff of 1916 in paper money, should be those which were in force on December 15, 1922. Nevertheless, the articles the importation of which was prohibited on that date or which were submitted to a co-efficient greater than 12, should be subjected to that co-efficient. Articles set out in the annexed schedule should be submitted to the co-efficient of eight. (Provision is made for corrections in the rate according to fluctuations in exchange.)

Article 4.—Turkey undertakes to abolish from the coming into force of the present Convention, and not to re-establish during its continuance, all prohibitions of import and export, except those which may be necessary:—

- (1) To maintain the resources indispensable for the victualling and the economic activity of the nation;
- (2) To ensure the security of the State;
- (3) To protect persons, animals, and plants against contagious diseases, epizooties, and epiphytes;
- (4) To prevent the use of opium and other poisons;
- (5) To prohibit the import of alcoholic products, the use of which is forbidden in the country;
- (6) To prevent the export of gold money or gold metal.

Subject to equitable reciprocity being accorded to her by each of the other contracting Powers in accordance with its legislation, Turkey undertakes to apply the prohibitions without discrimination of any kind, and in the event of her granting exemptions or licences in respect of prohibited produce, not to favour in any way the trade of any contracting Power or of any other Power to the prejudice of the trade of any contracting Power.

Article 5.—No excise, consumption, octroi, or any other duty or tax, internal or local, shall be applicable in Turkey to goods originating or emanating from the other contracting countries, except to the extent to which it is exacted in respect of identical and similar articles of which there is a substantial production in Turkey.

Nevertheless, Turkey may continue to exact, under the same conditions of equality between her nationals and the nationals of other contracting countries, the consumption duties in respect of the produce set out in schedule 2.

Article 6.—Subject to an equitable reciprocity being accorded to Turkey by each of the other contracting Powers in accordance with its legislation, every export duty which Turkey may have imposed or may impose on any goods, natural or manufactured, should be applied equally whatever the country of destination. No discrimination to the prejudice of the commerce of any one of the contracting Powers should be established by any means, direct or indirect, or by any sur-tax or exemptions of any nature, or under any name whatsoever.

Article 7.—The benefit of the provisions of Articles 2 to 6 above is granted in Turkey for a period of five* years from the coming into force of the present Convention to each of the contracting Powers, who will further benefit from any more favourable treatment in respect of the matters referred to in the said articles which Turkey may grant to any other country, whether by virtue of previous conventions or of new measures and conventions, except such advantages as regards tariffs or generally in regard to commercial matters which Turkey may grant to any one of the territories detached from Turkey by virtue of the Treaty of Peace of even date.

Article 8.—The benefit of the provisions of Articles 2 to 7 above cannot be claimed by any of the contracting Powers which does not grant to Turkey during the same period of five* years a treatment as favourable as that which it can grant to other foreign countries in accordance with the terms of its legislation.

Article 9.—The provisions of this section remain in force for a period of five* years. At the request of any other contracting Power, made before the expiration of this period, Turkey undertakes to begin at any time, and actively to proceed with negotiations for the conclusion of Treaties of Commerce. These treaties will be concluded without infringing the equitable treatment of commerce provided for by Article 23 (e) of the Covenant of the League of Nations.

(Two annexes to this section give a list of articles subject to the co-efficient 8 and specify the consumption taxes).

Article 10.—Turkey undertakes, on condition that reciprocity is accorded in this matter, to grant to the ships of the other contracting Powers a treatment equal to that which she accords to national ships, or any more favourable treatment that she grants or may grant to the ships of any other Power.

The right of the high contracting parties is expressly recognised of reserving to the national flag, fishing, maritime cabotage, that is to say, transport by sea of goods embarked in a port of one national territory for another port in the same territory and port services, that is to say, towage, pilotage, and all interior services of whatever nature they may be.

If Turkey reserves for her national flag maritime cabotage and fishing, she may, nevertheless, in this respect grant special treatment to the flag of any one of the territories detached from Turkey by the Treaty of even date, without the benefit of this treatment being able to be claimed by other flags.

As a transitory provision Turkey will permit for a period of five years the transport of goods and passengers from one Turkish port to another Turkish port by undertakings of other contracting States which do not confine themselves exclusively to this traffic.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN RIVALRY IN THE NEAR AND MIDDLE EAST.

On March 19 Mr. Francis H. Skrine delivered a lecture at King's College, Strand, on the southward and eastward expansion of Russia. He ascribed her advance in Central Asia to a craving for ice-free waters. European Russia, with a pre-war population of 133,000,000, did not possess a single open port during the long northern winter. Constantinople was her main objective, but the southern line of expansion was barred to her by the issues of the Crimean War and the Berlin Congress. Foiled in that direction, Russia sought access to the Pacific littoral by spanning Siberia with a railway. Her Asiatic policy was misconstrued by Russophobes as indicating designs against British India; but Russia had no desire to assume responsibility of governing a population of 300 millions who were ever on the verge of pestilence or famine. Her conquest of the Central Asian Khanates was inspired by a wish to bring a counter-irritant to bear on a Power which had checkmated her for thirty years. While the Berlin Congress of 1878 was actually sitting Alexander II. sent a mission to Kabul, which persuaded the Sultan Amir to place his territories under Russian protection, thus originating the second Afghan war. In 1885 we were brought to the verge of a death-struggle with Russia by our interference in a trivial boundary dispute with Afghanistan. Nineteen years later we formed an alliance with a yellow race, which was the direct cause of the Russo-Japanese war of 1904-5. During its throes a squadron under Admiral Rozhdestvenski, on its way to succour the beleaguered garrison of Port Arthur, mistook some British trawlers fishing on the Dogger Bank for Japanese destroyers, and sent them to the bottom. Mr. Skrine thus related an episode of the fatal errand, which had not appeared in print:—"England rang with indignation at the supposed 'outrage,' and nearly every organ of public opinion clamoured for war. The Cabinet demanded an instant apology from Russia, and orders were cabled to Admiral Lord Charles Beresford, commanding the Mediterranean Fleet, to rendezvous in Vigo Bay, which the Russian ships were bound to pass, and there await further instructions. After waiting for an answer from St. Petersburg for twenty-four hours, the Admiralty wired Lord Charles Beresford, through the British Consul at Vigo, that Rozhdestvenski's squadron was to be intercepted. The Consul happened to be of Russian birth; in the interests of his country he kept the message back until a second came, announcing that the incident had been settled. Meantime, the Russian ships steamed past our own, which had prepared for action. One trembles to think of the consequences which would have followed a war with Russia and her ally, France, in 1905."

The most case-hardened Russophobe would admit that the Soviet Republic could not be a factor in Central Asian politics for many years to come. Afghanistan, however, was an oasis in the desert created by Bolshevism; and its progressive Government might well become the nucleus of a great Asiatic empire. It behoved Great Britain to handle the new situation with far greater tact and foresight than had been apparent in the past. Hatred and suspicion were evil counsellors: they had kept two Great Powers at daggers drawn where interests in Asia were identical, and had reduced British prestige in the Middle East to vanishing point.

After the lecture Sir Percy Sykes emphasised the lecturer's contention that a permanent alliance was impossible between the atheists of Moscow and Islam. Already, in fact, the East was beginning to suspect the Soviet Government, and with the non-delivery of presents from Russia the Amir of Afghanistan was commencing to think that the British were not so bad a race after all. The situation, he said, both in Afghanistan and in Central Asia was decidedly improving. Sir Percy also spoke on Persia, and stated that though the situation there had been handled with unfortunate results, the intentions of Great Britain had always been perfectly honest. Mr. Brayley Hodgetts also spoke on Russo-Turkish relations, and expanded one or two intimate points of Russian history which the lecturer had made.

A meeting attended by Serbian, Roumanian, Greek, Turkish, and Bulgarian Communists was held in Sofia on March 19.

It is officially announced in Athens that eight officers and 228 men of the Greek Navy were drowned when the leave tug Alexander sank in a squall outside the Piræus on March 10.

"Gandhi Day"—a day of mourning in commemoration of Mr. Gandhi's imprisonment—was observed peacefully in India on March 18 by adherents of the Indian National Congress.

NOTES AND NEWS.

London, Tuesday morning.

Turkey's Financial Position.

It is a noteworthy fact that, despite the exhausting strain of long years of war and defeat, Turkey's financial position is relatively favourable compared to that of many other countries who participated in the war. This is because inflation was only pursued to a very limited extent. In an article which will be found on page 328, our Constantinople Correspondent describes in detail the issues of paper currency made by Turkey since 1914. There were seven in all, of a total value of no more than, roughly, £T167,000,000—no very serious matter for a State with potential resources such as Turkey's. Of these issues only the first had solid backing, gold being deposited by Germany against it, German Treasury Bills being the guarantee for the remainder. How it was that Turkey did not resort to the issue of paper to a greater extent to finance her war expenditure is a matter for argument. One reason that doubtless had much to do with it is the innate reluctance of the population to use paper. The average countryman in Turkey has a very strong preference for coin, and it is impossible in a country like Turkey to overcome the scruples of the inhabitants in times of crises (or at any other time) by the methods of publicity adopted by European countries when they go to war.

Prospects of Rapid Recovery.

If the Turkish authorities had gone in for the issuing of paper money on a really extensive scale since 1914 the position of the country financially would be next door to hopeless. At it is, so far from being bankrupt, Turkey is so situated that it should take but a few years under favourable conditions to recover the ground that has been lost as a result of the war. It will not have escaped notice that while the exchanges of the other Near Eastern countries show a heavy depreciation, the Turkish exchange stands at a relatively small depreciation. It is not an unsatisfactory index of the position. Further, it may be pointed out that our neighbours across the water would not be showing the anxiety they are to obtain concessions if they were dealing with a State seriously situated from the financial standpoint. From our point of view it is most unfortunate that conditions should have given the Americans an open field for the time being as regards concessions, but, despite all the reports that have come from Turkey, it would seem probable that nothing has yet been arranged, and if, as is very possible, the Turks are waiting to see what the Allies will do before coming to any arrangement, it may be that we shall yet have our full say in regard to anything that is going.

Trade with Irak.

The case for the British connection with Irak was ably set forth at the general meeting of the Eastern Bank by Mr. Haskell, the chairman of that institution. There has been, as Mr. Haskell so aptly pointed out, "some disposition to minimise the important trade interests involved and the potentialities of the country, and to make it out as a sort of wilderness, of no use or benefit to Great Britain." Mr. Haskell quoted a few figures to show the "insignificance" of these trade interests. In 1921 the total trade, excluding imports for the military Government departments, and the railways, amounted to £25,200,000. "Practically all this valuable trade," he said, "is in British hands, financed by British banks, insured with British companies, and transported by British ships, and under a sound, stable Government it is capable of material expansion. I know of no part of the world where Great Britain is so well placed, and the loss of this by no means insignificant trade will not be without effect on British industries and the problem of unemployment at home." Mr. Haskell uttered a grave warning against the idea that even if we leave Mesopotamia it will not make any marked difference to our external trade. "Whatever may have been the case during the Turkish régime," he declared, "there is little doubt that in the event of the retirement of Great Britain, chaotic conditions will prevail for many years to come, until some sort of a government is firmly established. Meanwhile, with the roads and communications unsafe, trade will become almost impossible, not only locally, but the traffic with the north of Persia, whose markets are chiefly supplied through Baghdad, will be seriously jeopardised." It would be well if those who have given Great Britain such a distorted view of Irak would bear these things in mind.

The Coming Zagreb Fair.

The Zagreb Sample Fair is to be held from April 22 to May 1, and the exhibits will include metal, textiles, timber, chemical manure, paper, clothing, furs, etc. Exhibits will be free from Customs duty, but importers will have to declare the goods as destined for the fair, and deposit with the Customs authorities the amount of the duty, which will be returned when the goods are re-exported. The deposit can be in the form of Yugoslav currency, State bonds, or a letter of credit on one of the banks in Yugoslavia. Exhibitors will have the advantage of reduced fares in Yugoslavia, and reduced passport fees. The fair affords an excellent opportunity of obtaining a foothold in the Yugoslav market, and I hope British firms will not be backward in taking advantage of it. It may help them to a decision to know that French, German, Czecho-Slovakian, and Austrian firms will be exhibiting. I shall be glad to give further information to firms on application.

TURKISH PAPER MONEY ISSUES.

Constantinople, March 20.

An interesting controversy has been going on for some time past on the subject of the repayment of the first issue of Turkish paper money at its face value in gold. When this issue was made on March 30, 1915, its equivalent in gold was deposited by Germany with the Ottoman Public Debt, which gold was subsequently sequestered by the Allies on their occupation of the country. Subsequent issues of Turkish paper money—and there have been seven issues in all—were covered by their equivalent in German Treasury Bonds being deposited with the Debt Administration. The German Treasury Bonds are naturally of no value to-day other than as constituting a war claim against Germany. For the information of readers of THE NEAR EAST I append at the foot of this letter a statement showing the details of the various issues and the total sum, amounting to 167 million odd Turkish pounds, for which Turkey to-day is liable on account of her paper issue.

Now, one peculiarity about the Turkish currency notes is that at the back of each note appears the following guarantee, written in Turkish characters :

An amount equal to this issue of paper currency has been deposited with the Ottoman Public Debt Administration, and it has been guaranteed by that Administration that the paper currency will be withdrawn from circulation in exchange for gold. The exchange will commence after the signing of peace.

For the Board of Administration of the Ottoman Public Debt, Signed _____, President.

The period—left blank in the above quotation—varies according to the particular issue. Thus the repayment of the first issue (covered by gold deposited with the Debt) was “guaranteed” to commence six months after the signing of peace; that of the second and third issues one year after; the fourth issue “two years after the signature of peace, in five equal annuities”; the fifth, sixth, and seventh issues are to be redeemed in the same way—in gold—in four annuities, commencing from the date of settlement of the fourth issue.

The holders of the first issue notes claim that that issue, having been covered by a definite deposit of gold under the guarantee of the Public Debt to repay in gold, they are entitled to that repayment in gold six months after the signing of peace. In consequence of this, and based on such chances that may exist of their claim succeeding, there has been for some time past a regular market and no little speculation in this particular issue, and the market price has varied within the last few months from 160 piastres for £T1 to 103 piastres per £T, which is roughly the present price.

Meetings of holders have been held from time to time to decide on ways and means for furthering their claims, and an unsuccessful attempt was also made to get the matter decided in their favour at the Lausanne Conference. The Public Debt have rather naturally maintained, up to the present, that they cannot recognise the claim, and that the gold deposited with them as cover for this issue was taken from them under force majeure. The controversy is an interesting one, though one would hardly imagine that the chances of success for the holders are such as to give much cause for optimism.

The following are the various issues of Turkish paper currency:—1. 1915, £T6,519,139; 2. 1915, £T7,902,000; 3. 1915, £T11,700,400; 4. 1916, £T74,399,600; 5. 1916, £T31,999,999.60; 6. 1917, £T32,000,000; 7. 1918, £T2,499,925; giving a total of £T167,021,063.60, the whole of which was issued by the Government of the time on the guarantee of the Ottoman Public Debt.

ROUMANIAN NOTES.

Bucharest, March 12.

Protest Against Petroleum Regulations.

The new regulations governing the sale and export of petroleum products have called forth a joint protest from about thirty of the petroleum companies addressed to the Government in a letter dated February 7, and published in the Moniteur du Petrole Roumain. These regulations fix the percentage of petroleum products which must be devoted to the needs of the home market, and also the prices at which these must be sold. This percentage amounts to about two-thirds of the total production, and the companies complain that the prices fixed are so low as to allow of almost no profit to them, leaving them dependent for the further development of their industry on the profits realised from the one-third exported. The companies further urge that, in order to stimulate production, the percentage required for home consumption ought to be revised in periods of, say, three months, as the potential increase of the demand for the home market will be much less than in the potential increase of production. They state that they sympathise with the object of the Government in keeping down the price of petroleum in the country, but they think it unjust that their industry, which forms one of the greatest sources of wealth of Roumania, should be penalised and handicapped to such a degree as to impede its natural development and crush all spirit of enterprise. The reply of the Government has not yet been published.

Unfavourable Agricultural Outlook.

The heavy snow that has fallen might have been a great boon had it not begun so early in the year as to interfere with the autumn sowings, which it is feared are much below the average, even for the last three years. The heavy rains which have followed the snow now threaten to destroy the seed in the ground unless fine weather sets in before long. It must be hoped that this will be the case and that the agriculturists will be able to make extensive spring sowings compensate for the small winter crops. The latest published statistics give evidence of a tendency to diminution of the area sown in wheat and rye, and this is accounted for by the fact that the Government continue to control both the internal and export prices for these grains. A considerable increase in the production and export of uncontrolled grains, such as barley and oats, has been the natural result of this policy, and, unless the Government realises the danger, Roumania, in spite of her potential agricultural wealth, may soon be in the position of producing less wheat than is required to provide bread for her own population. Some attempt has indeed been made to stimulate the growing of wheat—e.g., by the offering of a small bonus for every hundred hectares sown with this grain, and other slight advantages to wheat growers, but these are all so small and are administered in such a way that they are not likely to prove of much avail.

COMPANY NOTES AND REPORTS.

Chartered Bank of India.

The net profit of the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China for 1922, after providing for all bad and doubtful debts, was £1,004,701 4s. 5d., inclusive of £215,169 15s. 5d. brought forward from the previous year. The interim dividend at the rate of 14 per cent. per annum paid in September last absorbed £210,000. The amount now available is therefore £794,701 4s. 5d., and the directors propose to pay a final dividend at the rate of 14 per cent. per annum, together with a bonus of 6s. 3d. per share, making 20½ per cent. per annum for the whole year, free of income-tax; to add £100,000 to the reserve fund, which will then stand at £3,800,000; to add £25,000 to the officers' superannuation fund; to write off premises account £50,000, and to carry forward the balance of £222,201 4s. 5d. Meeting, 38, Bishopsgate, E.C., April 4, 2 p.m.

National Bank of Egypt.

The report of the National Bank of Egypt for the year ended December 31, states that the gross profit for the year, after providing for depreciation on the bank's buildings and furniture, for rebate of discount, and for bad and doubtful debts, amounts to £906,869 15s. 7d. After deducting from this sum, for directors' fees £11,936 14s. 4d., for current expenses £392,839 5s. 1d.—£404,775 19s. 5d.—there remains £502,093 16s. 2d. In conformity with article 49 of the bank's statutes a dividend of 4 per cent. is payable on the share capital, £120,000. After this statutory distribution there remains £382,093 16s. 2d.; adding to this the balance brought forward from last year (£180,920 2s. 5d.) the amount available is £563,013 18s. 7d. The directors consider it prudent to allocate to special reserve for contingencies a sum of £50,000, which leaves £513,013 18s. 7d. From this amount the directors recommend the payment of an additional dividend of 11 per cent. on the share capital, which will absorb £330,000, and leave a balance to be carried forward of £183,013 18s. 7d. The total dividend for the year will thus be at the rate of 15 per cent., equivalent to £1 10s. per share. An interim dividend of 8s. having been paid on September 4, the balance remaining to be distributed will be £1 2s. per share.

National Bank of India.

The report of the National Bank of India for the year ended December 31 states that the net profits for the year, after providing for all bad and doubtful debts, amount to £535,160 5s. 5d., and adding £164,095 12s. 8d. brought forward, the available total is £699,255 18s. 1d. An ad interim dividend at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum, free of income-tax, was paid on September 19 last, amounting to £200,000. The directors now recommend a further dividend at the same rate, and an addition of £100,000 to the reserve fund, raising it to £2,700,000. They propose to write £20,000 off house property account and to add £20,000 to the officers' pension fund, leaving a balance of £159,255 18s. 1d. to be carried forward. Meeting, Wesleyan Hall, Bishopsgate, E.C., April 4, 12 noon.

A provisional arrangement regulating commercial relations on a reciprocal most-favoured-nation basis has been concluded between Roumania and Sweden.

The new Roumanian oil export tariff came into force on March 1. All export taxes are to be collected in sound currencies, sterling being the basis of calculation. The tariff is as follows, per wagon (10,000 kilos.):—Light benzine, 5,000 lei; heavy benzine, 4,000; motorina, 4,000; refined lamp oil 1,500; light oils, 6,000; heavy oils, 10,000; paraffin, 20,000.

Sugar.—Home refined has continued in fair demand. Tate's cubes have come to business at 66s. 9d., at which they are unchanged; Lyle's granulated has been done at 61s. 3d., the same as before; while London granulated is unaltered at 61s. Foreign descriptions have been steady. West Indian crystallised has gained 3d. at 55s. 3d., white Mauritius is unchanged at 56s. 6d., while white Java remains at 58s. 6d. Futures are:—August, 31s. 6d.

Coffee.—The spot market has been quiet, but firm. East Indian is unchanged at 112s., Costa Rica is 2s. up at 106s., while Nairobi at 93s. shows a gain of 3s. Futures are:—May, 58s. 6d.; July, 58s.

Rice.—A firm tone has prevailed, and prices in some cases are higher. Spanish-Japan has again been in strong request; while American Java is now 6d. dearer.

Green Fruit.—The strength of the market noted last week has been almost maintained, although very large supplies are available at the moment. The way in which the demand is keeping pace with supply is very striking. Quotations are:—Jaffas, 20s. box (144's); Denias and Valencias, 14s. 6d. to 45s. box (240's to 504's). Lemons have been a weak market owing to the supplies now being in excess of the demand. Quotations are:—10s. to 16s. box (300's); 18s. 6d. to 35s. case (300's). Apples have continued in good request. The demand for onions has decreased, and the market has been rather weak.

Dried Fruit.—Good business has again been done in almost every variety. Currants have been in special request, and prices are higher. Sultanias have moved off very freely, and the market for this commodity is very firm. Bosnian plums continue to be in strong demand, and the growth of the market for this commodity should greatly encourage the cultivators. Figs have been a good spot, and the market is again harder.

Oilseeds.—Linseed has been firm. Indian is 1½d. up at 20s. 4½d., while La Plata at 18s. 9d. shows a rise of 7½d. Rapeseed has been variable: Toria has gained 6d. at 19s. 1½d., while real bold Ferozepore is 1½d. down at 17s. 6d. Cottonseed has been fairly steady. Indian is unchanged at 9s. 3d., Egyptian black has gained 4½d. at 12s. 1½d., while Sakellaridis is 3d. lower at 11s. 4½d.

Refined common edible is unaltered at 44s., Egyptian crude is unchanged at 39s., technical remains at 41s., while deodorised is the same at 46s.

Oil Cakes.—The market has continued weak. Linseed cake has shed 5s. at 255s., cotton meal cake is 5s. lower at 245s., coconut cake at 175s. is 5s. down, while cottonseed cake is 5s. lower at 135s.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Improvement Maintained.

The Commercial Co. of Egypt, in their report for the week ended March 16, state:—

Since our last report the futures market has more than maintained last week's improvement, although it has not been as active; in fact, Ashmouni contracts have been dealt in very little. Prices for American cotton have been maintained very high, and in consequence the attention of spinners has again been attracted to our cotton, the supplies of which are still fairly ample and prices comparatively cheaper. In view of the depressed state of trade in all countries the turnover of business has not been very large, nevertheless this has sufficed to keep the market steady and nullify the depression which the heavy daily arrivals from the interior would otherwise have produced. The difference between Sakellaridis and Ashmouni has slightly widened, and, taking as basis May Sakellaridis and April Ashmouni, is now $3.20 as against $3.02 a week ago. The cotton exports for the first fortnight of March have amounted to about 50,000 bales, and the stock in Alexandria stands now at 2,050,000 kantars, i.e., about 220,000 kantars less than at the same date last year; an important point to notice is that from this time last year to the end of the season about one million kantars were received from the interior, whereas only one-quarter of a million is expected this year.

Spot.—Total sales amount this week to about 12,700 bales, of which we estimate 9,000 bales Sakellaridis, 3,500 bales Uppers, 100 bales White, and 100 bales Brown.

Sakellaridis.—The bulk of the demand has been concentrated on the better grades, Fully Good Fair to Good and Good, with a resultant stiffening in the premiums asked. Staple cottons in these grades are not too plentiful, and consequently obtain better prices. A fair business has been done in the medium grades, and the scarcity of these grades on the market has caused holders to be reluctant to part with their cotton except at good prices. Some low-grade cotton has changed hands, but here also the reduction of stocks available for sale has affected the price.

Uppers.—This variety has been somewhat neglected during the week, but all grades have been dealt in a small degree. The price of spot in relation to futures still remains unchanged.

Brown and White.—There is still a good deal of inquiry for these varieties, especially the latter, but stocks are now almost exhausted.

Crop, 1923.—Reports from our interior correspondents indicate that the preparation of the land is, on the average, proceeding normally, but the germination of the seed already sown is rather below normal.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Inquiry Still Good.

The inquiry for Egyptian has again been good without any marked increase in the volume of business put through, which remains at much the same figure as in the previous week. The only feature has been a distinct falling off in the demand for low cottons, by which we mean cotton for which less than 15.00d. has been asked, and the corresponding lift of the general inquiry in an upward direction. This movement has been in progress for some weeks, but so slowly as hardly to be perceptible at times. Generally speaking, the conditions ruling to-day are unchanged from last week, though on balance an all-round increase of 10 points has been registered in prices. At one time a considerable hardening in values was noticeable, and buyers were keen, but a break in futures upset things yesterday, and the easier basis, far from tempting spinners to come in and fill their requirements, has had the usual effect of making them shy.

In Sakellaridis most of the business has been done at from 17½d.—18½d., whilst in Uppers 17d. to 17½d. cotton is still in good request, the latter figure representing the maximum which spinners are prepared to pay. There is a good outlet here for F.G.F. Uppers, but fancy prices are not being paid, and the cotton changing hands is generally sold well below quoted prices. Very little business has been done in brown, Tokar, Pilcon, and white cotton. C.i.f. business remains almost stagnant. Forwardings to spinners for the week ended 16th inst. were returned as 6,914 bales. Total sales estimated at 3,500 bales (includes 400 Sudan). Quotations are advanced 10 points all round. F.G.F. Sakellaridis to-day 18.00d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Market Depressed.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended March 24 states:—

In no section of the market can any improvement be noted during the past week, and conditions all round remain extremely dull. Doubtless the set-back in American quotations has tended to accentuate the general depression. Discussion on the new measure to prevent sales of yarn at under cost continues, but the opinion is expressed in some quarters that more is to be hoped for from a settlement of troubles between France and Germany than from any policy of restriction of output.

Yarn.—There has been very little inquiry, and the policy of not selling below cost is beginning to be put to the test. It is obvious that the costs of the individual mills must necessarily vary according to their particular circumstances, and it is difficult to see how a definite basis can be found which would be acceptable to all.

Cloth.—Purchases have been very limited throughout the week, and salesmen are reported to have had a more than usually quiet time. The Far East gives hardly any support. Egypt is taking very little, and the inquiries from the Levant are no bigger than might be expected in view of the unsettled conditions still prevailing. Some slight improvement is, however, reported in the home trade, as stocks on hand are said to have reached an extremely low level.

Raw Cotton.—There has been a decided change of sentiment in this market. Prices have broken in New York, and one hears doubts expressed as to whether we shall not see a continuance of the downward movement. It is pretty generally accepted that operators in New York have raised the price to a figure which is not justified by the trade demand for the staple, though it certainly looks as if the statistical position is against any heavy surplus of supplies. Closing prices are as follows:—American fully middling, 16.18d.; Egyptian fully good fair, 18.00d.

DEMAND FOR BRITISH CHEMICALS IN CZECHO-SLOVAKIA.

The Commercial Secretary at Prague reports that up to the present no falling off in the imports of chemicals from Germany has been noticeable, but there is no doubt that, owing to the rapid increase in prices of all German chemicals and to the difficulty which importers anticipate experiencing in obtaining delivery of goods, an increased demand is likely to arise for the following British chemicals:—Coal-tar and its derivatives, resin, cresines and petroleum jelly, refined yellow and white beeswax, oils for perfumes, soapmakers and for medicinal purposes, pharmaceutical products, photographic chemicals, raw materials for the chemical industry.

The Commercial Secretary has also furnished (1) the names and addresses of agents who might suitably represent British firms of chemical manufacturers, and (2) a list of the most important Czecho-Slovak importers of chemicals. Copies of these lists may be obtained by United Kingdom firms upon application to the Department of Overseas Trade.

CZECHO-SLOVAK SUGAR.

The amount of sugar in Czecho-Slovakia as yet unsold and available for export is estimated at 750,000 to 1,000,000 tons, more than half of which is from the Bohemian factories, the rest from Moravia and Silesia. According to the Narodni Listy the sugar tax and tax on turnover has produced in the first five months of the present season some 125 million crowns. The area under beetroot cultivation is to be considerably increased this year. Czecho-Slovakia is, with the exception of Germany, the largest producer of beet sugar of all European countries.

The main dimensions of the vessel are: Length, overall, 450 ft. 9 in.; breadth, extreme, 57 ft. 5 in.; and depth, moulded to upper deck, 32 ft. 10 in.; with a deadweight of about 10,600 tons. The approximate gross tonnage is 6,600. The double-bottom tanks are arranged for the carriage of oil fuel, and steam pipes are fitted round the tank suction to liquify the heavy oil. The vessel is of the two-deck type, with bridge and fore-castle decks combined and poop. Up-to-date arrangements are provided for handling cargo, 12 winches and 16 derricks being fitted for the purpose. Spacious accommodation is provided in steel houses on the bridge deck for the officers and engineers, the captain being accommodated in a steel house above. The steering gear, of the Wilson-Pirie type, is placed in a large steel house on the poop deck, and is worked by telemotor from the navigating bridge. The vessel is to be installed with electric light throughout by the builders.

The propelling machinery, made by the Central Marine Engine Works of the builders, consists of a set of triple expansion engines with cylinders 26 in., 45 in., 78 in. diameter by 54 in. stroke, and three large boilers adapted for a working pressure of 250 lb. per sq. in., and fitted with Howden's system of forced draught. Company Meetings.

THE EASTERN BANK.

Trade in Mesopotamia.

The thirteenth annual general meeting of the Eastern Bank, Ltd., was held on March 21 at Cannon Street Hotel, E.C. Mr. J. S. Haskell, the chairman, presided.

The Secretary (Mr. R. Carter) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman said: When I last had the pleasure of addressing you, I alluded to the difficulties experienced during the year; the period under review has been hardly less free from the complexities that beset us then. In India for the greater part of the year money could not be profitably employed, and the rupee, after dropping heavily, remained practically without movement for several consecutive months. Though this may be regarded as a good feature from the trader's point of view, it has hardly given the opportunity for profitable exchange operations; consequently, with a smaller turnover and strong competition, the profits from that source have been much reduced. Under the circumstances, I hope you will agree with me that the results for 1922, as shown by the accounts, are not unsatisfactory.

After making ample provision for all bad and doubtful debts, we are enabled to recommend the same dividend as last year, viz., 5s. for the six months, less tax at 3s. 9d. in the £, after allowing for relief in respect of Indian taxation, making with the interim dividend of 4s. paid last October 9 per cent. for the year, less tax; to carry to reserve £20,000 and to premises account £10,000. The last two items are less than the preceding year, but reduced profits have been, generally speaking, common with banking institutions in consequence of the contraction of business, and more particularly with the countries with which we are principally concerned.

Though, broadly speaking, conditions have not been favourable, there have been one or two good features which should sooner or later conduce to greater trade activity. The monsoon in India with which the prosperity of the country is intimately bound has again proved a favourable one; the last harvest was abundant, and there are good crops in sight making available for export a large surplus of foodstuffs and raw materials. The Government of India were enabled in the autumn of last year to remove the embargo on the shipment of wheat and cereals, which was a welcome measure.

A rise in the value of the rupee, which would normally have resulted from the above-mentioned causes, did not eventuate to the extent which might have been expected; this tendency was largely neutralised by the heavy imports into India of gold and silver bullion amounting to £20,000,000 and £10,000,000 respectively. Nevertheless, it is noteworthy that, in spite of these extensive imports of treasure, the balance of trade has moved largely in favour of India. For the nine months from April 1 to December 31, 1922, and taking into account the bullion imports, there is a balance in favour of India of £13,600,000, against an adverse balance of £16,650,000 for the corresponding period in the previous year, and this is a good indication of the country's prosperity. Another notable factor which had an adverse effect on the exchange rate was the resumption by the India Council of the sale of Council drafts. This practice was continued for six weeks only, and has since been withdrawn.

In the closing months of 1922 business began to revive somewhat, and there were more encouraging signs; Germany entered the field as a buyer of jute and other produce from India, but the French occupation of the Ruhr has caused a setback.

As for exports from this side, to take a principal item, cotton goods, there has been a substantial advance in the price of cotton during the year, and in former times, considering the favourable position in India, this would have led to a substantial demand from that country and the East generally for piece goods, but in the present instance it has not led to any appreciable improvement, and leads one to the conclusion that the old stocks accumulated during the boom period have not yet been altogether absorbed. A lack of confidence and the high prices still prevailing, viz., 100-130 per cent. above the pre-war level, are also a hindrance to fresh business. The metal trade has also been slow to respond to the advances which have occurred on this side.

The prospects for the current year are not easy to forecast. The political situation in India, it is true, has decidedly changed for the better; the agitations which have disturbed the country recently have largely quietened down and given place to a calmer atmosphere; and with abundant crops the trade position is more hopeful, but we cannot look to any settled recovery so long as the troubled economic conditions in European countries continue, and particularly in regard to Germany, which is one of India's principal customers. However, I am glad to say that the bank is in a very strong position to participate to the fullest extent in the revival of business which is bound to come when the Continental situation becomes more stabilised.

I may state here that we are not concerned in the vagaries of the European exchanges. Our capital and reserve are wholly on a sterling basis, and, though our main business is with India, it makes no inherent difference to the bank whether the rupee is at 1s. 4d. or 2s.

The position in Mesopotamia has not undergone any sensible change, and the trade of the country continues in a more or less depressed state. The outstanding event politically has been the conclusion of a treaty with King Faisal confirming the independence of Irak under British support, and this still awaits ratification. Whatever may be the outcome of the deliberations of H.M. Government in regard to our future policy—dependent, it is understood, upon the conclusion of a peace treaty with Turkey—I should like to emphasise that to my mind a policy of complete evacuation is greatly to be deprecated. At the present time, when foreign markets are being closed to us by high tariff walls, the development of the Mesopotamian markets would afford a valuable outlet for our manufactures.

There is an idea in some quarters that even if we leave Mesopotamia it will not make any marked difference to our external trade, and that it will continue as heretofore. But I am one of those who are not so sanguine. Whatever may have been the case during the Turkish régime, there is little doubt that in the event of the retirement of Great Britain chaotic conditions will prevail for many years to come, until some sort of a Government is firmly established. Meanwhile, with the roads and communications unsafe, trade will become almost impossible, not only locally, but the traffic with the north of Persia, whose markets are chiefly supplied through Baghdad, will be seriously jeopardised. Lancashire interests are largely concerned in this trade, consisting as it does to a great extent of cotton piece-goods, a very large proportion of which finds its way to Persia.

Then there are the exports from Mesopotamia, which should not be ignored. Already a fair quantity of grain is being shipped, and by the development of irrigation a substantial increase would result. There is also a good outlook for cotton cultivation on a large scale. Lancashire is looking round for fresh fields for cotton supplies, and I venture to say there are great possibilities in that direction. All enterprise, however, has been checked by the continued political uncertainty.

The Times on Saturday last published a despatch from its correspondent in Baghdad, under the heading of "New Era in Irak." This is what he says about cotton cultivation:—

"Very strenuous efforts are being made this year to balance the Irak Budget, and it is no secret that, once that has been successfully accomplished, the London money market will be prepared to consider a loan. This loan is to be expended on the huge capital works (barrages, regulators, and canals) required in order to raise the country to its former level of prosperity. That the return on the capital expended will be immense is a commonplace. Those who know the Sudan declare that the acreage to be made available there by the new barrage for cotton cultivation is quite inconsiderable compared with the huge area of splendid land thirsting for a proper flow of water in Irak."

The whole article is well worth perusal.

A great deal has been said and written on the subject of Mesopotamia, and the greatest attention has been concentrated on the question of expenditure, and there has been some disposition to minimise the important trade interests involved and the potentialities of the country, and to make it out as a sort of wilderness of no use or benefit to Great Britain. Perhaps it will not be out of place, and may be of some interest, if I give the figures of the last complete year available, viz., 1921. In that year the value of the imports amounted to £13,700,000, and the exports £11,500,000, not taking into account those for the military Government departments and the railways. In 1920 the imports were £15,500,000, but the exports amounted only to £7,000,000, owing to the insurrection and the slump of prices all over the world. Practically all this valuable trade is in British hands, financed by British banks, insured with British companies, and transported by British ships, and under a sound, stable Government it is capable of material expansion. I know of no part of the world where Great Britain is so well placed, and the loss of this by no means insignificant trade will not be without effect on British industries and the problem of unemployment at home.

As for the expenditure, this much can be said, that but for the delay in coming to a settlement with the Turks it would have been nothing like the sum required at present, and it is safe to assume that as soon as a definite peace treaty is concluded with Turkey the cost will be reduced to a much lower figure.

I cannot do better than quote again from The Times in its leader, commenting on the despatch of its correspondent. It concludes:—

"There may or may not be oil in Mesopotamia, but a country once so rich may surely be made rich again by modern methods. Economic progress will hasten political progress, will reduce the burden on the British taxpayer, and provide a new field for enterprise. It is not in the British tradition to abandon an experiment, however costly, in its early stages, just at the moment when it gives hope of real and growing success."

Before concluding, I wish to express the appreciation of the board of directors for the services of our managers and staff in London and abroad, and for their loyalty and devotion during the strenuous times through which we, in common with all those engaged in external trade, have been passing.

He concluded by moving the adoption of the report and accounts. The motion was seconded by Sir James Leigh-Wood, K.B.E., C.B., C.M.G., and was carried unanimously.

The dividend recommended was approved, the retiring directors (Mr. J. S. Haskell and Mr. Emile Franquai) were re-elected, the auditors were re-appointed, and, after a cordial vote of thanks to the Chairman and the other directors and the staff, which the Chairman briefly acknowledged, the meeting terminated.

The Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China announce that an agency of the bank has been opened at Zamboanga (Philippine Islands).

The traffic receipts of the Egyptian Delta Light Railways for the eight days ended February 28 amounted to £E6,748, making the total for the year £E310,406.

Severe regulations restricting the use of electric power in Athens, Piræus, and their suburbs are being proposed (says an American Consular report). It is stated that they will affect all new installations to be made and that the number of street cars in operation, as well as the use of electric current by stores, theatres, and motion-picture houses, will be limited. The situation could be relieved by an increase in the central-station facilities of Athens, the present equipment being a nine-unit plant, with a total capacity of 13,000 kw.

BRITISH CLAIMS AGAINST BULGARIA.

May 31 is the final date by which proofs of debts by British nationals against Bulgarian nationals and other claims by British nationals against the Bulgarian Government must be made in order to rank for payment of the second dividend out of the Bulgarian assets within His Majesty's Dominions or Protectorates.

It will be recalled that September 30, 1922, was the final date by which such proofs had to be made in order to rank for payment of the first dividend of 10s. in the pound, but creditors who failed to lodge their proofs of claim by that date will, if they do so by May 31, be entitled to rank for payment of that dividend out of the assets remaining after payment of the first dividend before the assets are applied to the payment of the second dividend. In order to rank for dividend claimants should, after lodging their proofs, obtain awards from the Anglo-Bulgarian Mixed Arbitral Tribunal entitling them to the benefit of the said charge.

British nationals who have claims against Bulgarian nationals or the Bulgarian Government under the Treaty of Neuilly, with the payment of which the Bulgarian assets above referred to are charged, and who have not yet lodged their claims upon the prescribed forms with the Department for the Administration of Bulgarian Property, Cornwall House, Stamford Street, London, S.E.1, should do so immediately, as any such claims lodged after May 31 will only be permitted to rank against any surplus of the above-mentioned Bulgarian assets which may remain over after payment of the said second dividend. The prescribed forms of proof of claim may be obtained on application to the Administrator of Bulgarian Property, Cornwall House, Stamford Street, London, S.E.1.

TRADE CONDITIONS IN IRAK.

Piece Goods.—The market remains exceedingly quiet. Orders from Persia have been almost nil. A decline in prices of about 5 to 6 per cent. is reported since December last. Importers have on hand a fairly large stock, and new shipments from Manchester ex s.s. Avristan and Registan are due shortly, for which there is at present no demand.

The present tightness of money in the market, coupled with the panic created by a number of failures which have taken place in the course of last month, has rendered local sales practically nil. It is, however, believed that, as in the previous years, there will be a revival at the beginning of next spring, as the roads to Persia will then be clear and exports will again be resumed.

Sugar.—There has been a marked improvement during the latter half of February consequent on the rise of the price of this commodity in the producing markets, and fairly large orders have been passed to Europe and India for crystal, fine, and loaf sugar. The enhancement in prices here has not proceeded at the same pace as on the Continent, and no further advance is anticipated unless orders begin to reach this country from Persia, which is the main importer, and depends entirely on Irak for this article.

Tanned Goatskins.—No demand for this article from Europe. Prices, however, remain unchanged, viz., Rs.2.4 (about) per oke of 2.83 lb.

Sheepskins.—The market is steady. Prices: Rs.0.14 per skin, weighing approximately 2 lb.

Agriculture.—The season was marked by comparatively mild weather until the end of January, when frost was recorded on five days of the last week. The scarcity of rain caused a certain amount of anxiety to cultivators, who in some cases had not been able to irrigate land which had been sown, but the situation was considerably relieved by a good shower of rain on February 12.

According to a report for the period January 16 to February 15 of the Official Director of Agriculture, barley continues to be exported from Basrah. The following figures (exports for the year ending December 31) are taken from a report by the Agricultural Officer, Basrah: Barley, 82,024 tons; wheat, 22,462 tons; millet, 2,053 tons; dates, 89,785 tons.

Now that the export of grain has been re-established, there are a number of problems that require to be solved in order to facilitate this trade. One of the most important is that of transport, and the railway is gradually providing a solution. A new station is proposed between Baghdad and Mahmudiyah (halfway between Hillah and Baghdad) for the benefit of cultivators on the Yusufiyah, who will thus be saved the cost of transporting grain to Baghdad. Providing purchase can be effected at the railway station, there should be a saving of at least six rupees per ton, which, it is estimated, is the cost of transporting grain by caravan from the Yusufiyah to Baghdad.

It is not known as yet how the cultivated area compares with last year, but it is generally believed that it is considerably less. There is already a brisk demand for cotton seed this year, and it is anticipated that a fairly large area will be put under cultivation. In addition to the areas where cotton was grown last year, cultivators are being canvassed in the Hillah, Karbelah, and Diwanayah districts, where it is hoped that there will be an ample supply of water to ensure the crop receiving its full requirements in the hottest part of the year.

Stock and Share Markets.

GILT-EDGED BUOYANT.

Dacia Romanos Rising.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

There has not been much doing on the Stock Exchange during the past week. This is invariably the case as the Easter holidays approach, and, apart from this, there have been so many counter-attractions to business during the week—little matters such as the Lincoln and National, to say nothing of inter-University events—that it is really not to be surprised at that it has been rather a dull period judged by the number of transactions. But, while business may have been restricted, there was no mistaking the firm tone of the markets.

Once again we are having quite a flood of new issues—an excellent sign, be it noted, of the improvement in conditions generally. They have been meeting, it may be added, with most conspicuous success, and it is very evident that there is no lack of money in the country for investment purposes.

Gilt-Edged Strong.

As usual of late, gilt-edged have made an excellent showing. Consols are up to 59½, War Loan Fives, which have been in special request, have reached 101½, the Conversion Loan stands at 77 5-16, while Fundings are 90½. Indian stocks have been notably strong; the 7 per cent. loan is 115½, the 3 per cent. loan is 57½, while the 3½ per cent. loan is 88½.

Foreign Government securities have continued to be affected very largely by exchange fluctuations. French stocks have been rather variable, the 5 per cents. closing at 27½, while the 4 per cents. are 21½. German 3 per cents. are about the same at 19s. 6d., while Italian Rentes are 21. In Near Eastern securities Turkish Unified have been fairly firm, closing at 26½. Greek stocks have displayed strength, Monopolies being 33½, the 4 per cents. 34½, and the 1914 Loan 48½.

Industrials Quiet.

A very quiet tone has ruled in Industrials, and business in general has been on the most restricted scale. Anxiety regarding the labour position has contributed to a considerable extent to this state of things. There has been notable activity, however, in a number of directions.

Textiles have been fairly firm, Courtaulds being 63s. 6d., while Coats are 64s. 9d. Tobaccos have been an active feature, Imperials closing at 79s., while Bats are 89s. Iron, Steel, and Engineering shares have been fairly steady. Vickers are 14s. 3d., Armstrongs are 19s., and Guest Keens are 40s.

Bank shares have made a firm showing. Chartered of India are 19½, National of Egypt are 21, National of India are 46½, while P. and O. Banks are 13½. Shipping securities have been fairly steady. P. and O. Deferred are 314, Furness Withys are 35s., while Cunards are 24s. 9d.

Oils Steady.

While business has been on a comparatively small scale in the Oil market, the general tone has been fairly good, and there has been marked activity in a few specialities. Anglo-Persian Ord. are 4 3-16, while Burmahs are 5½. Mexican Eagles are 1 15-16, Royal Dutch are 32½, and Shells are 4 5-32.

In the Egyptian group Anglo-Egyptian B are 1 13-32. Among Roumanians, Dacia Romanos have been a strong spot, rising to 1 1-32, while Phoenix are 27s. 9d., and Steaua Romanas are 9s. 3d. These three shares—especially the first two—hold out excellent prospects to the investor, and at the present levels should show a good profit in due course. Of course, much depends on developments in general in Roumania, and one would write much more confidently if the country had made greater progress towards the normal than has been the case.

Rubbers Featureless.

The Rubber market has been very lifeless during the week. Stocks here continue to decrease, but the price of the raw commodity remains weak, with the inevitable effect on the shares. Needless to say, this state of things is not likely to continue long, but it is none the less trying to holders who are waiting to recover their losses. Their time is coming, however.

FOREIGN EXCHANGES.

On the whole the exchanges have tended to firm up during the week. An exception has been provided, however, by the Hungarian kronen, which have sharply fallen away to 20,000 (sellers). French francs are again better at 70.20, while Belgian francs have improved to 81.65. In Near Eastern exchanges the Turkish rate has fallen to 700. Greek drachmæ are better at 410, while Bulgarian leva have risen to 675, as compared with 775 a week ago.

OBITUARY.

HENRY JOHN VALENTINE GEERE.

It is with profound regret that we have to announce the death on Good Friday, March 30, of Henry Valentine Geere, who has been associated with THE NEAR EAST from its foundation twelve years ago, and for the last eight years has acted as Editor. Valentine Geere, who was born on February 14, 1874, was trained as an architect, and in 1895 he accepted the post of surveyor to an archaeological expedition sent to Mesopotamia, under the auspices of the Pennsylvania University, to conduct excavations at Nippur. From Mesopotamia he went to Egypt to work for Professor Flinders Petrie, returning in 1898 for another winter in Mesopotamia. The East made a strong appeal to him, and he gained a sympathetic insight into the Arab character. A record of his experiences in the two countries appeared in a book entitled "By Nile and Euphrates." To journalism Geere brought a critical taste for good English, a well-balanced mind, and a happy sense of humour. As evidence of the latter stand his contributions under the heading "From Tangier to Teheran," subsequently changed to "The Caravanserai," for which he adopted the nom-de-plume "Corsair." An exceptionally tall, thin Englishman, unassuming to the point of extreme diffidence, with the gentlest of manners and the kindest of hearts—there was no one less like the character that he assumed for the purpose of introducing a lighter touch into this paper.

Six or seven years ago Geere developed the wasting illness which ultimately claimed him, and his work during this period was carried on under the severe handicap of ill-health, until he broke down completely last December. All who came in contact with Geere liked him, for his was a lovable nature. By the staff of THE NEAR EAST he will long be missed. He leaves a wife, a son who is in Australia, and two daughters.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Allies' Reply to Turkey.

The text of the Identic Notes addressed by the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of France, Great Britain, and Italy, and by the Japanese Ambassador in London to Ismet Pasha, in reply to his communication of March 8, has now been published. The reply, as we had ventured to hope, makes no attempt to traverse all the ground covered by the Turkish counter-proposals. It points out that in those proposals various questions accepted by Ismet Pasha as closed at Lausanne are reopened, and that some entirely new points are raised. Nevertheless, the inviting Powers record their readiness to discuss the various points, with the exception of any proposal not put forward in Ismet Pasha's Note of February 4 "which might involve any substantial modification of the territorial provisions agreed upon"; and they accept in principle the proposal to redraft the convention relating to judicial competence and the conditions upon which foreigners may establish themselves in Turkey. The proposal that the economic clauses should be detached from the Treaty, to become, after the signature of the latter, the subject of negotiations between the interested parties is neither accepted nor rejected. The clauses in question will come up for discussion, but the hope is expressed that for one reason or another some of them may no longer be required to figure in the Treaty, and it is regarded as possible that certain details can be left over to be settled by subsequent negotiations.

The Turkish Attitude.

It is not a matter for surprise that the tenour of the Allies' reply should have made a good impression in Constantinople and presumably at Angora. The expectation is that the National Assembly will discuss the reply, and that formal authorisation will be given to the Government to send a delegation to Lausanne. In the meantime, the decision has been taken to hold elections at once, in order that the new Assembly may be in a position to ratify the Treaty when signed. Both sides may now be regarded as having made a present each to the other of their conviction that nothing has been left to fight over. It is a satisfactory development. When the negotiations are resumed, we may hope to find that the Turks are equally convinced that matters of the utmost importance are waiting for the signature of peace, which it will be prejudicial to Turkey's interests to delay unnecessarily even for one day.

The Release of Zaghoul Pasha.

The release from Gibraltar of Zaghoul Pasha is the first step towards the adoption of the policy urged several weeks ago in these columns. When the Nationalist leader was deported from Egypt, in December, 1921, the main venom of his antagonism was directed against Egyptian politicians rather than against the British authorities. Although there may have been no definite understanding on the subject, it was felt that a Cabinet of Moderates would have a better chance of carrying on the government of the country and of adjusting the relations between Egypt and Great Britain if Zaghoul Pasha were removed out of mischief's way. Accordingly he was deported, under martial law, in the expectation that from that point an Egyptian Cabinet would be able to carry through the proposed treaty with Great Britain. This expectation has not been fulfilled. The events of the last fifteen months have shown—unless Yehia Pasha Ibrahim succeeds where so many others have failed—that there is no Egyptian able or willing to stand up to the Zaghoulists, and that if the British Government proposes to have a treaty with Egypt it must be drawn up in collaboration with Zaghoul Pasha or not at all. If there is any humiliation in this state of affairs, it is Egypt's and not Great Britain's. The Egyptians have been granted their independence, but a few matters have to be settled before the grant can be regularised. If only one man among the twelve million Egyptians counts for anything, so that he alone can take a decision on these matters, the country is the sufferer. It is not political intelligence that is lacking so much as physical courage.

Nationalists and a Settlement.

According to the terms of the statement issued by the Foreign Office, Saad Zaghoul Pasha's health requires a systematic course of waters in Europe. From Gibraltar, therefore, it is anticipated that he will proceed to France to consult a specialist as to the selection of a watering-place. Nothing is said with regard to permission to return to Egypt, but it may be taken for granted that the release will entail sooner or later the removal of the ban of deportation against Zaghoul Pasha, and that the time of his return will depend as much on him as on the British authorities. The points at issue between Egypt and Great Britain have been reduced virtually to one—the question of the Sudan; for in regard to the other reserved questions—the security of British communications, an Indemnity Bill, and the protection of foreign interests in Egypt—the principle in each case has been conceded, and only details have to be settled. Even the agitation over the Sudan, it is suspected, is largely of a fictitious character, designed to distract attention from the far graver stumbling-block in the draft Egyptian Constitution, the adjustment of power as between the Crown on the one hand and the Cabinet or the people on the other. One word from Zaghoul Pasha would presumably rid the draft Constitution of any clauses or expressions unacceptable to Great Britain; but, whether he can carry the day so easily in regard to the constitutional question remains to be seen. It is, however, the personal concern of Egypt. Zaghoul Pasha, if he has one spark of statesmanship in him, will see that all complications with Great Britain are speedily removed, in order that Egypt may be free to settle her more serious constitutional problems with undivided attention.

The Bulgarian Treason Trial.

Judgment has been delivered in Sofia in the case of the Ministers of the Radoslavoff Cabinet of 1914 and of General Jekoff, the Commander-in-Chief. Sentence of imprisonment for life was passed on Radoslavoff and five of his colleagues, and on the others terms of fifteen, ten, and five years' imprisonment, General Jekoff being sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. Apart from the fact that the responsibility of military officers in such circumstances would be hard to establish according to Western ideas, justification can be urged for the impeachment of the Ministry responsible for Bulgaria's alliance with the Central Powers, in view of the circumstances in which that step was taken. The case is not the same with the members of the subsequent Cabinets, and it is to be hoped that the Bulgarian people will reconsider the decision to embark on a political system under which imprisonment takes the place for the Opposition of spoils of office for the party in power.

Britain and the Moslem World.

The inauguration of telegraphic communication between Afghanistan and the outer world has been appropriately celebrated by an exchange of messages between the Ameer and King George. In the former's telegram the most significant passage was the expression of the hope that the British Government, "in view of Great Britain's obligations towards humanity and civilisation, will consider the miseries and misfortunes of the Moslems as a matter of great importance, in order that the friendly relations which existed for a long time between Great Britain and the whole Moslem world might be re-established." King George's reply was very much to the point: "I greatly regret that the events of the War should have given rise to a belief that Great Britain no longer desires such relations (i.e., friendly relations with the whole Moslem world). There is no foundation for that belief. It is the desire of myself and my Government as far as possible to live in peaceful and neighbourly co-operation with the Moslem world, and your Majesty may be assured that wherever men are seeking justice and peace. Great Britain welcomes their friendship. It is in this spirit that I earnestly hope for a speedy settlement in the Near East."

The New Afghanistan.

The Ameer's message raises the interesting question whether the reference to Moslems was prompted by zeal for the Turks, or by a desire to emphasise his own position in the Moslem world. His Majesty might quite legitimately have both ends in view. Solicitude on Turkey's behalf can be regarded at Angora only as a sign of a friendly disposition. At the same time, there can be no harm in reminding Nationalist Turkey that with the abolition for the time being of the Turkish Sultanate, as a result of the separation of the temporal from the spiritual power hitherto combined in the person of the Khalif, the temporal leadership of Islam may well be regarded by Moslems as in suspense. If Turkey is to be a republic, it is at least conceivable that the rest of the Moslem world will experience some difficulty in investing a President with the necessary prestige and sanctity. In the present Ameer of Afghanistan, Moslems will not be slow to recognise an able and enlightened ruler, who has already in the first two or three years of his reign shown that he considers that the best way of promoting his country's real interests is to take the fullest advantage of the greater experience and material achievements of other countries.

The Indian Budget.

The curtain has now been rung down on the drama of the Budget at Delhi, and the closing scenes call for little comment. As was generally anticipated, the Assembly failed to swallow the salt tax, but the hostile majority was small, and the proportion of absentees for such an important division was significantly high. The Viceroy then "certified" the rejected tax, which accordingly became law, and his action has been explained in an authoritative statement, which will presumably become a precedent for similar emergencies. To a man of Lord Reading's capacity the task of justifying his "certificate" was easy. Financially and administratively, there was no possible alternative, if the Budget was to balance, and the danger of another deficit was much too great to be incurred. As the result of the restoration of the tax India starts the new financial year in a favourable position, and, provided always that the seasons are good and the frontier tolerably quiet, we may hope to see one of the old-fashioned prosperity Budgets before next Easter.

The Vote for the Services Commission.

A minor incident of the Budget debates was the refusal of the Assembly, by the narrowest possible majority, of the vote for the expenses of the Services Commission. The amount at stake was trifling, and the vote has been duly restored, so that the inquiry, which must be made promptly if it is to be made at all, will not be delayed by what was evidently an accident. At the same time, we are a little doubtful whether the charge in question should really fall on India. The main function of the Commission is to provide for the continuance of the minimum supply of British administrators which is regarded by Parliament as indispensable to the successful establishment of the Constitution. This question is essentially Imperial, and it is quite arguable that the cost of examining it should be borne by Great Britain, which is accustomed to meet the miscellaneous bills of the Empire; but, of course, if such a proposal had been put forward, Indian legislators would have protested volubly against the withdrawal of the subject from their purview. So, from a practical standpoint, it is, perhaps, just as well that their freedom of speech was not hampered.

"Pan-Asia."

The Budget debates have necessarily overshadowed ordinary political discussions in India, and the only striking development of the last few weeks has been the increasing enthusiasm of the extremists for a Pan-Asiatic conference, which they expect would result in a formal federation of the whole continent in opposition to the ideas and institutions of the West. The topic is too large for discussion in these columns, but, looking at it solely from the Indian standpoint, we rather wish such a conference were within the bounds of practical politics. Indians in general and the extremists in particular suffer from the obsession of a geographical isolation which has long ceased to exist. It would do many of the politicians a world of good to hear what is really thought about them in Persia or Central Asia, not to speak of Japan, and to have their current catchwords examined from very different points of view, while they would probably be able to retaliate effectively on some at least of their critics. We should not expect the federation to materialise, but the addition to the continent's stock of truth would be worth the effort.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

Easter.

This was one of the finest, and most unexpectedly fine, Easters that we have had for a long time. The experts both of the Air Ministry and of the Meteorological Office, who appear to forecast nothing correctly nowadays, had rather dismally prophesied rain for us, but the weather flauntingly "could" itself, and every day got better and better, until to-day we reached the perfection of sunshine and breeze.

There is little doubt that the mass of people makes more of its holidays than it used. Not only is there far more going away--the number of English visitors to France, for example, is said this Easter to have been enormous--but to all sections of the population the call of budding hedgerows and harrowed fields is yearly growing stronger. Change is vital to the modern man, but, more than that, it is very pleasant. Of course, there will always be a minority which shuns the bustle of travelling, but for the most part holiday-makers appear to revel in crowded journeyings.

A certain amount of perplexity obtains over what should be done with the hundred million surplus with which the financial year 1922-23 closed. There are those, chiefly Government-inspired, who say that it should be used to pay off our debt, and there are others, chiefly business men, led by Sir Eric Geddes, who say that a reduction in taxation and the consequent expansion of trade are more important. It is impossible for one who does not belong to either group to have any opinion; the wisest course seems neither to hope nor to fear. After all, the "nothing-ever-happens" attitude is the easiest of all for this generation to adopt, for are they not all "waiters and seers"?

Among the more cynical views of the problems is one that suggests that as in any case America will soon for commercial reasons renounce her debt it were better to devote the surplus to our own trade; and another that would prompt the Chancellor of the Exchequer at once to reduce our taxation and so perform the first popular action for which the present Government may be held responsible. But the basis of such ideas is really too thin for serious consideration.

The Loving Liberals.

"Liberal re-union" is one of the finest subjects for copy that the Press has had for a long time, and threatens to outdo the Tutankhamen rage as the object of popular stunting. One can only suppose that the public really is interested in the future career of Mr. Lloyd George, for it is watching his efforts to wriggle himself into the Liberal Party with placid yet constant amusement. He, poor man, must be getting rather fatigued with his ceaseless, yet inevitably rebuffed, endeavours for reconciliation with the "Independent" Liberals; only this week he accepted a luncheon at Leeds in order to meet Mr. Asquith, who, however, knew the rules of the game well enough to refuse. To the ordinary observer these moves and counter-moves are a little childish; he would wish to see more straightness, a straightness that would tell Mr. Lloyd George outright either that he is or is not wanted within the Liberal Party. One can understand the "Independents'" fears; one cannot understand the coyness of their resistance. If Mr. Lloyd George is a bold bad man come a-wooing, with intent or implication of ruin, it would show more decorum to say in threatening tones, "Hands off!" than dulcet-like to murmur, "I'm on Tom Tiddler's ground." However, these Liberal coquetties do not deeply affect the country's morals.

Our Modern Tranquillity.

The year 1923 set in with high hopes of improved trade and of industrial smoothness generally, but, to confirm the wisdom of our preparedness for snags, there is trouble now, not only in the agricultural world—to which I have in other letters referred, and shall have to refer again—but also in the mining and building businesses. The miners, for the moment, are holding their hand, but there appears to be a good chance of complete dislocation in the building industry in about a week's time. The employers here are demanding a reduction of wages and a lengthening of hours, and notices to this effect are to be posted on April 7, to take effect a week later. The men are stated to agree to refer the question of wages to arbitration, but not the question of hours, so that, unless the Ministry of Labour can satisfactorily intervene, nothing can stop a strike or a lock-out. The Government's legacy of post-war ills is seen now to be even completer than we had thought it, and though their various housing schemes have been bewilderingly vacillating, it would look as if they really must decide on something unswervingly definite within the next few days. It is one of the hardest things in the world to get a decision out of Mr. Bonar Law's Government, but the devil is driving a very long ball these days, and something must be done to cope with him.

Scottish Fishermen and Germans.

It is sometimes stated, and particularly when discussion on the Ruhr occupation arises, that there is in this country considerable sympathy for the Germans. As far as I know, such sympathy exists only in certain academic or industrial minds: the main body of opinion is still steadfastly against Germany. This hostility is, at any rate, very prevalent in the breasts of Scottish fishermen, who resent very much the landing of fish from German trawlers. Recently at Aberdeen there has been serious trouble over the matter, for three thousand fishermen there grew so angry with German crews that they had to be driven off by the police. The heavy hand of authority may succeed in checking the actions of these fishermen, but it can scarcely affect their hearts: one imagines, indeed, that forgiveness of Germany is a far more distant affair in Great Britain than our moralists would have it. The creative remembrance of Germany's war-guilt and actions is by some superior persons regarded as provincial, but to ignore it as a factor in national and foreign matters would be a first-class error.

The Approach of King Willow.

Whatever unpleasant surprises the weather for the next month may have in store for us, Cricket is in the air now. The football season certainly is not over yet, though a glorious win by England over France to-day at Paris may be said, from a public point of view, to have closed the Rugby book, and there is yet for those who like it the final of the Football Cup at Wembley between Bolton and West Ham; still, everybody is talking cricket now. Bats are being fondly swung at imaginary half-volleys and long hops, articles on cricket are being challengingly published in the newspapers, and rolling and cutting of pitches have begun. The intermediate season is probably the saddest of all times for the sportsman, but he is always fuller of hopes than of laments, and the prospect of sun on smooth outfields excites as no sport other than cricket can excite.

The Educational Will o' the Wisp.

The educationalists are in full cry again. From Brighton, where the National Union of Teachers are in conference, comes the balmy tale of disappointed hopes. After the War, says the President of this Union, everyone was full of zeal for education; possession of education, the argument went, implied such enlightenment as would make future wars impossible. But since then reaction has set in, and teachers are not now reckoned as the priceless jewels which but a year or two ago was their official description. Economies have been effected; continuation schools have stopped, medical supervision has been curtailed. And so the teachers are alarmed. They are now trying to bolster their case with frightening words: "Education and Evolution" and "Ignorance and Revolution" is their present slogan. But such watchwords do not really perturb us. We know well enough that the Universities themselves, though they are not indeed responsible, are the cradles and homes of the best revolutionary minds, and that it is often enough through the slow, uneducated and so-called unprogressive minds that evolution comes. "Education" for the working classes not seldom means the mere amassing of useless, because misapplied or unapplied, knowledge; and in any form it has no inherent connection either with evolution or revolution.

The Cinema.

One cannot find time for everything in life, but the one that I confess I most cheerfully miss is the cinema. It is, I admit, a pure question of taste, this of going to see the film; yet it will scarcely be maintained that the devotees of the cinema can be distinguished by their intelligence. Apparently, too, there is abroad some opposition to the filming industry, for at a Theatre Club recently was debated the question whether "the film-play destroys the imagination." The Noes had it, but not before Mr. St. John Ervine was able to tell them that the picture house attracted only "tired business men, demented servant girls, and poor messenger boys." However this may be, the attempt to link Art with the films is at present a failure; and the endeavour particularly, which is sedulously indulged in in various quarters, to explain that Music is an integral part of the cinema, always makes one feel indisposed.

Cairo, March 21.

A New Cabinet.

The compromise outlined last week for overcoming the serious political crisis has been achieved, and King Fuad has authorised the formation of a Cabinet d'Affaires under the presidency of Yehya Pasha Ibrahim. Neither the rescript entrusting the formation of a new Cabinet to the new Prime Minister nor the latter's letter accepting office makes any reference to politics, and the new Cabinet will concern itself solely with the carrying on of the machinery of government which has in every direction been seriously embarrassed during the past month.

The new Prime Minister, Yehya Pasha Ibrahim, is a much respected man who has held the position of President of the Native Court of Appeal, and has before been Minister of Education. He will hold the portfolio of the Interior. The other members of the Cabinet are the following:—Ahmed Heshmat Pasha, Ministry of Foreign Affairs; Mohamed Moheb Pasha, Ministry of Finance; Ahmed Ziwer Pasha, Ministry of Communications; Ahmed Zulfikar Pasha, Ministry of Justice; Mohamed Tewfik Rifaat Pasha, Ministry of Education; Ahmed Aly Pasha, Ministry of Wakfs; Mahmud Azmi Pasha, Ministry of War and Marine; Hafez Pasha Hassan, Ministry of Public Works; and Fawzi Gorgi El Motei Bey, Ministry of Agriculture. Of these, Hafez Pasha Hassan, the new Minister of Public Works, who has distinguished himself as Governor of Cairo, and latterly as Under-Secretary for the Interior, and Fawzi Bey El Motei, Counsellor of the Native Court of Appeal, and the only Copt in the Cabinet, are new-comers. Ahmed Pasha Aly, Tewfik Rifaat Pasha, Mahmud Pasha Azmi, and Ahmed Zulfikar Pasha were all in the last Nessim Cabinet. The other three are, so to speak, old-stagers. Heshmat Pasha entered the Cabinet as far back as 1908 as Minister of Finance; Ziwer Pasha in 1917, and Moheb Pasha in 1914. Of the three, decidedly the most interesting return is that of Moheb Pasha, who, in all probability, will be the one tower of strength in the new Cabinet.

Admittedly this Cabinet is but a stop-gap, but if only it can maintain office notwithstanding the attacks and intrigues of the opposition, it should serve as the useful means of bridging over the interval until the country acquires a saner frame of mind. And the clearer we make it that we are determined not to go one step beyond our declaration of February 28, 1922, until the conditions therein laid down have been fulfilled the sooner will it be possible to return to the political régime.

* Under this heading appear weekly or at regular intervals communications from correspondents in Egypt, the Sudan, Roumania, Yugoslavia, Greece, Bulgaria, Turkey, Palestine, Irak and Persia.

The New Parliament House.

Although there are no signs of the Constitution, and; consequently, little prospect of the early assembly of the two new chambers for which the Constitution is to provide, the new Parliament House is rapidly approaching completion, and the contractors will in all probability be ready to hand it over early in April. The building promises to be one of the most striking in the capital, and both the rapid manner of its construction and its elegant design redound greatly to the credit of those responsible for the work.

The uncertainty of the outlook has more than justified the prudent decision taken by Sarwat Pasha and Sidky Pasha not to commit the country at the very outset to the heavy expenditure which a more imposing and permanent edifice would entail, but to confine themselves to the provision of adequate accommodation until such time as the nation could itself decide what it wanted. At the juncture when they took this decision the Ministers in question had every hope that by March the elections would be over and the new members of Parliament ready to take their seats, and their main consideration was the question of expense.

Royal Visitors.

Our Royal visitor, the Queen of the Belgians, appears to have had a most enjoyable time in Upper Egypt. Her Majesty was to have left Luxor at the end of the first week of this month for a more or less prolonged stay in Cairo, but she postponed her departure from Upper Egypt until the 16th, and is now coming down by water, so as to be able to visit the various sights en route. Queen Elisabeth, as mentioned in a previous letter, has always taken a great interest in Egyptological matters, and, under the guidance of Dr. Jean Capart, she is making an extensive round of all the ancient monuments in the area. Before King Tutankhamen's tomb was actually shut she visited the sepulchral chamber no fewer than three times, and spent her last afternoon in the laboratory.

Prince Leopold of Belgium, who has been paying a flying visit to the Sudan, returned to Luxor in time to accompany the Queen on her return to Cairo. The Royal party are due to sail for Europe on the 29th, their visit to Jerusalem having been cancelled at the last moment.

Recently M. Lippens, Governor-General of the Congo, passed through Cairo. M. Lippens is taking home his daughter, who met with a terrible motor accident in the Congo about the middle of January. The accident took place fifty miles from the frontier. M. Lippens declares that it is solely thanks to the help given by the Sudan Government that he has been able to bring his daughter back alive. He cannot speak too highly of the kindness he received during his passage through the whole length of the Sudan, nor does he conceal his admiration for Sir Lee Stack and his officials for the efficient manner in which the administration of that country is carried out.

The Tutankhamen Discovery.

Lord Carnarvon and his staff are once more actively working in the Valley of the Kings. The tomb of Tutankhamen, as was previously mentioned in this correspondence, has been definitely closed up for the rest of the season, but work has been resumed at the laboratory in the tomb of Seti II., where, indeed, a great deal remains to be done before operations can be suspended for this season.

The great affluence of visitors, who could not be denied admission, has, in fact, greatly impeded the work and has considerably added to the strain which the experts have had to suffer. No work of the delicate nature which the treatment, preservation, and packing of these three thousand years old objects entail can be carried on under the conditions which have existed during the past month, and the public, if it really takes the interest in this find which its recent activities would seem to indicate, must leave the excavators undisturbed to accomplish the great task they have undertaken. If next season the public interferes as it has done this season, with the scientific handling of these wonderful relics, it cannot expect as much to be saved as would be the case if the experts had been left alone. The responsibility for any shortcomings in this respect will undoubtedly in that case rest on the shoulders of the former and not of the latter.

IRAQ.

Baghdad, March 15.

The Inspectorate Law.

Politics continue in a state of almost complete stagnation; the law defining the position and duties of the British inspectors has now been digested by such as are interested in it, and on the whole the impression made is favourable. In point of fact, however, it is an open question whether any changes will actually take place as a result of its publication, as much of the law will not be enforceable for some time. There is little doubt that when the law was drafted the Irak Government contemplated an early withdrawal of some of the inspectors from the divisions into Baghdad, but there is reason to believe that suggestion has been vetoed and the inspectors will, as heretofore, live in the divisions which they are appointed to inspect. The experiment of leaving large areas subject only to occasional inspection has been tried and found unsatisfactory, with the result that Kut, which was formerly only a qadha of the Baghdad liwa and subject only to occasional inspections from the adviser living in Baghdad, and Diwaniyah, which was a qadha of the Hillah division, have had to be made into liwas with resident British inspectors. The time has certainly not yet come when the reverse process can be carried out, and until that time arrives the inspectors must live in the liwas and keep a very close eye on the conduct of affairs.

The Evacuation Scare.

The strength of the party which advocates the evacuation of this country by the British, and which made itself very prominent in the recent debate on this country in the House of Commons, proved a great eye-opener to politicians here, and has made them envisage more clearly the result of such an evacuation. Though there is undoubtedly a good deal of pro-Turkish feeling among certain classes in this country, it is not as a rule to be found among the politicians who see their chance of obtaining lucrative government employment to be much more favourable under an Arab Government, even with a British mandate, than under a Turkish Government, which is at the moment the only alternative. The fear that the British Government might decide to evacuate the country has made them much more appreciative of the advantages which the British mandate and the presence of British troops afford, and has made the views of the nationalists more moderate.

Crop Prospects.

The weather is causing some anxiety to cultivators this year. Though the total amount of the rainfall has been but little below the average, it has been unevenly distributed, and, instead of frequent light rains watering the crops at suitable intervals, there have been three or four occasions when heavy rain has fallen and a long dry period ensued. The result is that while irrigated crops are in excellent condition, immediate rain is required if the unirrigated crops are to be anything but a complete failure in the middle and south of the country. In the north the outlook is more promising: More rain has fallen, and even unirrigated crops are in good condition. The prospects for cotton this year are considered good. The demand for seed has been very big, the financial results of last year's crops having made many people anxious to emulate them. Care is being taken to ensure that full use shall be made of the seed. It is being sold at a price considerably higher than the cheap variety which is obtainable in the market here and used as cattle feed, and at the same time the good seed is only being issued to persons who have pumps or bring a certificate from the Irrigation Department that water will be available for the whole area that they intend to sow. It is confidently hoped that, with satisfactory weather conditions, there will be a crop of at least 1,000 bales this year.

Official Visits.

Both the Air Officer Commanding-in-Chief and Sir Henry Dobbs have during the past few days been on tour in the Middle Euphrates district, Sir John Salmond visiting Hillah and Kerbela, and Sir Henry Dobbs making a tour throughout the Hillah liwa and visiting Museiyib, Tuwairij, and Kif. They were both received with enthusiasm, and there is little doubt that visits of this kind do much good in bringing the senior civil and military officials into closer touch with the people.

BULGARIA.

Sofia, March 26.

The Sobranye Dissolved.

On Sunday, March 11, the Sobranye, which has been in session for the past three years, was dissolved. General elections will be held on April 22, and at present all parties are engaged in vigorous electioneering. Although it is too early to prophesy, the Agrarians appear to be assured of a large majority. The total number of Deputies to be elected is 246, against 228 in the last Sobranye, and it is estimated that the Agrarians will have approximately 160 to 170. The Communists are likely to remain the chief Opposition Party, but even they will have to fight hard in order to secure the return of 47 Deputies, the number which they previously had. The Bourgeois bloc, without their leaders, and torn by internal dissensions, are not likely to obtain much success, although a short time ago the National Liberals were eager to participate in the bloc and lend it considerable strength. The Radicals would not, however, hear of this, so the Liberals remain a separate party.

If the Agrarians obtain a large majority, it is said that they may change the Constitution. For a long time past it has been known that certain supporters of M. Stambolisky desire even greater power than they possess at present. Whether their ambitions will be gratified depends on the results of the elections, but there are serious grounds for thinking that the establishment of a Peasant Republic is not out of the question.

Serbo-Bulgarian Rapprochement.

For over a year a rapprochement between Serbia and Bulgaria has been talked about, but now it really looks like becoming an accomplished fact. The conversations which were held at Nish during the earlier part of this month are understood to have proceeded very satisfactorily. A Protocol, which has as its main object the taking of joint action against Macedonian komitaji, has just been signed. The Sofia Government have proclaimed martial law in South-western Bulgaria, and several regiments of troops are being sent to this area. In fact, it would seem that Sofia and Belgrade are going to collaborate against the Macedonians. Sofia's action is highly courageous, but whether it will be successful is much to be doubted. The Macedonians are at present very well organised, and if Sofia takes forcible measures against them, they will immediately retaliate. The situation can be best summed up as follows:—How far are M. Stambolisky and his supporters resolved to go in their struggle against the Macedonians? If they are going all the way, they may.

with Serbia's aid, defeat the Macedonians and gain Serbia's friendship. If they adopt only half measures, the Macedonians will carry on as they are doing at present.

There is, of course, another aspect of the question. It is reported that Serbia is every day casting more longing eyes towards Salonika. It is even stated that she has started unofficial pourparlers with Bulgaria in order to find out the latter's attitude in the event of a Serbian descent on Salonika. Bulgaria would in all probability welcome any action by Serbia in this direction. She would, if asked, be willing to guarantee benevolent neutrality towards the Serbs, but, in return, would claim territorial expansion on her south-eastern frontier. In this connection the report that Serbia has engaged in negotiations with Turkey at Constantinople regarding the latter's Thracian intentions is highly interesting. In any case, there is no doubt that Serbia and Bulgaria are daily becoming more friendly—a fact which is very worrying to certain other Balkan countries.

The Reparations.

At last the Reparations question has been settled. Full details of the settlement appeared in THE NEAR EAST of March 22, so it will be sufficient to recapitulate here some opinions and some remarks.

On the whole, the agreement has been very well received by all parties, whilst the Agrarians are naturally jubilant concerning what is undoubtedly a first-class election triumph. The Opposition are more reserved, but even they recognise that the fact that Bulgaria has to pay only 86 million gold francs during the next ten years is a very great improvement on the terms fixed by the Peace Treaty. The Commission are also satisfied, as, in securing money without having had to recur to force, they have succeeded where all other Inter-Allied Commissions have failed. Perhaps the most important feature resulting from the agreement is that foreign countries may now feel inclined to advance money to Bulgaria. So far, the Reparation menace has prevented any foreign loans, but now the situation has totally changed.

Of course, the Reparation Commission in Paris have to ratify the agreement entered into by the Inter-Allied Commission here and the Bulgarian Government, but there seems little doubt that ratification will take place, although it is not likely to be done until the middle of May. When this has been accomplished, large reductions may be expected in the personnel of the Inter-Allied Commission. It is said that the Allied Legations may be entrusted with the Commission's task, but it is more probable that a small body of six to ten persons will remain in order to supervise the fulfilment of the agreement made.

The effect of the settlement has already been shown in the improvement in value of the lev. Six weeks ago it was 800 and onwards to the round sterling, while to-day it is 640. This rise, whilst beneficial to import trade, will prove injurious to export unless it takes place slowly and steadily.

Without indulging in undue flattery, it is necessary to congratulate Bulgaria on the settlement arrived at. In being the first ex-enemy country to settle her Reparations peaceably, she has gained considerable prestige in Europe. This prestige should be extremely useful to her in after years.

General News.

The trial of the Ministers of the Cabinet, MM. Gueshoff, Daneff, and Malinoff, will take place towards the beginning of May. M. Daskaloff, the former Minister of the Interior, will probably act as prosecutor for the Crown.

A well-attended dance, held under the auspices of the Echo de Bulgarie, took place in the Union Club, Sofia, on March 24. All the proceeds, amounting to over 150,000 levas (£230 to-day), were given to the fund for the reconstruction of the National Theatre.

On the day following the agreement concerning Reparation payments, M. Stambolisky sent a telegram of thanks to the Prime Ministers of England, France, and Italy.

Constantinople, March 27.

Pact Tactics.

During the present further period of delay in the peace negotiations, while the Allies confer in secret conclave on the Turkish counter-proposals, the policy of the Nationalist Government would seem to be to endeavour, so far as possible, to force the Allied Governments to an acceptance of some of the controversial points on which they are still insisting by making them faits accomplis, and during this interval of renewed suspense no little irritation is being caused to Allied subjects by this method of forcing issues at stake—affecting the interests of foreigners—while a nominal state of war still exists between Turkey and the Powers, and the very issues in question are under consideration. Protests and appeals by the Allied High Commissioners are of little avail, and meet with politely expressed regrets that the law must be enforced.

Registration of Foreign Companies.

Such was the nature of the reply to the request for the adjournment of the formalities for the registration of foreign companies. In consequence, many companies with branch offices or agencies in Constantinople—including several British insurance companies—finding themselves unable to comply with the many exactions of the new law, have been forced to close their offices, and have ceased business operations in Turkey. One wonders whether this may not prove to be the beginning or first effects of an ultra-Nationalist policy, and whether the Government will discover, before it is too late, the unwisdom of driving foreign business and capital from their shores, and thus losing means of revenue for their national coffers by insisting on impracticable and unworkable conditions.

The Turkish Press would seem to evince some concern at the prompt withdrawal of so many companies and surprise at their action. In regard to the British insurance companies, however, it is regrettable to find the Vakit descend to the unjust and unwarrantable insinuation that "British companies, rather than have themselves registered, have preferred to put an end to their operations for fear lest they should have to pay the large sums demanded from them to indemnify those who suffered through the great fire at Smyrna."

The Temettu Tax.

Another matter which one had expected would be deferred until peace conditions had been agreed upon is that of the imposition on foreign subjects of the temettu, or earned income-tax. Yet the Ikdam is permitted to publish the statement: "That orders have been received from the Ministry of Finance to proceed with the collection of the temettu from British, French, Italian, and American subjects. Taxes will be exacted retrospectively from November last. The Angora Government deferred the exaction of these taxes from the aforesaid subjects after the Nationalist administration was established here in November. This delay is now closed."

The main provisions of the temettu law are as follows:—Payments are to be made twice yearly, in March and September. Contributors are divided into several classes. Thus, public utility companies have to pay 25 per cent. of their profits after the cost of administration has been deducted. Insurance companies pay 10 per thousand of all sums insured. Salaried employees will pay 15 per cent. on their salaries cum bonuses or allowances. Traders and artisans are to pay in proportion to the rent of the premises in which they carry on their business. Journalists, nurses, midwives, and certain others are exempted from the tax. It may be mentioned that the law permits of the taxpayer lodging objections against the figure on which he is taxed, and it is stated that the Defterdarat, having received in the space of three days as many as 200 complaints, has applied to the Ministry of Finance for precise instructions on the subject.

Taxation—The Foreigners' Share.

It is well, perhaps, that new Turkey should understand that in criticising their methods one is not necessarily criticising the policy of the Nationalist leaders. In Turkey there are few Englishmen, at any rate, who do not admit the reasonableness of the temettu tax as a fair form of direct taxation, and one, moreover, to which the English taxpayer in his own country contributes more largely than the inhabitant of any other nationality. But there are two questions in the present case which, in the opinion of many, offer serious grounds for contention. First, is it right to attempt to apply a law of this nature to the subject of Allied Powers while the whole question of the terms of peace is in the melting-pot? Secondly, are the rates on which the tax is based equitable and reasonable in view of the very important factor that in all probability, and owing to the present state of advancement in commercial science of Ottoman Turks, so large a portion of the revenue of the Government from this source will be collected from residents of foreign nationality? That such should be the case is very naturally inclined to jar on the mind of the ideal Nationalist; but facts, however unpleasant they may appear, must be faced, and in the interval of the new era of Turkish advancement and development which all hope is now commencing, and for which purpose revenue is so badly needed, the country's leaders would be ill-advised to enforce hastily conceived legislation, which may only tend to kill the goose that lays the golden egg.

Peace and Paper Money.

In a sort of hopeful anticipation of an early agreement on the Peace Treaty, the Turkish lira has, during the last few weeks, shown a steady upward tendency, tempered, however, with some fluctuations. Thursday last witnessed a sudden fall of 35 piastres to the £1 on the strength of a rumour current that the Nationalists contemplated making a new issue of paper money. Although the Ministry of Finance forthwith denied the report, and the lira recovered to its former figure, the same rumours are again prevalent at the time of writing, once more checking the lira's rising tendency and the hopes of many a sorely tried importer. From the beginning of the present month the rate has see-sawed between 730 and 640, standing at the moment at 705.

The present visit of Mr. Louis Steeg, Director-General of the Imperial Ottoman Bank, to Angora was linked with the rumour of the projected new issue of paper money, but this statement as to the object of his visit has been categorically denied. It is announced that his mission is to discuss with the Ministry of Finance matters affecting the Government's indebtedness to the Imperial Ottoman Bank.

Smallpox.

The smallpox epidemic is still prevalent, and, unfortunately, is not confined entirely to the various refugee camps. Several isolated cases have appeared in the central portions of the town. One of the latest victims is Mr. J. D. Quirk, the editor of the Orient News, who, one is pleased to be able to state, is progressing favourably.

WAKFS IN PALESTINE.

"MOHAMMEDAN WAKFS IN PALESTINE." By L.-Col. J. B. Barron, O.B.E., M.C., Director of Revenue and Customs, Government of Palestine. (Printed at the Greek Convent, Jerusalem, 1922.)

The Law of Wakf (pl. Awkaf) was instituted by the Prophet himself, and is thus in some degree the foundation of the whole complicated code of Mohammedan Law. It was originally of the most commendable simplicity: "Tie up the property; it is not to be sold or made the subject of gift or inheritance; devote its produce to your children, your kindred, and the poor in the way of God," was Mohammed's command to his companion, Omar (p. 6)—but it has been so much amended by different Mohammedan peoples desirous of bringing it into harmony with their own national needs and proclivities that the broad lines of the Prophet's Law have become blurred. Arab, Turkish, Indian, and Persian jurists have written much upon the Law of Awkaf, explaining, modifying, interpreting the pronouncements of the four legal schools which arose during the first and second centuries of Islam (p. 9). The Turkish jurists belong to the Hanifite School, which is the oldest, maintaining that while a Wakf, being, in fact, property whose ownership is vested in God, is therefore inalienable, yet under certain conditions a Wakf may be exchanged if thereby the Wakf is undeniably benefited (pp. 5, 9, 35, 36). During the four hundred years of Turkish rule in Palestine the Wakfs in that country were too dexterously and too frequently manipulated to meet a pressing or even a momentary need. Moreover, the whole land became gradually so impoverished that the value of the various Wakfs was greatly diminished. At the same time the number of Wakfs rapidly increased, owners of property seeing in this law practically their only security against Turkish rapacity.

Thus, when the British Military Administration took charge in Palestine the question of Wakfs, belonging to every creed and race there settled, was one of the first things it had to tackle. The Wakf question presented the wildest entanglements. The law had been carelessly or corruptly administered, papers were missing or invalid. While the country north of Jerusalem was being cleared the little band of military men at Jerusalem who formed the administration sought to tackle the problem of Mohammedan Wakfs in Palestine. They found nothing to help them, for though there is some useful literature in English and French, as well as Arabic, upon Wakfs, these dealt mainly with Wakfs in other Moslem lands, where the peculiar features that complicated every aspect of life under Turkish administration were unknown, and thus the very points upon which guidance was sought were lacking. The author says: "During the period in which I was delegated by the British Military Administration of Palestine to supervise the finances of Moslem religious endowments, I was unable to obtain any work in English dealing with this subject. The amount of reading and labour which I found necessary to enable us to obtain a grasp of this intricate question made me think that my notes might prove of value to others following me in the field." From this wide field Colonel Barron has reaped a rich harvest with exceeding skill. The book, indeed, is too full of technical knowledge for mere reading, but it is one which no British official charged with the administration of any district in Palestine can afford to dispense with. The Palestine Government wisely ordered its publication; and our French neighbours in Syria would be well advised to make a translation, if permitted, for the use of their officials there. It is a book whose value will increasingly appear; it contains an immense amount of information put tersely, but with an accuracy and balance that double its worth. Colonel Barron has already rendered very distinguished if unobtrusive service in Palestine, where he has held more than one important post. This solid little book is not the least valuable contribution he has made to the Administration of Palestine under the British Mandate.

THE PALESTINE PROBLEM.

The hopes that have been entertained in many quarters that affairs in Palestine would yet right themselves by a gradual process of peaceful evolution appear now to be unlikely of fulfilment. There is no need to seek to attach blame to the Palestine Administration or anywhere else. The forces at work, although finding expression through human agency, are beyond the control of individuals. All that is necessary at this stage is that the situation should be candidly and squarely faced, and that a policy of drift should be strongly discountenanced. At the time when it was made there was nothing incongruous or extravagant in the Balfour Declaration. General Allenby had only just begun to knock at the gates of Palestine; three days previously Beersheba had been captured. Endorsement of the Zionist ideal seemed a noble gesture; the realisation of Jewish aspirations was to be facilitated with the most careful provision for safeguarding the rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, entirely in keeping with the best British traditions. What was not taken into account—the omission reflects no discredit on the British Government or the British people—was the possibility of the development within an incredibly short time of Arab political consciousness. The unexpected, however, has happened, and Great Britain has to reckon with that political consciousness. It has not been entirely ignored in the draft Constitution, but it has not received, so far, adequate recognition. The British Government is still inclined to pin its faith on the elections; but it is as foolish as it is dangerous for the authorities to shut their eyes to the real facts. If the Zionists could have been more discreet, if they had displayed a larger measure of statesmanship, the position might have been less serious. The Palestine Administration is being taken to task, for different reasons, almost as vigorously by Zionist as by Arab elements. As an illustration of the gulf between Zionism in practice and the only possible régime for which Great Britain can accept responsibility in Palestine, we may quote a passage in the Palestine Weekly of March 23: "There are Arabs," this organ declares, in urging the Government "to take a stern decision," "to show its hand," "to act," "[There are Arabs] who have not yet realised that they are citizens of a conquered country, and that whatever privileges are accorded them are not theirs by right, but by the good will of a benevolent Government." Here is an absolute travesty of the declared aims of Great Britain in the liberation of Palestine, and it is such an attitude on the part of Zionists on the spot that makes a change of British policy inevitable.

In the debate in the House of Lords, on March 27, the Government clearly showed that it was still anxious to play for time. The Secretary of State for the Colonies promised to reconsider the question of the publication of the various pledges given to the Arabs after the Palestine elections. He justified the Constitution as a first step towards self-government, but made no attempt to show that the situation in the country could be regarded as in any way satisfactory. It is true that the Arab boycott of the elections has not been complete. Out of 670 Moslem secondary electors 107 have been chosen, nominations for all categories of the population having taken place in 128 out of 436 voting areas. The result is disappointing, the Duke of Devonshire admitted, and the period for voting has now been extended to the end of May, in order to give the Arabs time to reconsider their attitude. In this connection it may be pointed out that, whereas in other countries where elections or Parliamentary proceedings have been boycotted the political party abstaining has been able to complain of some definite act of injustice, in Palestine the Arabs are protesting before they have given the Constitution a trial. They are promised ten out of twenty-seven seats—a number admittedly disproportionate to their numerical strength, and in ordinary circumstances placing them permanently in a minority; but their case would carry more weight if they could prove after a fair trial that their interests under the actual system of government, with its elaborate safeguards, were invariably liable to be prejudiced.

The fact remains that the Arabs are so obsessed with the fear of what will happen to them as a result of the Jew being installed as "top-dog" that they are resolved to make, if they can, the administration of Palestine under the British mandate unworkable. In the light of what is happening elsewhere it has to be admitted that, with a fair measure of unity in their ranks, claiming, as they do, to form ninety per cent. of the population, they ought not to find the task difficult. What, then, is to be the attitude of Great Britain? Both in Egypt and in Irak preparations are being made to be content with the second best in the matter of administration. Must the best be insisted upon in Palestine alone? Viscount Grey uttered a legitimate warning when he reminded the House of Lords that all commitments which might involve this country in the use of force were things which needed very careful consideration, and ought to be avoided if possible. The most intolerable commitment of all, he added, was that likely to involve the use of force, not against an external enemy, but against the very people of the territory in whose interests the commitment was undertaken. If it were a straightforward issue between British and Arabs, as in Egypt or in Irak, it might do little harm to play for time, in the certainty that the most explosive material will always be hard put to it to find in British tolerance and good humour the spark required to set it alight. In Palestine, however, the position is complicated by the element that is ready to remind the Arabs at every turn that "they are citizens of a conquered country and that whatever privileges are accorded them are not theirs by right." Even if it should be possible to carry on the administration of the country with no worse trouble than has been experienced in the past, can anyone doubt that the situation will go from bad to worse with the introduction of the new régimes in the neighbouring countries of Egypt and Irak? And to what purpose? Certainly not for the benefit of Palestine, because at this particular stage of the world's history there can be no question that internal peace is more valuable than a first-class administration. The solution, then, for Palestine is that Great Britain should continue to play the rôle for which she is in the country—to set a decent standard of government, and to look after the interests of minorities; but, instead of placing power in the hands of the intellectual majority (Jews) and addressing herself to the interests of those who are in a minority of intellect (Arabs), she must recognise the cogency of numerical strength, while seeing that no prejudice is done to those who are in a minority of numbers. We have too high an opinion of Jewish capacity to believe that under such a system the scheme of a national home will suffer any material disability.

THE TURKISH NATIONALIST MOVEMENT*

By NİHAD RESHAD BEY.

(Concluded).

The fundamental change of outlook in the Near East could not be looked upon as due to any sudden action on the part of a political party; rather was it the result of an outburst of energy and patriotism amongst the whole of the Turkish people who had lost faith in the European spirit of equity, and who saw their very existence being menaced.

The Turks had laid down their arms in accordance with the Wilsonian principles of the Armistice of Mudros. Hardly had this Armistice been concluded, when it was violated in the most flagrant manner. Constantinople, the capital of the nation, was forcibly occupied under conditions which made it imperative for Turks to emigrate to Anatolia. Soon, however, this alternative was also removed by the invasion of the Greeks, who landed at Smyrna, on the pretext that the port of this town contained a Christian majority, and that Ionia had belonged to Greece some three thousand years ago, a fact which, by the way, had not prevented this region being given to Italy under the Allied agreement of St. Jean de Maurienne. The Greeks, not satisfied with occupying this territory, to which they could have no conceivable right, inaugurated such a régime of terror and destruction against the Turkish population, that an Allied commission of inquiry (to which Admiral Bristol, a member of the American delegation at Lausanne, was a party) unanimously agreed in condemning the Greek occupation. The Commission furthermore decided that a Greek evacuation was necessary. This report was kept secret, and the Treaty of Sévres, which was to sanctify this wrong, was called into existence.

The Turks, exhausted by ten years of warfare, desired nothing but peace. They would have refused to entertain any idea of renewed warfare, however advantageous it might be for them. In addition, the Army had been disbanded and the Turks lacked the necessary equipment for undertaking a struggle against a modern army. They came to realise, however, even though humiliated and to a certain extent forbidden the right of living in their own capital, that the danger which menaced them was one which not only entailed the loss of certain territories, but would inevitably end in their being hunted like wild beasts to their ultimate destruction. The danger zone stretched from the shores of the Black Sea to the confines of Arabia, including the land by the Ægean and Mediterranean as far as the Caucasian Steppes. This zone was the centre of a concentrated system of torture, whose culminating point was at Smyrna, and which was directed against the heart of Turkey. The Turks watched the progress of all this with the utmost despair, and dared not raise, even amongst themselves, any question of opposition, so great were the general lassitude and the lack of necessary funds. The danger, however, grew from day to day, and it became imperative to make a stand for mere existence. It is true that Turkish peasants had picked up arms wherever and whenever they could, in order to defend their homes, but no amount of heroism was of any avail in face of the lack of proper organisation.

As previously mentioned, no one dared suggest a renewal of warfare. One man alone had the courage to do this. He was a military leader who was so little disposed to fight, and whose desire not to shed blood was so great that when commanding a force in the Dardanelles he frequently disputed the German orders to attack, unless he was convinced that the order was given from motives of defence. Thus, many times did he risk his own life in order to save his men from throwing away theirs unnecessarily. He believed the present situation to be a parallel case. This military leader, who was ready once again to risk his own life to save the life and honour of his fellow-countrymen, was Mustapha Kemal Pasha. Sent by the Constantinople Government on a mission of inspection to the Caucasian front, Mustapha Kemal found several friends at Erzeroum, in conjunction with whom he issued invitations to a congress which was to take place in Sivas. Mandatories of all Turkish provinces were also bidden. It was at this conference that the bases of the National Turkish Pact were agreed upon, and the organisation formed for the defence of Asia Minor. Following upon this, the members of the Parliament of Constantinople solemnly accepted the National Pact, and as they were prevented from exercising their mandate, they took refuge in Anatolia. The Parliament then sat in Angora, and chose as their President, Mustapha Kemal Pasha.

The sixth and last Article of the National Pact sets forth the national policy of Turkey, and must be taken as the explanation of all that Turkey is striving to attain:—

With the object of assuring our national and economic development, and in order to give the country a more modern and better organised administration, the signatories of the present Pact consider that the enjoyment of entire independence and complete liberty of action to be conditions sine qua non of our national existence. We therefore are opposed to any sort of judicial or financial restriction tending to hamper our national development.

The obligations to be imposed on us must be so organised and not be in contradiction with principles hereinbefore set forth.

These representatives of the Turkish nation, thus united in a common cause, had nothing to help them but their determination and their patriotism. The first thing to be done was to organise the Administration.

The Angora Assembly, which recognised from the very first the sovereignty of the Sultan and the authority of his officials in Asia Minor, saw the probability of great difficulties arising from that quarter. The Sultan, under foreign pressure, not only repudiated the Parliament, but even went so far as to decide on repressive measures to be taken against the Nationalist movement. It was at this juncture that the Angora Assembly voted for the organic law, which was based upon the absolute sovereignty of the people represented by the delegates at the Assembly. This ultra-democratic law placed legislative and executive powers in the hands of the Assembly. Its elected President held also the office of Chief of the Executive, an office which he exercises by means of commissaries elected by the Assembly. It so happened that the President was a great General, to whom was entrusted the post of Commander-in-Chief of the organisation for the defence of the nation.

This short survey proves conclusively once again that the Turkish Nationalist movement was in no sense a revolutionary or a political one in its inception.

The Government of the Great National Assembly thus constituted set to work at the double task of defending the country and carrying out its reorganisation. There were neither Army, nor schools, nor money nor roads, and it is a matter of pride for Turkey that in three years the National Assembly and its President have been able to accomplish marvels in all these domains. Of the Army enough is already known. As to finance, the Turkish Government has been the only one which has not printed a single banknote or treasury bill since the War. In spite of disorganisation and war, the Government had met its public expenses without having recourse to fiduciary inflation, or special taxes, or internal or external loans. Measures of rigorous economy imposed by this policy did not prevent the National Government from engaging upon works of road construction and maintenance necessary to the prosperity of the country, and to found throughout Asia Minor primary and secondary schools. In the judicial domain the Great National Assembly instituted the system of the single judge for courts of the first instance, and introduced reforms of procedure, resulting in the greatest reduction in the delays incident on legal operations.

In the administrative domain the sub-prefectures have been suppressed, and administrative autonomy has been accorded to eighty districts grouped according to commercial and economic affinities. Under the administrative reforms must be mentioned the establishment of centres of hygienic control in each of the eighty districts.

These are the great lines of the work accomplished by the Turkish people and their Government, in order to press forward along this path, which is without doubt the best to assure close understanding between Turkey and the rest of the civilised world. The Turks to-day ask that the right to live their national life free within the limits of their national frontiers should be recognised and maintained. In this consists the National Pact. A feeling of surprise may, perhaps, be engendered by the claim that Turkey's demand is only for liberty and independence, but it must be insisted that hitherto Turkey has known neither independence nor liberty. Under the name of the Capitulations Turkey has been submitted to a slavery which made her no better than an international colony in which the rights were possessed by everyone save the Turks.

The Capitulations constituted a régime of servitude which created in the country an intolerable situation. Foreigners enjoyed favours in which the citizens of the country did not share. The Capitulations, granted in the first instance as an act of magnanimity by Turkish Sovereigns, have become treaties tying the hands of Turkey, and receiving a wider and wider interpretation as Turkey became progressively more weak. The judicial capitulations gave to foreigners a kind of immunity which restrains the authority of the Turkish tribunals. Thus, in a conflict between foreign subjects, the Turkish tribunals may not intervene, and authority is vested in the Consular Courts. Each Consulate has thus its own court, and even its own prison. Furthermore, when a foreign subject enters into judicial conflict with a Turk, and appears before the Turkish Courts, the latter are obliged to admit the presence of a Dragoman from the Consulate. The privileges enjoyed by the Dragoman are generally sufficient to prevent justice being obtained by the Turk, except in the most flagrant cases. It has thus come about that foreign subjects display a most insulting arrogance towards the Turkish authorities, relying upon these privileges.

Under the financial capitulations the Turkish State was not free to modify its Customs system. It could not apply a protective tariff even in regard to specific commodities, or to cover the general commerce of Turkey. An ad valorem customs tariff was in operation before the War, which, after long and difficult negotiations, was raised to 11 per cent. This system effectively prevented the establishment of any sort of industry in Turkey. Turkey asks to-day for such a degree of freedom as will allow the reconstruction of the country, and a fair chance for the establishment of the industries for which the economic state of the country is ripe. This is a sovereign right, possessed not only by all Western countries, but even by the Balkan States, created by the dismemberment of the Turkish Empire. The issue of peace or war between East and West depends to-day upon developments on the meeting-ground of Europe and Asia. For centuries Europe has taken its stand in favour of the Christians of the Orient and against Moslem Turkey, moved in the first place by religious solidarity, and in the second by propaganda waged by superficial or impassioned observers of Moslem life and doctrine, to the effect that Islam is an enemy of human progress, and that modern civilisation has nothing to gain, either from the Turks or from Moslems in general. On this hypothesis, nothing but sympathy could greet each move to replace Moslem Empires by Christian succession States. Those whose tolerance leads them to pardon Islam its religion delivered their judgment against the Turks as doomed to give place as a nation to States less refractory to foreign ambitions. Thus, in the name of modernity, were condemned the Turks, the most maligned race in history. This is not the place to trace the genesis in history of this hatred of Turkey, which has been revealed again recently in speeches of Mr. Lloyd George in England and Mr. Hughes in America. To those who know the East, the massacres do not suffice to explain it, for undeniable testimony has proved that the Christians of the Levant played an active part in provoking these conflicts, and that history has not yet been able to apportion the moral guilt between the local conflicting races and the Great Powers who fomented the conflicts from the outside.

The Turks are pre-eminently the political people of Islam. Since they followed the Arabs as leaders of the Moslem world, they played successfully the rôle of mediator between East and West. It was Turkey that first opened the gates of Asia to Western civilisation. If one remembers that the construction of the Baghdad Railway was one of the chief causes of the international rivalry which gave birth to the War, if one remembers the clashing of greeds in Asia Minor, and if one realises that these conflicts have always had for their object predominance in Turkey, the control of Asia Minor, it is strange to reflect that so many efforts have been made to solve the Turkish question without the Turks and in spite of the Turks. The Near Eastern question can be solved only by admitting the Turks into the family of nations. The force of Turkey can become again what it was for so long—a beneficent force for the maintenance of order in Asia. If, on the other hand, the attempt to repress that force by artificial ill-advised means is persisted in, it cannot but poison the relations between Moslem Asia and the West, and will become the vanguard of revolt in the Asiatic world. Whatever may happen, the Turks possess a gateway of escape into Central Asia and the Caucasus. No measures of coercion can prevent them from withdrawing with their forces undestroyed into a vast country of Turkish race and Moslem creed. There they would still be at home and driven by despair to continue a fight, hopeless for them, but fraught with infinite danger for the peace of the world.

The Western Powers seem, above all, to hold by their economic conquest to their fragile economic conquests of the East. These conquests have lost their value, for there are forces working in the world which are putting an end to the exploitation of the rights of man; the force of arms cannot be set against the force of the spirit. The economic resources of Turkey can be useful only to Powers who recognise the value of these spiritual forces. In the East, spirit and matter form an organic whole. Recognition of the national uplifting of Turkey as an international force of the greatest political and moral value will open the door to an era of prosperity otherwise doomed to extinction even before its much-heralded birth. Turkish Nationalism is a modern force, and can find its place in the modern world, working in harmony with the desire of Western peoples for justice, for tranquillity, and for peace.

PRESS ON THE NEAR EAST.

The Egyptian Deadlock.

"What," asks the Manchester Guardian of March 29, "what are we waiting for in Egypt?" The price that we are paying for a discontented Egypt, it says, is close on ten millions, and it invites the Government to make Egypt really independent and thus relieve the taxpayer. Apart from that, however, the securities that we need in Egypt cannot be obtained from a "puppet Government" such as the one now existing; they can only be obtained from a Government really representing the Egyptian nation. And:—

Only one such Government is possible, and that is a Government which has the support of Zaghlul Pasha. . . . Zaghlul is not an extremist, but he has his own views of what is and is not consistent with the political independence of his country. He was prepared to come to terms practically on the basis of Lord Milner's able and statesmanlike report and recommendations. That was three years ago. Since then the independence of Egypt has been proclaimed in name. Is it not time to make it a reality?

But The Times is much more optimistic about the government of Yehia Ibrahim Pasha. This Prime Minister is "in favour of promulgating simultaneously a Constitution and an Indemnity Bill, without which it would be obviously impossible to abolish martial law." And, provided the reservations made in the declaration of February 28, 1922, are honoured, martial law can be abolished when the Egyptians like. The future, then, is by no means hopeless, for:—

Once martial law has been abolished the settlement of many other points will be facilitated. It should then be possible to find a position outside Cairo where the British forces may be quartered; it would also probably be generally held appropriate that the present distinguished soldier who represents Great Britain in Egypt should be succeeded by a civilian official. Nobody is better acquainted with the peculiar intricacies of Egypt's international position than Yehia Ibrahim Pasha, and it is not easy to exaggerate the number of nice adjustments which he will have to contrive before he can make Egypt both self-governing and orderly, fair to foreign interests, and not unduly dominated by them, an independent nation and yet a loyal partner in the great British Commonwealth of nations. He has the qualities of frankness and sincerity, and is known to be devoid of selfish ambitions. In Egypt even more than in other countries statesmanship is needed that will sacrifice immediate gain to ultimate achievement, and that counts popularity less than service.

The Allies and Turkey.

The New Statesman of March 24 hopes that the Conference that began at the Foreign Office on March 21 was the last act in the Near East melodrama, for it believes that the chances of a settlement are good. France must, and probably will, yield much ground over the "economic and financial clauses." As for the Turks, they—have indulged in a good deal of fierce talk; but they are anxious for peace, and we do not believe that at this stage of the proceedings they are likely to fight for shadows, if they can get the substance. But the substance—which means, in plain words, the sovereignty of the Turks in Turkey—they certainly must have. The Turk as a tiger at large proved too much for us. We shall succeed no better if we think to turn the tiger into a cross between a domestic cat and a milch-cow. In fact, we shall never make much progress until we cease to regard the Turk as any sort of a beast. We are not bound to like him; but prudence requires that we should respect him—and even his inconvenient passion for freedom.

The Outlook, on the other hand, does not rule out entirely the possibility of war. Lord Curzon's warnings to Ismet Pasha before he left Lausanne turn out now, it says, to have been bluff. It explains the secrecy that surrounded the Inter-Allied deliberations in London by fear on the part of the assembled statesmen that public opinion in their countries would be shocked by the sacrifices which they intended to make. The Italian delegates alone objected to secrecy:

Surely never in world history have negotiations with a defeated Power assumed such form as these with Turkey have taken! Angora is dictating terms to us, after Turkey has been beaten and while we occupy her capital, that would have led to immediate war if put forward before the Turks joined the Germans. In this dégringolade of our prestige in the East one gratifying fact emerges. The French, in the belief of our officials, have definitely abandoned their plans for a separate peace to our disadvantage. They smart under the trickery by which their own tricks at Lausanne were checkmated, are on cool terms with Turkey, and have decided to capitulate in loyal co-operation with their Allies. As we give up point after point, will the Turks become more and more arrogant, until we find that we can yield no more? Until this problem is resolved, war in the Near East will remain a possibility.

The Irak Problem.

To the Contemporary Review for April Mr. Charles Roberts, M.P., contributes an article upon "Withdrawal from Irak." He suggests that, though the Government cannot fix a date for evacuation and so leave Mesopotamia to anarchy, the balance of argument is for withdrawal. He rests his case upon three grounds:—(1) The ground of finance, (2) the ground that our position in Irak is strategically bad, and (3) the ground that Britain must adjust its relations anew with the Mohammedan world.

A VISIT TO THE IMPERIAL TURKISH TREASURY.

By M. A. E. ROWNTREE.

A bright oriental sun shone on the City of the Sultans, catching with its rays and lighting up the myriad shining crescents on the domes and minarets. The sea reflected the vivid blue of the sky as the P. and O. liner "Orient" sailed into the harbour with its complement of tourists come from far and near to see something of the glory of the Eastern capital. Among the passengers was one who was to be our guest at the Mission House in Stamboul. Having met and successfully guided her through the Customs, we made our way across the famous Galata Bridge and through the winding streets, over rough cobble-stones, into the heart of the city, our conveyance being one of the light paitons (phaetons) which used to be a feature of Constantinople streets. Drawn by two wiry little horses, we raced along up hill and down, with never a break to lessen our speed, till we reached our destination on the shore of the Marmora.

We were very happy that evening, for were not our guest and one of ourselves to have the privilege, on the invitation of our Ambassador, of visiting the Imperial Treasury the following day—a privilege not often granted to sightseers in those days? The next morning Mrs. B. asked me if I, too, were not going to see the wonderful collection of jewels on the Seraglio. I replied that the invitation had not included me.

"Come with us as far as the gates," she said. "You can but return if you are not allowed in. There can be no harm in making the attempt." The spirit of adventure seized me, and I went.

At the gates of the old palace grounds we were met by the Embassy cavass who had been sent to escort our party. But he was not alone. It transpired that a group of twenty British tourists had applied in the usual way for permission to visit the Treasury on this same day, and somehow it had got noised abroad in the various hotels that a permit had been granted by the palace. It seemed to us that all the tourists of every nationality had gathered round the gates, hoping that they, too, would be allowed in to view the Sultan's jewels. The officials of the Seraglio were frankly puzzled. They let us all into the grounds—we must have numbered at least two hundred—and handed round the customary coffee and cigarettes, wiring meanwhile to Yildiz to know his Majesty's commands. What was to be done with these hordes of franks (foreigners)?

Telegrams came and telegrams went, and we waited. The gardens were beautifully laid out, and the view from the Kiosk was superb; we were not sorry to have got thus far. Twelve o'clock, one o'clock, and still we wandered round the grounds and waited. By half-past one some felt the pangs of hunger and left. At two o'clock came a final telegram: "Twenty persons only may be allowed into the Treasury."

The tourists flocked round the railing guarding the small court in front of the sealed gate behind which were the treasures we were all so eager to see. The cavass secured a front place for Mrs. B. Miss — and I stood aside, feeling we could not prevent two who might never have another chance from getting in. The railing gate was unlocked, twenty persons counted and allowed in, and the rest locked out. Pending the breaking of the huge Imperial seal, we chatted through the railings with Mrs. B., and then withdrew to a low retaining wall to eat some sandwiches. The rest of the disappointed men and women dispersed, with the exception of some ten men, who lingered in the lovely surroundings, trying, no doubt, to picture to themselves the wondrous emeralds, the rubies, and the pearls their eyes were never to behold.

Some minutes passed, and then we noticed a small stir among the officials on guard. Some whispering, some shoulder-shrugging, led us to wonder what was going to happen. Presently the gate was unlocked and one of the officials came out and beckoned us. We went to meet him, and, to our amazement, were told that we were to be allowed into the Treasury. The few men who had lingered, when they saw what was happening, rushed up to the gate thinking that they, too, would get in; but they were met by a stern refusal. "No, no," said the officials; "no moosyous (messieurs), only these two hanums."

And so we passed in, and were soon feasting our eyes on the jewels which, though covered with the dust of centuries, as it seemed, filled us with wonder. Emeralds large as pigeons' eggs, lying loose in saucers, tea-cups set with rubies, strings of pearls of softest hue, thrones of ivory and tortoiseshell, with cushions embroidered in pearls and precious stones, cases full of the garments actually worn by various sultans, with swords and daggers encrusted with gems! How fascinating, how entralling it all was. It made us feel as though we had entered some enchanted ground, the realm of fairies and of gnomes, of Ali Baba and his forty thieves.

Has anyone ever really understood the mind of the Turk? I wonder. It works in a mysterious way, and is calculated to baffle the matter-of-fact Westerner. An Imperial iradé had gone forth to the effect that twenty persons only were to be allowed in. A handful of minor officials had gone past the iradé, had taken pity on two mere women, and twenty-two people saw the Imperial Treasury that day.

NOTES AND NEWS.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The New Conference.

The course of developments that has led up to the agreement between the Allies and Turkey to resume negotiations at Lausanne cannot fail to inspire considerable hope that at long last we are in sight of peace. The first Lausanne Conference broke down mainly over economic questions. The Allies have now decided to invite those of their nationals who are interested in the matter to enter into negotiations with the Turkish Government with a view to a settlement on the lines of the provisions in the draft Treaty. It is an innovation of a most interesting character, and one which would seem to hold out every prospect of a satisfactory issue. If those who have done business in Turkey for years cannot bring home the other point of view to the Turks, then it is certain that no one can, and it is equally certain that the Turks are likely to feel greater confidence (to say nothing of friendliness) in dealing with those who have long been associated with their country. One can only hope that once negotiations open they will be pushed on with all possible speed, for the delay in signing the Treaty has done an infinity of harm to the revival of trade and to reconstruction generally throughout the Near East.

Britain, America, and Turkey.

Once peace with Turkey is a fait accompli British business men will have to bestir themselves as they have never done before if this country is to maintain its traditional position in Asia Minor. While we have been vainly seeking a formula for peace the Americans seem to have been seeking one for a universal concession in Turkey. Their great project, to some details of which I have already referred, is understood to cover a concession at Mosul, a great programme of railway and port construction, mining enterprises, the importation of agricultural machinery (American, of course), and last, but not least, the development of Angora after the model of Washington. No doubt other plans are included or are in view, but those specified are quite extensive enough to prejudice the future relations of the Allies with Turkey if that country agreed to their being carried out by America. If an agreement has not yet been reached it is only, as I have already pointed out, because Turkey is looking to the Allies, and, in particular, to Great Britain, for further help, and it is "up to" our business men, once the opportunity is open to them, to show the Turks that their enterprise is not one whit less than that of our friends across the water.

Roumanian Oil.

At the meeting of the Steaua Romana (British), Ltd., Sir Charles Greenway described the handicaps with which the oil industry in Roumania has had to contend. He strongly criticised the continuance of the policy of maximum internal prices for oil, grain, and other products, and of export duties and other restrictions on exports, and declared that this policy "has killed, or, if not killed, has rendered barren for the time being, the goose which would otherwise have laid the golden eggs which Roumania so very badly needs at the present time." As illustrating the ridiculous position of internal prices, Sir Charles pointed out that the maximum price of light spirit in Roumania is to-day only £3 11s. per ton, whereas the cost to import a similar quantity of spirit into the United Kingdom, or France, or elsewhere from the United States is about £16 per ton. He added that "it is obvious that some radical change will have to be made before long, or companies will necessarily have to restrict their production by working only wells which give a very large yield, and will have no inducement at all to spend the large sums now required, particularly when measured in lei, for drilling new wells which may prove unprofitable to work."

The Aswan Dam Inscription.

The effacing of the well-known inscription on the Aswan Dam, which is reported by the Cairo correspondent of the Morning Post, cannot fail to create a most unfavourable impression among the friends and well-wishers of Egypt. The inscription, it may be recalled, reads as follows:—"This dam was designed and built by British engineers. Egyptians, assisted by Greeks, excavated to the rock foundations and built the rubble masonry. Skilled Italian workmen dressed the granite Ashler." A clue to the reason for the act, which, one presumes, is the work of the unruly section of the populace, is no doubt to be found in the first of the three sentences. It is, in short, a singularly puerile attempt to minimise British work in Egypt, as clever, indeed, as it would be to erase the signature on a Rembrandt and to imagine that the picture would then be attributed to an unknown.

The Indian Budget.

Considering the general conditions that have obtained in India for a number of years, it was perhaps not surprising that the Budget should have been regarded as a suitable occasion for obstructive tactics by a large section of Indian politicians. The Budget contained one provision that seemed to them to offer scope for criticism—the increase in the salt duty, which, it will be remembered, was rejected on a previous occasion. This time they would have none of it, and the Bill duly went to the Council of State, who passed it, and it was then submitted to the Legislative Assembly for further consideration. Again the Bill suffered the same fate, and the Governor-General has met the situation by certifying the Bill, an action which has inevitably called forth criticism throughout the Indian Press. It was, in the circumstances, the only course open. What India's politicians appear to overlook is that it is essential that the Budget should be made to balance. They condemned the increased salt duty, but they offered no practical alternative method of taxation. The provisions as they stand should enable India to pay her way, while the incidence of the salt tax will be inappreciable—except viewed through political spectacles. It is noteworthy, incidentally, as a contemporary points out, that when recently there was an increase in the cotton duties, which really affected the population, there was no outcry at all.

The Egyptian Budget.

Details of the Egyptian and Sudan Budgets are now available. The Egyptian Budget provides for a surplus of £E550,000, revenue being estimated at £E34,905,000 and expenditure at £E34,355,000. In 1922-23 the anticipated surplus of £E2,190,000 has been largely exceeded, and, it is understood, will amount to about £E6,250,000. Given a continued improvement in the general world trade position and satisfactory conditions in Egypt itself, there is every reason to anticipate that a year hence the surplus will again be satisfactory.

Sudan Finance.

The Sudan Budget totals £E3,465,000 for revenue and expenditure, a decrease of £E415,000 as compared with last year. The Sudan has suffered severely from the trade depression, and its effect on the revenue has made necessary the most stringent economy to balance the Budget. It is only a passing phase, but it is unfortunate that at a period so important in the country's development the question of economy should be pre-eminent. Happily, the returning tide of trade is likely to affect no country more favourably than the Sudan, and in view of the present outlook generally it is not too optimistic to look for a much more satisfactory position a year hence.

Indian Trade.

The recommendation of the Inchcape Committee with regard to the Indian Trade Commissionership has been duly carried into effect, and the offices of the Commissioner have been transferred to the office of the High Commissioner for India at 42, Grosvenor Gardens. There are obvious disadvantages in being so far away from the City, but these will be largely minimised by the generous action of the London Chamber of Commerce in placing accommodation at the disposal of the Commissioner at the Chamber, where he will attend twice weekly—on Tuesdays and Fridays.

TURKEY.

Constantinople, March 20.

New Stamp Law.

The new Government is probing all avenues with the object of increasing revenue. In the matter of custom duties, a specific tariff is now in force which ranges from five to fifteen times that of the similar tariff which existed from 1916 to 1921, and replaces the 11 per cent. ad valorem duty which has been in operation since the latter year.

As from the 1st of this month, considerable alterations have been made in the Stamp Law. In principle the fixed duties have been trebled, and the proportional duties doubled. The Stamp Law in Turkey is a somewhat complicated affair, if only by reason of the very extensive use that is made of this form of taxation, and it is extremely difficult for the ordinary individual, and even business people, to grasp its many intricacies, and to avoid breaking the law and incurring the consequent fines. A few examples will bear out this statement:—

(1) Every form of programme, circular, catalogue, or prospectus printed or written and distributed requires a 6 para stamp.

(2) Any form of notice (from a simple reminder such as "Smoking is prohibited" upwards) on paper or cardboard, drawn up by individuals and exposed in public places—15 para stamp.

(3) Any notice similar to the foregoing, appearing on material other than paper or cardboard, needs stamps for each year that it is exposed, according to its size. Thus, for $\frac{1}{2}$ square metre, $1\frac{1}{2}$ piastres, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to 1 metre, 3 piastres, over 1 metre, 15 piastres for each square metre per annum.

(4) The originals of all advertisements appearing in newspapers or periodicals, from 3 piastres for one insertion up to 60 piastres for fifty insertions and over.

(5) Contracts for the hiring or renting of anything from a church pew to a safe-deposit locker: Up to £T20, 3 piastres per annum; £T20 to £T50, 6 piastres; £T50 to £T100, 9 piastres; over £T100, 15 piastres.

The above are a few instances which tend to show how easy it is for the uninitiated to become a defaulter unawares under the Stamp Law.

It was recently pointed out to the writer by concrete cases of default that if one firm sends a typewritten circular to another firm advising it that its offices will be closed on a certain day that letter requires a stamp.

Then there are the ordinary fixed stamp duties with which one is familiar in most countries:—Cheques, $1\frac{1}{2}$ piastres; ordinary receipts, 30 paras up to £T1, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ piastres for sums over £T1. In this country, however, tradesmen and others in sending in their bills have to affix to the bill a 15 para stamp for the privilege (although it may never be paid!); waybills and bills of lading, 3 piastres; letters of procuration, 30 piastres; general powers of attorney, 60 piastres; bank pass-books and bank deposit receipts have to bear a $1\frac{1}{2}$ piastres stamp; protests, 9 piastres; theatre, concert, and ball tickets—tickets up to 40 piastres each, 3 piastres, and those of over 40 piastres, 6 piastres.

If one calculates Turkey's new stamp duties in English currency at the present rate of exchange they do not appear excessive; yet, owing to the much larger field of private and business activities over which they operate, it cannot be denied that the Turkish stamp-payer is worse off.

EGYPT'S NEW BUDGET.

Financial Position Satisfactory.

Cairo, March 24.

The Council of Ministers this morning passed the Budget for 1923-1924, only just in time, however, to comply with the law which lays down that the Budget must be promulgated before March 25.

Revenue is estimated at £E34,905,000 and expenditure at £E34,355,000, leaving an anticipated surplus of £E550,000. Compared with the last Budget, there is an increase of £E1,275,000 in revenue and of £E2,915,000 in expenditure. Incidentally it is interesting to note that the past financial year, for which a surplus of £E2,190,000 was budgeted, will close with a surplus of about £E6,250,000, due to an increase in estimated receipts, and a considerable decrease in budgeted expenditure. To a great extent the last year's surplus is due to the non-completion of work which should have been completed in the financial year. Provision has had to be made for the necessary credits for the finishing of these works in the new Budget on which the expenditure side has correspondingly been inflated.

Revenue.

The chief items on the revenue side are:—Direct taxes, £E5,615,000; customs dues, £E10,211,000; judicial and registration fees, £E2,206,000; railways, £E6,796,000; post office, £E610,000; State domains, £E782,000; Ghaffir cess, £E1,381,000; interest on funds, £E1,279,000; miscellaneous receipts, £E1,435,000; cotton taxes, £E1,178,000; extraordinary receipts, £E461,000; regrading arrears, £E1,250,000. The principal increases are under Customs, £E447,000 (the actual figure is, however, less than the total realised in the current financial year), and interest on funds £E218,000, due to the fact that the 1923-1924 surplus will have to be invested and extra dividends will accrue. On the other hand, decreases are expected in railways, £E604,000, due to the effect of the economic situation on traffic and a possible revision of the goods tariff, and £E180,000 in sale of land, due to diminished demand.

Expenditure.

The chief and most interesting items on the expenditure side are: King's Civil List and Household, £E737,000; Legislative Assembly, £E244,000; Ministry of Foreign Affairs, £E134,000; Education, £E1,351,000; Public Health, £E789,000; Ministry of Justice, £E1,455,100; Irrigation, £E2,712,000; Railways, £E4,109,000; Police, £E1,275,000; Ghaffirs, £E1,416,000; War Office, £E1,891,000; Pensions and Indemnities, £E1,465,000; regraded salaries arrears, £E1,250,000; Public Debt, £E4,616,000; and High Cost of Living Indemnity, £E1,550,000.

Of the increases, the following are noteworthy:—King's Civil List, £E104,000, mainly for repair work at the palaces of Abdin and Ras El Tin; Legislative Assembly, £E203,000 for the allowances to be paid to the members of the two new Houses of Parliament; Ministry of Foreign Affairs, £E115,000, of which £E100,000 is for foreign representation; Public Instruction, £E142,000; Irrigation, £E434,000, mostly for new works, which reach a total of £E1,004,000; Railways, £E732,000, mainly for new works and increased pay; Police, £E288,000, mainly increased pay; Pension and Indemnities, £E398,000, of which £E350,000 is for payment of special compensations to retiring foreign officials; arrears of regraded salaries, £E750,000, to meet the cost of the general regrading of the service which is expected to come into complete operation during the coming financial year. The most noteworthy decrease in expenditure is in regard to high cost of living allowances, which are to be reduced by £E950,000 during the year.

With regard to the regrading of the service, an item of £E500,000 was included in last year's Budget, but not drawn on owing to delay in completing the work. The Government has very wisely decided to deduct from last year's surplus not only the amount unexpended in 1922-1923, but also the extra amount earmarked in this connection for 1923-1924, i.e., a total of £E1,250,000, and open a special reserve fund for this purpose. It is this amount which figures as a receipt under this heading on the revenue side; the balance of the surplus, approximately £E5,000,000, will be carried to the general reserve.

The Finance Committee, in submitting its usual note covering the Budget, draws attention to several features. The first is that if the Army, Police, Ghaffirs, Railways, Telephones, and Telegraphs are eliminated, the salary bill amounts to £E7,562,000, or 56 per cent. of the total normal expenditure of the various Government departments. This proportion it considers somewhat high, and it is of opinion that an investigation into the number of officials employed might be productive of substantial economy.

The second point is that normal receipts exceed permanent expenditure by £E5,600,000. And the third is that there are conditions which might quite possibly produce a diminution in certain heads of revenue which are generally considered as normal, and that a portion of the extraordinary expenditure, of which new works afford the most striking example, is, in fact, recurrent expenditure.

Nevertheless, bearing in mind the restricted scope of action enjoyed at present by the Egyptian Government in the matter of revenue, either for the requirements of the general administrations or for those of the municipal bodies, the Finance Committee regards the financial position of the State as quite satisfactory.

ROUMANIAN LOANS.

Messrs. J. Henry Schroder and Co. are instructed by the Roumanian Legation in London to state that a Commission has recently arrived in London for the purpose of marking for identification the bonds of Roumanian Loans held by British subjects, of which the coupon service has not yet been fully resumed. This work will commence on April 5 and will finish on April 20. No extension will be allowed. Holders of British nationality should deposit their applications, together with the bonds and the documents, with Messrs. Schroder and Co., 145, Leadenhall Street, E.C., before April 20.

During the three months ended December 31 Czechoslovakia exported 130,558 tons of sugar.

An exhibition of Persian Arts and Crafts is to be held during this year at Teheran. The Persian Ministry of Public Works has formed a committee to decide upon the nature of the exhibits and the definite dates of exhibition.

The question of installing in Greece carpet looms to be operated by refugees is reported to be under discussion at the Ministry of National Economy (says an American Consular report). The Press is of the opinion that such a plan if put into effect would result in reviving in Greece an industry that had flourished in Asia Minor, and would provide work for many refugees in a trade in which they were trained.

The Marley Hill Chemical Company.

Among the companies that have played a leading part in the last few years in placing the chemical industry in this country on a firm basis is the Marley Hill Chemical Company, Ltd. Some particulars regarding this company should be of interest to readers of THE NEAR EAST. The works of the company, which are situated at Marley Hill, Swalwell, Co. Durham, were built in 1907-8, and consist of 90 Hussener-type regenerative cooking ovens, a tar distillery, a benzol refinery, and plant for the manufacture of sulphate of ammonia and sulphuric acid.

The company makes all its coke from the well-known Marley Hill coking coals, and consequently the coke is of a very uniform character. The coal is compressed, after being loaded into the ovens, thus giving to the coke that denseness of composition which is one of the chief desiderata in metallurgical coke. Before being charged into the ovens, the coal is crushed finely and washed, so as to remove most of the impurities. It is then mechanically loaded into the ovens and roasted for a period varying from 36 to 48 hours. When it has been sufficiently carbonised, the charge in the oven is pushed out by means of an electrically driven ram on to a sloping bench of concrete covered with steel plates. The charge of coke breaks up, and the heated coke slides down the bench till arrested by iron gates at the bottom. It is then quenched with water, the gates are opened, and the coke slides gently on to a continuous band conveyor, which carries it along to the end of the bench and deposits it on to a series of screens. These separate the coke into three sizes: large coke for metallurgical purposes, coke nuts for small forges, central heating, and domestic use, and coke breeze used for concrete making and other such purposes.

The gas driven off during the process of carbonisation is collected in a large iron gas main running along the top of the ovens and passed through scrubbers which remove the tar and benzol. The ammonia in the gas is also extracted and converted by treatment with sulphuric acid into sulphate of ammonia, which is one of the best known fertilisers. The gas, thus stripped of its useful products, goes back to the battery of the ovens, where it is mixed with a suitable proportion of air, ignited, and passes through flues in the oven walls to carry out the carbonisation of fresh charges of coal. After passing through the oven flues, the gas is used to heat the boilers which drive two 650 kw. turbo-alternators, which provide electricity for carrying on the whole of the processes in use at the works.

From the time the coal is mined in the pits until the finished products of carbonisation are packed on rail for transport neither coals, coke, nor any of the by-products are handled by manual labour. The tar extracted from the gases passes into the tar distillery, where it is subjected to a continuous distillation at varying temperatures. The chief distillates recovered by this treatment are anthracene of various kinds, naphthalene, solvent naphtha, creosote, and pitch. These, together with the benzol, are sold by the company in the crude or semi-refined state, and are used by various other manufacturers in the production of innumerable substances, such as aniline dyes, disinfectants, explosives, fuels, medicines, perfumes, and other essences. By far the largest and most important part of the company's work, however, consists in the production of coke, which amounts to 140,000 tons a year, and is sold to foundries and blast furnaces at home and in France, Belgium, and other parts of the Continent. Occasional shipments also go to South America.

Importance of Correct Valve Equipment.

When purchasing an inner tube, it must be remembered that in nine cases out of ten the valve fitment supplied will be of a length intended to fit artillery spoked wheels. Such valves are generally too long for satisfactory performance on wire or disc wheels. In addition to having an unsightly appearance, they often cause much difficulty by fouling the spokes or the disc, and thus hampering the use of an inflater, a tyre pressure gauge, or the valve hood. Users often put up with this in ignorance of the fact that there is no need for them to be inconvenienced in this manner. The Dunlop Company supplies inner tubes fitted with valves of suitable length for all types of wheels. This is done as part of the standard programme, and does not involve any extra cost to the user. The valves provided are: (1) Short length for wire or disc wheels; (2) standard length suitable for artillery spoked wheels, steel or wood; (3) special long length suitable for the demountable rim equipment used on many American cars.

COPPER ORES.

A new volume on Copper Ores, in the series of Monographs on Mineral Resources, with special reference to the British Empire, issued under the direction of the Mineral Resources Committee of the Imperial Institute, has just been published by Mr. John Murray (price 7s. 6d.). It is written by Mr. Robert Allen, M.A. (Cantab.), B.Sc. (Lond), M.Inst.M.M., of the Scientific and Technical Department of the Imperial Institute.

It is believed that during the war, more than half the world's output of copper was used for military purposes. During the latter half of the war Germany could not obtain a sufficient supply for her needs, and, to a large extent, used such substitutes as electrolytic iron, aluminium, and zinc. It was thought that after the war the last two metals would largely replace copper, but they have not done so to the extent predicted, and the consumption of copper would appear to be steadily increasing.

The first chapter of the monograph deals briefly with copper ores and their associations; the enrichment and classification of copper deposits; the mining and metallurgy, prices, properties and uses, control and world's production of the metal. In the second chapter the chief copper deposits of the British Empire are described, particularly those of British Columbia, Manitoba, North-West Territories, and Ontario, in Canada; of Newfoundland; and of Queensland, South Australia, and Tasmania. The third chapter deals with the principal copper deposits of foreign countries, notably Finland, Germany, Norway, Russia (including the Caucasus and Siberia), Spain, Yugoslavia, China, Japan, Korea (Chosen), Belgian Congo, Cuba, Mexico, United States, Argentine, Chile, and Peru. The monograph is illustrated with six diagrams and a map showing the copper-bearing localities referred to in the text, and has about 300 references to publications on copper.

It is reported that negotiations are in progress for the opening of a Russo-American Bank, with the co-operation of the Ukrainian Government and a group of English financiers, with a capital of 2,000,000 gold roubles.

THE FUTURE OF ALBANIA.

Opportunities for Enterprise.

H.M. Chargé d'Affaires at Durazzo has forwarded to the Department of Overseas Trade the following report on the present position in Albania:—

Albania is definitely a country awaiting development. It is, moreover, a country where British enterprise and capital would be welcomed warmly. Up to now various factors have resulted in the calling-in of Austrians and Italians to assist in the development of the country, but there is now a strong desire to secure Englishmen.

The step first in importance is the construction of roads. The country is intersected by a few main roads constructed by the various military occupations during the war. They were all of a temporary nature, and have fallen into such disrepair that during the winter months communications are frequently interrupted. Efforts to put them in order made by the Albanian Government, with the assistance of foreign engineers, have failed miserably. Apart from these, the roads are simply cattle-tracks. Consequently it is extremely difficult to effect the transport of produce between one part of the country and another, or even between the interior and the coast, and therefore road-construction must inevitably be the first step in Albania's development. It is understood that the present Foreign Minister is to be charged with the general supervision of road-repair and construction during the coming year, and he certainly would be eager to give contracts for the work.

Closely allied with the question of roads is that of railways. The Austrian armies left here a small "Decauville" system, which might be put in order and developed. As things are at present, the trade—internal and external—of the country is not sufficient to enable a normal gauge line to pay its way. The "Decauville" system, however, would probably prove in the course of a year or so an economical means of transport between the coast and the agricultural centres in the interior. It is possible that a company might find the restoration and the running of those lines a profitable enterprise.

Then comes the matter of harbour development. While this cannot be said to be pressing, it will become so as soon as other steps in developing the country have been taken. At Valona, Durazzo, and San Giovanni di Medua roadsteads exist which could be made into good harbours. What is needed at present is the construction of a jetty at Durazzo where steamers could come alongside. Such a work might well be undertaken by a firm constructing roads or laying railways. It might even be a necessity for the proper carrying-out of these projects, as at present heavy materials, such as large girders, parts of machinery and so on, can only be landed with the greatest difficulty and risk of loss.

A further step will be the drainage of marsh lands. There are about eight hundred square miles of these (this figure is very rough), and they would probably be very fertile tracts when drained. Concessions to do the work could be easily obtained. These areas might prove to be well adapted for the growing of both cotton and sugar-beet. An Englishman who was here in the autumn, who has had experience of Egypt, gave it as his personal opinion that cotton grown here might be sold in England at least as cheaply as the Egyptian-grown product. So far a little has been done but Albania's possibilities as a cotton-producing country should be examined by someone qualified to give an expert opinion.

There are large forest areas in the country, many of which have been partially spoiled by indiscriminate felling in the past, and will require careful nursing if they are to regain their value. On the other hand, there are areas which might be exploited immediately. The trees are oak, beech, elm, chestnut, walnut, and pine for the most part. In many places the timber could be floated down to the coast during certain seasons of the year. Other forests are situated within easy reach of the sea, but in some places transport would present difficulties. There are no sawmills in the country. On the whole, there is a great deal of land suitable for timber production. All over the country the hills are covered with scrub, the remains of forests which have disappeared on account of the reckless use made of them by the peasants; these, I imagine, could be cleared and replanted with profit were they covered by a concession which included other forest-lands and stretched over a sufficient period of years. A German firm lately applied for a concession for a certain area, and offered the following terms:—The Government was to receive for every cubic metre taken in the rough, of oak, 6 gold francs; of pine, 5 gold francs; of all other woods, 4½ gold francs. The contract has not been signed so far, as no agreement has yet been reached on certain of its provisions. This gives some indication of the kind of price expected.

Tobacco, of which a sample can be examined in the Enquiry Room, Department of Overseas Trade, will in future constitute one of the principal industries of this country. A concession for exploiting it was obtained by an Englishman eighteen months ago, but he failed to raise the capital to proceed with the project. If the tobacco concession is again to be secured, it must be done by a firm which is able and ready to set to work at once. This is perhaps the most promising of Albania's assets.

The mineral wealth of this country cannot be estimated even approximately at present. Last year an English mining engineer, acting on information supplied by the Albanian Government, visited a good many localities where it is claimed there are important deposits of coal, copper, gold, and so forth. His reports were not encouraging. To ascertain what there was and what there was not in the country would have necessitated prospecting, which he was not inclined to undertake. The Government is at present considering the adoption of a mining law, which is really the Bulgarian law with certain minor modifications, designed to meet local conditions and to simplify its practical application.

The Albanian Government is quite unable to pay for any development of the country, and until it is developed to a certain extent there are no assets which would enable them to float a loan. They can, therefore, only proceed by granting concessions, or alternatively by asking a firm to advance them money which is to be expended in works for which the contract has been given to that firm. They are ready to act on either of these lines.

On the other hand, it is probable that a good deal of local capital would be subscribed in small blocks for the establishment of such industrial works as oil refineries, sawmills, tanneries, breweries, and so on. Under this head may be put schemes of electrical development. While it would certainly be possible to instal hydraulic power stations capable of supplying either the whole country, or the individual provinces, with electrical energy, the demand for many years will not be sufficient to warrant the erection of plants on such a scale. Hence the development of water-power may be classed as local enterprise. As such it would be productive. Only two towns in the country are lit with electricity. Further, electric power might be employed for the "Decauville" system mentioned above. Similarly, the establishment of water supplies for the towns should prove profitable.

More or less throughout the country is found a heavy tenacious clay well adapted for brick-making. Bricks are made in certain quantities for local use, but the methods are primitive, and the very worst is made of the material. Certain clays in the neighbourhood of Durazzo and elsewhere are said to be admirable for porcelain manufacture.

The imports of Albania come largely from the three neighbouring countries of Italy, Yugoslavia, and Greece. A very high tariff on all imports is in existence at present, but is merely a temporary measure, being a somewhat clumsy expedient to promote non-existing industries in the country. The chief articles of import are the following:—Tea, coffee, sugar, rice, flour, currants, raisins, beer, wine, spirits, naphtha, paraffin, refined oil, thick oils, paints, sawn wood, cement, ironware, glassware, crockery, cloth stuffs, flannel, cotton thread. This is merely a representative list, and many items might be added.

The exports are principally sent to Italy, Greece, Malta, and Egypt. They are:—Maize, beans, linseed (a little linen is manufactured each year, but not enough to suffice for local needs), oats, barley, olives, olive oil, lemons, oranges, milk, cheese, butter, eggs, hay, leaf tobacco, wool, hides, furs, poultry (largely turkeys), fish, sheep, pigs, buffaloes, cattle, mules, asses, horses, firewood, charcoal, bitumen, canes, scrap copper.

There are two things necessary to stimulate trade between Albania and Great Britain. The first is the establishment of banking facilities. At present these do not exist in any form whatsoever. It is of the first importance that some bank or other should commence operations here by establishing a branch in Durazzo. Its opportunities of doing business would be great, and would increase. A British bank, with English personnel, would enjoy a very considerable advantage. It is not suggested that any large outlay should be entailed originally, but simply that a small branch office should be established. A bank with a strong Manchester connection would probably do well.

The second essential is that an English line of steamers should call at Durazzo. At first, of course, expenses even might not be covered, but in course of time business would increase. The Lloyd Triestino and Puglia lines, which have a practical monopoly of the Albanian foreign and coastal trade, do not appear to be adequate for the trade, and so a great deal of work is effected by small schooners. These, again, cannot make voyages in bad weather, and are generally uncertain in their sailings. Much of this traffic would be absorbed in time. One of the lines which work to Patras or Corfu might extend their run up this coast, or a line might be started between Malta and the Dalmatian ports. They would probably secure almost immediately the Malta and Egyptian trade. It is worth considering in any project of this kind that there is a certain amount of passenger traffic to be taken into account, which is swollen in the summer by tourists visiting Corfu and the Dalmatian coast. In view of the favourable exchanges this will probably increase to a great extent during the next few years.

SCARCITY OF MAIZE IN ALBANIA.

Advices from Albania state that, in consequence of the poor harvest in 1922, and of subsequent damage by floods, there is great scarcity of maize. The price of maize bread in Central Albania was one Italian lira per oke a year ago. It is now rapidly approaching three lire, and in certain districts has reached four. To alleviate the distress the Albanian Government have given permission to the municipalities (Durazzo, Tirana, Elbasan, and Valona are, it is understood, the towns likely to have municipalities), but not to private merchants, to import maize free of duty, and one million kilograms have been ordered from Roumania. It is believed that there will be a considerable shortage of maize until June, when the year's harvest will ripen.

Mr. A. Sheaver, manager of Messrs. Armstrong-Vickers, The Arsenal, Constantinople, has returned to Drumchapel, Glasgow, on leave.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Business Fluctuating.

The Commercial Co. of Egypt in their report for the week ended March 23 state: Since our last report the futures market has fluctuated within a rather wide range, but closes firm at about last week's quotations. Early in the week the market showed great activity, but prices were apparently pushed too high and spinners did not appear willing to follow the rise; a slackening of the demand ensued which, coupled with the small reaction in New York during the last two days, caused small speculators to liquidate the positions which the recent improved tone had induced them to open, with the result that under pressure of these liquidations prices receded sharply. The spot market has not followed the drop in futures, and as holders of cotton do not show any anxiety to sell, we do not think that the decline will be more than temporary. The arrivals from the interior again show a falling off, and as exports have been fairly heavy the stock in Alexandria shows a further reduction and stands now at 2,001,000 kantars as against 2,301,000 kantars at the same date last year. Many of the ginning factories in the interior have already closed down for the season, and the small amount of cotton still to come down will not weigh on the market. On the other hand, as spinners have been buying so far only their immediate needs, a fair and continuous demand is likely during the coming months, which will mean a steady reduction of the present stocks. Assuming that for the balance of the season as much cotton will be exported as during the same period last year, viz., 1,880,000 kantars, and allowing that a further 250,000 kantars will come down from the interior, we are confronted with a very bullish statistical position as the carry-over in Alexandria at the end of August will probably be only about 400,000 kantars with a negligible quantity held up-country, whereas the total stocks in Alexandria and the interior at the end of the last season were probably more than 2,000,000 kantars.

Spot.—Total sales this week amount to about 11,200 bales, of which we estimate 7,700 bales Sakellarides, 3,400 bales uppers, and 100 bales white.

Sakellarides.—Sellers have been very reluctant to follow the drop in futures, and the turnover of business has accordingly been comparatively small. All grades have been dealt in, but buyers still show a preference for fully good fair and fully good fair to good, although there has also been a fair demand for good; the premiums paid for these cottons remain about unchanged.

Medium and low grades are still sought after, but, as mentioned in our previous reports, lack of supplies restrict business, and holders have rather exaggerated ideas as to prices.

Uppers.—The demand for this variety remains small and covers all grades; staple cotton is becoming rather more difficult to find. The price of spot against contracts remains unchanged.

White.—A small business has been done in this variety.

Crop, 1923.—Sowing is proceeding under normal conditions; if anything it is, on an average, slightly earlier than in the years 1921 and 1922. The climatic conditions have not been favourable these last few days, and a continuation of these conditions may further affect the good germination of the seed already sown. The proportion of varieties other than Sakellarides sown so far in the Delta varies extremely from district to district. It is as yet impossible to give reliable figures, but it seems probable that the average proportion of other varieties will be between 15 and 20 per cent.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Market Unsettled.

The considerable break in futures, which constitutes the feature of the past week, has naturally unsettled our spot market, and a considerable falling off in the paper inquiry has been the result; nevertheless, the fact remains that the amount of actual business reported has shown but little variation from the totals of previous weeks. This proves that a good, steady business is taking place in Egyptian cotton, which even a drop of over a penny a pound is unable to derange. The prices of spot cotton, in fact, have shown considerable resistance to the decline, and in many cases buyers, who came into the market expecting to obtain advantage of the full decline in futures, have been disappointed. Official quotations are reduced 50 points only, but certain grades, notably Fully Good Fair Sakellaridis, can be purchased at prices well under those quoted.

Sakellaridis has been chiefly in request, the inquiry running in two well-defined grooves—viz., 16½d.-17½d. and 18d.-18½d. Uppers, 16½d.-16¾d. have also been in fair request, but buyers have not been keen; in fact, generally speaking, the tendency all round has been to await developments after the Easter holidays. The rest of the somewhat limited inquiry has been of a very patchy description, and has covered Brown, Tokar, Arizona, and White cottons. In only a few cases, however, was the demand pressed home, and hardly sufficient business has resulted to test prices. Low cottons have been rather a drag in the market. C.i.f. business has been very quiet. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending 23rd inst., 13,322 bales. Total sales, 3,000 bales (including 50 Sudan). Quotations are reduced 50 points all round; F.G.F. Sakellaridis to-day 17.50d. per lb.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

The Holiday Aspect.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended March 31 states:—

The last week has been broken into by the Easter holidays, and for all practical purposes trading may be said to have been confined to the first three days, as, in the present state of affairs, a great many people commenced the holiday early and will, no doubt, extend it beyond the usual period next week.

The fall in the price of raw cotton which commenced last week has been continued, and business is likely to be more than usually quiet pending some measure of stability.

Yarn.—Spinners are still in the firmer mood recently noted. They have endeavoured to retain for themselves a part of the advantage from lower raw material, and, it is believed, with some success, although the small amount of business passing renders inevitable considerable differences of experience in this respect. Local weavers are buying very sparingly, and export trade continues small.

Cloth.—The state of the raw cotton market renders almost impossible any great activity in this section. The difference between the price of "spot" cotton and that for delivery a few months hence is so great as to render dangerous any purchases except for almost immediate requirements. Inquiry has been on a modest scale and generally speaking for small lots.

There is talk of organised short time in the weaving industry, a proposal even being made that mills in the Burnley district should close down for a month.

No particular foreign outlet calls for special mention.

Raw Cotton.—The tone has been most unsettled, and violent fluctuations have taken place. For the moment the speculative element in America appears to be exceedingly nervous, and there has been a large amount of selling of this nature. Whilst the fall in prices temporarily disorganises markets on this side and reduces the values of stocks held, there is little doubt that, generally speaking, it is welcome; it is felt that if the raw material could be obtained at lower prices, it would be possible for a larger business to be done here. Closing prices are as follows:—American Fully Middling, 14.90d.; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 17.40d.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS

Nablus, February 24.

The market is quiet. The price of soap having further fallen in Egypt from P.310 to P.290, oil in our market has also dropped in price. Business in cereals has been practically nil this week.

Jerusalem, March 3.

The tourist season is in full swing, and there is a small improvement in the financial situation in consequence.

Haifa, March 3.

The grain market (dari and sesame) has been more active than during the past week. 400 tons of dari were sold to Algiers at a remunerative price. These goods will be despatched in the course of next week.

YUGOSLAVIA'S IMPORTS OF ALUMINIUM.

The Belgrade journal Privredni Pregled gives the following particulars regarding the importation of aluminium into Yugoslavia for the first half of 1922:—

"During the first six months of 1922 902 kilos of aluminium, of a value of 20,100 dinars, were imported from Austria in the form of blocks, bars, grains, and cast in plates. The import of wrought aluminium and rolled aluminium in rods, sheets, and blocks, and also of pieces cast in special shapes but not further worked, from Austria amounted to 668 kilos, of a value of 23,530 dinars. The import of aluminium articles under special headings, and also of aluminium articles in combination with other materials in so far as not subject to some other special treatment at Customs, amounted to:—From Austria, 21,652 kilos, value 1,022,994 dinars; from Greece, 808 kilos, value 29,300 dinars; from Italy, 38 kilos, value 2,444 dinars; Germany, 6,473 kilos, value 397,612 dinars; Hungary, 403 kilos, value 23,650 dinars; France, 9 kilos, value 500 dinars; Czecho-Slovakia, 623 kilos, value 33,250 dinars; England, 1 kilo, value 100 dinars; Fiume, 1 kilo, value 44 dinars; total, 30,008 kilos, value 1,509,864 dinars. The export of bauxite during the last eleven months of 1922 was as follows:—Into Austria, 39,360 kilos, value 4,000 dinars; Germany, 22,039,260 kilos, value 2,644,300 dinars; United States of America, 21,250 kilos, value 2,600 dinars; France, 100 kilos, value 50 dinars; Holland, 7,925,000 kilos, value 955,000 dinars; total, 30,014,972 kilos, value 3,605,960 dinars."

GREEK CITRUS FRUIT CROP.

The 1922 crop of citrus fruits in Greece evidences a marked increase over that of 1921 (says an American consular report). The number of oranges picked was 152,000,000, compared with 53,000,000 in 1921; mandarins, 63,000,000, compared with 18,000,000 in 1921; and lemons, 49,000,000, compared with 31,000,000 in 1921. The total production of all citrus fruits amounted to 264,000,000 pieces, compared with 102,000,000 in 1921, an increase of 159 per cent.

The Samnuggur Titaghur and Victoria Jute Companies have declared a final dividend of 20 per cent. on the ordinary shares, making 30 per cent. for the year.

COMPANY MEETING.

STEUAU ROMANA (BRITISH) LIMITED.

La Situation du Pétrole en Roumanie.

La seconde assemblée générale annuelle du Steaua Romana (British), Limited, eut lieu le 28 Mars au Winchester House, E.C.

Sir Charles Greenway, Bt., le président, expliqua que pendant la période couverte par le rapport, le 30 Juin 1922, la Compagnie Roumaine avait en plus augmenté son capital par une émission de 20.000 actions de 500 lei chaque. Pour l'année 1919 la Compagnie Roumaine déclara un dividende de 30 pour cent, et pour 1920 35 pour cent, tous deux sur un capital de 100.000.000 de lei; pour 1921 le dividende était de 40 pour cent sur un capital de 310.000.000 de lei. Ceci tout d'abord paraîtrait très satisfaisant, mais l'effet de la dépréciation du leu de 25 à 1.000 à la livre sterling signifiait que le capital primitif de 100.000.000 de lei avait été souscrit en or et pour l'amener à la valeur équivalente présente du leu il devrait être augmenté à 4.000.000.000 de lei, sur lequel montant la somme actuelle utilisée comme dividende en 1921 aurait représentée seulement environ 3 pour cent, un chiffre tout à fait insuffisant.

Cet rajustement du capital de la Compagnie Roumaine n'avait pas d'ailleurs été soutenu puisque le conseil de la Compagnie anglaise espérait encore la réhabilitation du leu en vue les grandes ressources naturelles de la Roumanie; mais la politique récente du Gouvernement de la Roumanie a été tout à fait opposée à aucune amélioration dans la position financière du pays.

Le Président décrit l'attitude du Gouvernement envers de commerce généralement et envers le commerce de pétrole en particulier, comme peu prévoyante, défectueuse et fatale. Ils avaient établi des prix fixes pour la vente des produits de pétrole à des prix beaucoup plus bas que la moyenne du coût de production.

Néanmoins des représentations avaient sans cesse été faites et il y avait des motifs pour croire que les fautes du passé avaient été en général assez bien réalisées par le Gouvernement; les prix à l'intérieur avaient été légèrement augmentés, mais le bénéfice de ceci avait été dissipé par l'augmentation simultanée des droits d'exportation. Malgré cela le consommateur n'obtint pas le bénéfice complet de ces bas prix, car le Gouvernement prit les fonctions des compagnies de pétrole et avait réalisé de grands profits; en plus desquels de grandes sommes étaient dues par des Départements du Gouvernement et les Chemins de fer aux Compagnies de pétrole à l'égard des huiles à brûler et d'autres produits fournis. Un surcroît d'inquiétude fut causé par l'adoption d'un projet de loi pour nationaliser les ressources des terrains de sous-couche. Le Président dit qu'il était difficile de former une opinion à présent, mais que si les systèmes d'exploitation étaient en quelque sorte semblables aux idées émises récemment dans un communiqué du Times, alors, à son avis, il n'y avait aucune chance pour que de nouveaux capitaux étrangers fussent mis dans l'industrie roumaine du pétrole.

A part ces désavantages le Président dit que la position de la Steaua Romana Company était satisfaisante. Une réclamation à l'égard de propriétés séquestrées qui a été référée à la dernière assemblée avait été réglée, et comme résultat la Compagnie roumaine avait reçu environ £1.000.000. Ils avaient un droit en commun avec d'autres compagnies pour un peu au-dessus de £1.000.000 pour avaries de guerre. Le Président était d'avis que le remboursement à l'égard des avaries faites à l'industrie du pétrole de la Roumanie devrait être fait par le Gouvernement ou les Gouvernements responsables.

La production du 1er Juillet 1921 au 30 Juin 1922 était de 223.939 tonnes pendant 1922 contre 213.786 pendant 1921 et 12.683 mètres avaient été sondés contre 6.520.

Pour en venir à la comptabilité de la Compagnie anglaise le Président a référé à certains arrangements comprenant le paiement des versements courants du prix d'achat de 3.500.000 francs suisses. Le prix des actions tenues par la Compagnie s'élevait à £1.055.631 15s. 9d. Le montant principal dû par le groupe roumain pour des actions achetées à leur compte était £930.257 2s. 11d. Une somme de £107.630 11s. 2d. était due le 30 Juin 1922 comme intérêt là-dessus.

Les demandes du Groupe roumain que le règlement de ce montant soit suspendu jusqu'à la fin de 1924 avaient été mentionnées à la dernière assemblée. Le Président fut content de constater que ceci avait été arrangé avec satisfaction et le Groupe roumain avait déposé à Bukharest comme sécurité avec une marge de 25 pour cent les lei équivalents à l'intérêt sterling dû, ajustable chaque trimestre.

Le montant entier du dividende de 1921 sur les actions de la Compagnie anglaise avait été reçu, mais avait été gardé à Bukharest, comme le conseil ne se considérait pas justifié en l'apportant dans ce pays en vue de la dépréciation du cours du change.

La grande dépréciation du leu avait placé le Groupe roumain dans une position difficile en ce qui concerne le paiement de leurs obligations; mais il était convaincu qu'ils trouveraient une solution satisfaisante de leur difficulté de telle façon à permettre la continuation, d'une manière satisfaisante, des relations existantes.

Commentant sur les dépenses générales de la Compagnie, le Président dit qu'elles avaient été augmentées par des frais qui ne se représenteraient pas, une partie desquels avait déjà été remboursée, dépenses faites en rapport du travail comme agents de la Compagnie Roumaine.

Les profits de commerce étaient satisfaisants et il fut espéré, que les dépenses seraient diminuées pendant l'année courante d'une manière substantielle.

Le rapport fut adopté.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Turkish Politics.

In spite of the 'Turks' resolve to lead the simple national life, they are finding it easier to dispose of the Allies' demands than to dispense with domestic politics. These for the moment are looming very large in Angora, where an electoral campaign, which was to have been in full swing, is allowed to proceed only in uncomfortable jerks. An election is essentially an occasion for the personal touch, above all when it takes place under a new order of things; but it is difficult to stump a constituency and to govern the country from the capital at one and the same time. Hence the dilemma of the deputies of the National Assembly. It is represented to them that it would never do to leave the ship of State governmentally rudderless, and, as they claim to be the Government, the whole Government, and nothing but the Government, an appeal is made to their patriotism to let the elections look after themselves. This course would seem to be a simple matter for candidates on the Cabinet ticket, but it places the independent in a grave quandary from which, apparently, only a doctor's certificate recommending a change of air offers the possibility of escape. Thus does the new Turkey prove herself up to date in unexpected directions.

Mustapha Kemal Pasha's Position.

The importance of the approaching elections in the eyes of the Turkish Cabinet has to be sought in Mustapha Kemal Pasha's own position. The Nationalist leader is finding his military achievements child's play compared with the task of carrying the country with him along the road of development that he has marked out for it. He has played his cards boldly, as becomes a soldier, but the habits of discipline which make military success possible are, as a rule, sadly to seek in the political sphere. Both in his treatment of religious matters and in his views on the emancipation of women Mustapha Kemal Pasha is very far ahead of a considerable section of his fellow-countrymen, and his interference with the temporal aspect of the Khalifate, no less than the public activities of Madame Kemal, has given his political opponents a serviceable handle. The only party in Turkey that can claim to be well organised is the Committee of Union and Progress. It has no conservatism in regard to Islam, nor scruples about female emancipation, and is for this reason the most suitable ally for Mustapha Kemal Pasha, who has been working hard to perfect a political organisation of his own. Together they could dominate the elections, and the knowledge of this fact is probably making the arrangement of terms more difficult for Mustapha Kemal Pasha, for the Unionists have not lost hope of having things their own way before long.

The Lausanne Conference.

Mainly on account of the demands of the political situation in Anatolia, the Turkish reply to the Allies' Note regarding a resumption of the Lausanne Conference has not been as prompt as was to have been expected after impatient rebukes in the Turkish Press of the Allies' dilatoriness in sending an answer to Angora's counter-proposals. Accordingly the hope that the negotiations could be resumed on April 15 has not been realised, and the date now fixed for the next and, we may hope, last stage in the long-drawn-out Turkish peace settlement is April 23. In the meantime steps are being taken to carry out the proposal that foreign business interests in Turkey should negotiate directly with the Turkish Government in regard to the economic guarantees which are to take the place of the Capitulations. It is not quite clear what course these negotiations are expected to take, but they are not necessarily to be concluded before the Lausanne Conference can sign the Treaty of Peace. Some measure of official supervision is to be given them, on behalf of the British Government, by Sir Harry Lamb, and on behalf of France, by M. Charles Laurent, both of whom have a special knowledge of Turkey and Turkish affairs.

Greece Expectant.

To no country will the signature of peace with Turkey be more welcome than to Greece. For one reason or another the whole nation, it may be said without exaggeration, is waiting expectantly for that event, although with different feelings. In the political world the Turkish settlement will put an end to the present indeterminate situation. Elections will have to be held, and a trial of strength, either tentative or à l'outrance, will take place between the existing régime and those who have withheld their support from it. Both sides seem to count upon the Army, which, in very trying circumstances, has deserved well of Greece by minding its own business, which has been to keep watch and ward on the Maritza. Whether the reaction after this period of enforced restraint will prove too much for the troops remains to be seen. Some, at least, of the Greek politicians are known to be exercised over the state of affairs in the country, and to realise that Greece needs firm remedial measures, not party wranglings, still less further bloodshed. The key to the situation lies in the attitude of the Revolutionary Committee. It is conceivable that, if they were to hold a political conference of all the leaders of all the parties—there are understood to be ten “possibles” for the next premiership—obtain a promise that the dead past should be allowed to bury its dead, on condition that the members of the Committee withdrew from politics, and then leave the elections perfectly free, Greece would have a fair chance of coming into her own again. However high political feeling may run, no Greek politician, when confronted with the situation as revealed in the responsibility of office, would wish to subordinate his country's welfare to his own personal interests.

Practical Politics in Palestine.

The views held by many people on the subject of Palestine bid fair to stand in need of constant revision these days. It will come as a surprise to some, for instance, to hear of an Arab Agricultural and Economic Conference being held. But such a meeting did take place not many weeks ago in Jerusalem, and a number of resolutions were passed which aimed at setting the Palestine Government on the right path, from the Arab point of view, in regard to a variety of subjects ranging from Land Codes and the abolition of Government Departments to the Passport system, gambling, tobacco planting, and an all-day and all-night telephone system. That the Government should have been asked to improve communications and mend certain important roads also suggests a progressive Arab community, and foreign estimation of it will be still further raised when it urges in addition that “in all districts agricultural societies be formed and assisted by agricultural engineers and experts.” Now these are all pertinent matters, and to the credit of the Congress it must be recorded that, as far as the published resolutions go, there would seem to have been no reference to political questions. No less interesting is the fact that as soon as the resolutions were published the Palestine Government sent a detailed reply in writing dealing with every point raised by the Congress. Where the latter's memory was at fault or its knowledge imperfect, the real facts were set forth, and even a non possumus answer was not given without a careful explanation. This is paternal government at its best.

The Survival of Slavery.

It will come as a shock to most people to learn that not only does slavery survive on a more or less wholesale scale in 1923, but that the highway of the traffic crosses the world's main route from West to East. Slavery has never been altogether eradicated from Abyssinia, but under the rule of the Emperor Menelek it was kept within bounds. Since his death the traffic in slaves has become a national, or at least an official, industry. The victims, it is pointed out by Major H. A. C.

Darley, late Frontier Agent in South-West Abyssinia, in a letter to The Times, were first of all the conquered negro races of the South of Abyssinia. Now that that portion of the country has been denuded by this means of its population, the slave-dealers have been compelled to look elsewhere, and are encroaching, or have already encroached, both upon the Sudan and Kenya Colony. The destination of the slaves is for the most part Arabia, with Tajourah, in Somaliland, as the port of shipment across the Gulf of Aden. This traffic, as well as the slave-dealing which has never been wholly eradicated from the Persian Gulf and a further market based on Madagascar, has been engaging the attention of Great Britain and France. The matter is now before the League of Nations, which has promised to take action next September.

The Calcutta University Controversy.

The latest incident in the controversy between the Bengal Government and the Calcutta University strikes us as one of the things which ought not to have happened. Sir Ashutosh Mookerjee, the outgoing Vice-Chancellor, is universally respected, but, in point of fact, his policy has nearly ruined the University. He remains, however, convinced that he is right, and compromise is a word for which he has no use. To invite such a personality to accept a further term of office on condition that he should carry out the Government's policy instead of his own was surely to ask for the rebuff which has been so promptly administered, and the result must be to place Mr. Basu, the new Vice-Chancellor, in an almost impossible position. Presumably he will attempt to carry out some of the reforms recommended long ago by the Sadler Commission, but he will have to fight Sir Ashutosh first, and if, as is probable, the latter continues to carry the Senate with him, there will be nothing for it but to appoint a statutory authority to remodel the University from outside. The one thing certain is that Bengal cannot afford to go on maintaining an institution which, in the words of a distinguished Indian scholar, “fills the adjoining Universities with bewilderment and Bengal teachers and employers with despair.”

The Council of India.

Mr. Basu's departure for Calcutta, following on Mr. Dalal's appointment as High Commissioner, will leave the Secretary of State with only a single Indian member on his Council instead of the conventional three, and it is not altogether easy to suggest how the vacancies are to be filled. The seats on the Council should obviously be occupied by “elder statesmen,” possessed of a wide experience of the practical working of the Constitution, but there has not been time to produce such men, and there are the strongest possible objections to withdrawing any of the small number of statesmen who are now active in one or other of the Legislatures. For the present they can do better work in India than in England, and the difference will increase as time goes on and the administrative centre of gravity becomes finally localised in Delhi. The question may even be asked whether Indians are still needed in Whitehall. The Secretary of State has to control a Government nearly half of whom are Indians: should he not rely entirely on them to put forward Indian views instead of consulting other and less eminent Indians behind their backs? Probably such a change just now would be premature, but we think it will come before very long.

Economy in Practice.

Administrative economy is a noble ideal, but in practice it is sometimes the very mischief. We recorded last week that the shutters were already up on the Indian Trade Commissioner's office in Broad Street, where City men in a hurry could count on finding the latest and most authentic commercial information always on tap. The mail has now brought us notice that the Journal of Indian Industries and Labour is to be retrenched, and with it goes the only opportunity afforded to students in this country of knowing just what is happening in one of the most important departments of Indian life. The unofficial Press follows its market in dealing mainly with the financial side of industry: the Journal has specialised on the human and technical sides, and, speaking for ourselves, we owe its producers a heavy debt of gratitude for its contributions to our knowledge. We hope that, when times are better, the Department of Industries will see its way to resume publication.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

Farming Proposals.

The element of Protection which is recommended in the proposals made by the Government Agricultural Tribunal of Investigation has not yet had a staggering effect upon this country, which Mr. Bonar Law recently conceived as being irrevocably, or, at least, for a generation, committed to Free Trade. For, indeed, it had been anticipated that the Tribunal would have to devise some means of protecting agriculture; only the theorists opposed it in advance. The Tribunal itself consisted of very able men: Sir William J. Ashley, Professor W. G. S. Adams, and Professor D. H. Macgregor—all versed alike in the practice of modern methods and in the history of past endeavours to support our national farming. They were not likely to indulge in any retrograde or impractical step, and there is little doubt that many of their recommendations will be accepted by the Government.

Briefly, their proposals contain: A tax on imported barley for malting and on hops, coupled with the abolition of hop control; provisions as to foreign flour; credit facilities for agriculture, rating assistance, and at least a quarter cut in rail rates, and provision for Imperial Preference.

It must be presumed that there will be sharp discussion of these proposals when they are brought to the House of Commons. Agriculture is one of the subjects upon which the modern Member of Parliament is notoriously ignorant, so that we should expect the most jejune and irrelevant criticism of this scheme. Apart from such opposition, however, there is the really considerable body of opinion which thinks that as agriculture in this country is a decaying industry, any artificial attempts to bolster it up must necessarily be futile, that it is impossible to put back the hands of the clock, and that if protection be applied to farming, there is no telling where the ruinous practice will stop. Such thinkers are quite unmoved by any sentimental or War-created suggestions that England should never again be caught without home-produced means of subsistence, and undoubtedly they carry much weight in the country. But whereas they would solve the problem by ignoring it, a poor Government has to face it; and if Mr. Bonar Law has the courage to impose a measure of Protection, he may lose a certain amount of popularity, but he will probably be better regarded in history.

Problems for Parliament.

Though agriculture may be the most striking problem with which Parliament has to deal in its new session, there are others, such as housing and defence, which must be causing it almost as much anxiety. In the matter of housing it would seem that the Government is prepared to face middle-class opposition, but we must wait to see where it rests after all its tired wobbling; in the matter of defence, however, it can more easily adopt a firm line. Now a tremendous, and in some places, unscrupulous, fuss is being made over our weakened system of defence. Complete lack of organisation, disastrous disregard of other nations' activities, and inter-departmental strife are some of the catch-words that the opponents of the Government are now noisily bandying about. But by most sane people the question of defence is balanced with the question of national industrial regeneration. The country simply cannot afford, for instance, to keep as many aeroplanes as France and at the same time make her industries approximate to pre-War standard. The country has to take a risk, if risk it is, and of the two risks to choose the lesser. That, I take it, is the Government's explanation of its present system of defence, and for most people it will be found good enough.

Records at Billiards.

There are probably fewer laudatores temporis acti in billiards than in any other game; for it is held fairly universally that no better players have existed than Smith and Newman. At the moment Newman, the champion, is playing a match, in the semi-final stage of the Professional Billiards Championship, with Inman, the ex-champion, and he has done some most extraordinary things. At successive visits to the table he made breaks of 542, 705, and 850, during which time Inman, a very fine match player with complete command of all the shots, scored about seven! Experts are already saying that achievements like these will never be noted again, though perhaps that is the sort of thing an expert ought to say.

It is expected that Newman will have to meet Smith in the final, and if, as these experts say, Smith is the better player, some most wonderful billiards may be seen. From these two men we do not expect the artistry that makes players like Reece or Falkiner so delightful to watch; for they are the Meads and Russells of billiards, who make of efficiency the supreme and only test of their game.

Energy Amok.

We are witnessing now some very queer and perverted forms of physical energy in the craze for dancing records, playing-the-pianoforte records, and senseless, freak competitions generally. On Saturday the height of these absurdities was reached; in fact, the loss of public dignity here became a loss of public decency. Some Manchester genius had devised a competition for women to push a perambulator with a baby in it from London to Brighton. That three women were able to accomplish this in a dozen hours or so does not matter in the least; but that any woman should have been found willing to try is extremely discreditable. Nobody can deny, whatever may be the explanation of such hysterical energy, that this is decadent. It may well be the Press publicity which these Amazons knew would be showered on them that was the lure, but what were their husbands doing all the time? One thinks, indeed, that the heavier punishment should be meted out to the fathers of these wheeled infants than to their pushing mothers. In any case, such foolery as this which one notices because it is offensive and not merely absurd, ought to be stoppable by law.

The Return of Superstition.

Much of what the age of Reason and Science has been able to accomplish is being obscured in this generation, and we can see to-day superstition breaking out almost anywhere. The last occasion was upon the death of Lord Carnarvon, which was widely attributed to magic. It is extraordinary to meet people who believe, for instance, that Lord Kitchener and the Tsar are still alive, and again to hear them saying that the Egyptologist had been overcome by the spirit of the dead. Some of our public spiritualists lent colour to this view, thought it must be said in justice to the more genuine ones that they pooh-poohed the idea. Sir Rider Haggard scored rather a good point when he said that if devils could be released in this way to strike down humans, all hope must be abandoned, for we are all in the hollow of the hand of darkness. Obviously it must. But one can safely, I think, include this outburst of superstition as one of the effects of the War: that it should endure as a factor in the lives of British people is inconceivable.

A Nip in the Bud.

On the very day when county cricket practice begins, when bathing costumes of "Tutankhamen" terra-cotta stockingette are temptingly displayed at the spring exhibition of women's wear at the Royal Agricultural Hall, when, in short, winter clothes had been finally put away, down in this versatile South of ours comes the snow! I left for town this morning with the snow falling and the sun shining. And it appears that we are to suffer these effronteries for some little time yet, the while we may stuff deeper into our pockets hands that but a few hours ago were itching for the feel of a leather ball. Of course, we knew all along that this cold would come; of course, we expected it—didn't we tell everybody so? And now that it is here we try to conceal our pleasure! We talk about the harm to the fruit-trees when we ought to be thankful of a chance to rid us of our epidemic of influenza; and we utter thoughtful sentiments about the rest of the country in transparent endeavour to obscure our own disappointment. No wonder that to foreigners we are unfathomable!

An American Invasion.

A few days ago we learned unmoved that one hundred and thirty thousand American tourists are expected in Britain this year, because, though individually we may like Americans, to pretend that we like them en masse would be another lie in the name of Anglo-Saxon brotherhood. Anyone who has seen them, in their mixed parties, touring round London must wonder where the fun comes in, and they "do" things so quickly that they must inevitably be duped. The other day I was lunching at an historic place in Fleet Street, when a party of horrific Americans "sharrabanged" from St. Paul's, and descended nasally upon us. After swallowing all the tales which the proprietor of the establishment duly gave, they settled, not with the hush of Heaven, to their meal. One of my companions was not enjoying his food, and, stentorially making himself heard above the uproar, said: "I say, you fellows, do you know this is where Dickens had his last meal?" This information, maliciously false, of course, we heard faithfully transmitted from nose to nose, and no doubt these worthy cousins of ours will go on believing until the end of their hustled lives that Dickens haunts the same place as Tennyson. But there is now an English-Speaking Union which specialises in "what to see in London, and how to get there," so that even accuracy of information may one day become a requisite of our efficient visitors.

Vices and Sins.

The solidarity of the clergy is rather a profession than a fact, and there are probably few bodies whose members are so much criticised the one by the other. After all, religious doctrine is a thing worth discussing, and there is no great harm done if it be kept within decent bounds. Whether the following case, which occurred in Ulster last week, comes within those bounds I leave readers to judge. A preacher in a church said in his sermon that gambling, smoking, and drinking were not sins, but vices, whereupon the vicar arose to denounce such doctrine as false, the practices mentioned being not vices, but sins. If one must make a distinction between a vice and a sin, I suppose one would refer the first to the relations between man and society, and the second to the relations between man and his God. In any case, the trend of opinion, both past and present, is against the vicar. The ordinary man would deny that in themselves any of these three things is either a vice or a sin: the argument that the possibility of abuse should not inhibit use still holds. But we shall always have with us those who would solve every problem by destroying it; indeed, they have their uses, and are suffered gladly enough.

The Political Situation.

For the time being things politically are quiet. How long this tranquillity will last it is difficult to say, but there are distinct indications that a more rational spirit is coming over those who have to a great extent been responsible for the political turmoil of the last few months.

When the Yehia Ibrahim Cabinet was being formed the impression was that it would be a purely administrative Cabinet, and this was confirmed by the absence of any reference to politics in either the King's Rescript entrusting the formation of the Cabinet to Yehia Pasha Ibrahim or the latter's letter accepting office. That impression bids fair now to prove erroneous, and everything points in the direction of the Cabinet concerning itself with the chief political problems before the country as soon as it has cleared away the vast amount of arrears of business that had accumulated since the resignation of Nessim Pasha. The most striking confirmation of this fact has been afforded by various interviews which Yehia Pasha has given to leading Egyptian and foreign correspondents, and by the speech which he made on Monday night at a banquet given at the Continental Hotel in honour of King Fuad's birthday. At the latter Yehia Pasha declared that the Constitution will be promulgated in the near future, and that it will prove to be a Constitution in accordance with the wishes of the nation. This is interpreted to mean that, although the Constitution will contain amended clauses with regard to the Sudan, it will be on the lines of the recommendations originally made by the Constitution Commission, and will not contain the amendments recently proposed for the extension of the King's prerogatives.

Considering all the circumstances, it would look very much as if the Prime Minister had come to a definite understanding with the King on the subject, and this pronouncement, together with the Premier's success in securing a suspension of the proceedings which were to be taken by the military authorities against the Wafd Committee arrested after the last bomb outrage—a decision which on all sides was regarded as a mistake and unfair to the Cabinet, since it should have been taken before and not immediately after its assumption of office—appears very materially to be consolidating the position of the new Cabinet. In Egypt it is, of course, difficult, and even dangerous, to prognosticate, but there is undoubtedly a general feeling that the new Cabinet will take the country a very considerable distance along the road to the assembly of the new Parliament, if, indeed, it does not actually meet the latter at its first assembly.

The Queen of the Belgians.

The Queen of the Belgians, accompanied by Prince Leopold, left Egypt to-day, travelling by the s.s. Esperia to Genoa. Her Majesty has been just under two months in Egypt, most of which she spent at Luxor. She arrived in Cairo after a trip down the Nile on the 21st instant, and has been staying at the Heliopolis Palace Hotel. Queen Elisabeth was entertained at luncheon by King Fuad and by Lord and Lady Allenby, and also by the officers of the Fifth Dragoon Guards, of which King Albert is Honorary Colonel. Her Majesty left for Alexandria last night by special train, having been preceded by Prince Leopold, who went by motor-car to Suez and proceeded up the Canal to Ismailia, where he was the guest of Comte de Sérionne, Superintendent of the Suez Canal Company, finally reaching Alexandria by rail in time to catch the Esperia.

Both the Queen and the Belgian Crown Prince displayed throughout their visit the greatest interest in Egypt's ancient monuments, an interest which so struck the Belgian community in Egypt that they decided to create, in memory of Her Majesty's visit, a special fund for the furtherance of Egyptological studies and research, which have for some time been carried on at the Musée du Cinquantenaire de Bruxelles, under the able direction of its secretary, Dr. Jean Capart.

IRAK.

Baghdad, March 29.

The Floods.

The spring of 1923 will be long remembered in Baghdad for the high floods on the Tigris, which have surpassed anything which has been seen before. Very heavy rain in the north, together with a warm south wind which had helped to melt the snows earlier and more quickly than usual, had made all the rivers rise at one time to an unprecedented height, and for some time Baghdad was in danger of complete submersion. Much injury has been done; the Mosul Bridge has been damaged, the Maude Bridge at Baghdad was carried away in the night and found in a more or less battered condition some ten miles downstream, while the railway bridge over the Diyala River at Karaghan, on the branch line to Kifri, has been so badly damaged as to place the branch line out of action for some three months. At the same time, much destruction of crops has taken place, for the escape on the right bank of the river at Tarmiyah, above Baghdad, was cut to allow some of the water to get free into the Haur Akarkuf, and the bund at Daudiyah gave way badly and allowed an enormous mass of water, calculated at 45,000 cubic feet per second, to flood some 300 square miles of desert and cultivated land on the left bank immediately outside Baghdad. The water is now standing to a depth of some 10 feet against the bund which encircles Baghdad, while the bund on which the Bakubah Railway runs was so badly eroded as to make it necessary to suspend the service for some days. Considerable anxiety was felt for the safety of the bund which protects the British civil community at Alwiyah and the military cantonment at Hinaidi, but, by dint of great exertion on the part of the engineers, both civil and military, it has now been strengthened, and the danger is over. Should, however, another big rise in the river occur before the existing breaches in the bund have been closed, the results may be very serious. The damage done is a severe blow to the Irak Government's exchequer, as vast sums have had to be expended on purchasing any available material that could be of use in helping to repair the bunds, and large gangs of workmen have had to be employed on the earthwork. These high floods appear to come in cycles of about seven years, previous floods having come in 1907 and 1914.

Refractory Sulaimaniyah.

Sulaimaniyah appears to have been giving trouble again. Sheikh Mahmud, who had been allowed to return there with the title of Hukmelaar had been showing himself more and more unsatisfactory and more and more averse from obeying the instructions of the High Commissioner, and finally it was considered necessary to send aeroplanes over the town as an earnest of what might happen if he did not obey the orders given. He immediately left Sulaimaniyah, and is now believed to be at large near Arbil, while a deputation composed of the leading men of the town is now in Baghdad discussing the question of Sulaimaniyah and its future with the High Commissioner.

Political Visits.

The Air Officer Commanding and Sir Henry Dobbs have continued their touring in various parts of the country, the Air Officer Commanding having visited Arbil and Mosul and Sir Henry Dobbs having visited Kirkuk.

Current Impressions.

In Allied quarters in Constantinople the Note of the Powers in reply to the Turkish counter-proposals has been well received on the whole, and its measure of firmness, coupled with its non-committal character, is generally approved.

If war could be made by mere shouting, then the Nationalist extremists in Turkey would have restarted the war long ago, and will restart it yet. But there are good reasons for believing that a substantial majority sincerely desirous of peace exist in the country, who, while appreciating the many and great reforms which the Nationalist movement has already achieved, recognise, in view of existing conditions in Turkey, and in their own interests, that there is a limit to which they would be justified in asking the Powers to go. Moreover, there are many moderate Turks, including those of the older school, who have genuine qualms in regard to what is loosely termed the Bolshevik menace; those who have no wish to see every foreigner and every cent of foreign money driven from their shores, and their country thus reduced to a condition similar to that of and subservient to their Russian neighbour, with whom, after all, the Moslem Turk has but little in common, and whose Government—ostracised by the civilised world—recognises neither God nor the Prophet.

The Murder of Ali Shukri Bey.

Considerable commotion has been evoked throughout the country, and is loudly echoed in the Turkish Press, in regard to the murder of Ali Shukri Bey, Deputy for Trebizond. It was taken for granted that he had been the victim of political assassination, but public opinion has been reassured by the evidence that his murder was an act of personal revenge. He disappeared after a dinner given at Angora by Osman Agha, a Militia Commander, and his body was subsequently found near the latter's house. Osman Agha fled from Angora, but has been killed in the attempt to resist arrest.

Born in 1885, the son of a retired naval officer, Ali Shukri was an enlightened Turk, who had rendered considerable service to his country during and after the War. He had studied at the Halki Naval College, had written several books, and was a fluent English speaker. Four months ago he founded the Turkish newspaper, the Tan, which is published in Angora. It is stated that the Tan had recently attacked Osman Agha. Ali Shukri belonged to the Second Group (for the Defence of National Rights), an opposition party in the National Assembly.

Greek Refugees.

Some rather alarming statistics are given as to the condition of Greek refugees here, and the situation appears to be getting worse rather than better, as time passes. Apart from the point of view of these unfortunate people themselves, whose condition is tragic, it is questionable whether some more concerted and effective steps will not have to be taken to prevent disease and distress from spreading beyond the limits of Constantinople. At Kitcheli Barracks, at the entrance to the Black Sea, and at Yuoum Bournou camp, there are no doctors for the 1,500 refugees, and, therefore, one is told, there are no statistics of sickness and deaths available.

In the Selimie barracks and stables (Scutari) there were 221 deaths during the past week, the highest since the arrival of these unfortunate people, two months ago. There were 10,000 at these barracks.

PERSIA.

Teheran, February 28.

The Government's Programme.

Although Mustaufi el-Mumalik has not yet completed his Cabinet, the Ministries of Posts and Telegraphs and Public Works being still not allotted, the Government's programme was presented yesterday to the Mejliss. After stating that he would continue the good work of his predecessors with regard to reforms, the new Prime Minister mentioned that he would endeavour to maintain the friendly relations existing with all foreign Governments, especially with regard to the formation of postal conventions with Afghanistan and Russia, and a commercial treaty with the latter country, which is of such vital importance to Persia. It will be remembered in this connection that one of the chief reasons for the fall of Ghavam es-Saltaneh's Ministry was its bold stand against the aggressiveness of the Soviet Government with regard to commercial relations between the two countries; it had imposed an absolutely prohibitive tariff on goods entering and leaving the north of Persia—in consequence of which, negotiations proceeding at Moscow for a commercial convention were interrupted, and a strong Note protesting against the unfriendly attitude adopted by the late Cabinet was presented to the Crown Prince, in the absence of the Shah, by the Russian Chargé d'Affaires, Comrade Shumyatski. The new Prime Minister has already had an interview with the Soviet representative, as the outcome of which the prohibitive tariff has been taken off and reversion been made to the former scale, pending the conclusion of the commercial treaty which it is hoped the present Cabinet will be able to carry through.

The Prime Minister intends to proceed with as little delay as possible with the elections for the fifth Parliament since the granting of the Constitution, as the term of the present one is nearly finished. The Government hope to formulate a special Bill for the amendment of the existing law with regard to conscription for the army in the villages and the enrolment of recruits; to try to arrive at a decision with regard to the granting of the Northern Oil Concession; also to prepare the ground for the construction of railways in the interior of the country, and for motor transport on the principal roads, with a view to which the Government will recommend the engagement of advisers and experts for the Ministry of Public Works. Reform of the finances of the country, now under the able control of the American Administrator-General, Dr. Millspaugh, will also engage the Government's attention, and, under the guidance of Dr. Bogart, who has been placed in charge of the former Russian Bank, now the "Bank of Persia," they will endeavour to collect all outstanding debts due to the Government on account of revenues, and so forth, and float this institution as a national bank. The Government will endeavour to raise the necessary funds for the payment of the salaries of Government employees, now, as in the past, fallen sadly in arrears. Finally the Prime Minister stated that he would assist education as much as possible by extending his support to the schools, and by sending pupils to European countries to study sciences and arts.

There is nothing very new about this programme, and, although the Cabinet is not very enthusiastically received here, yet Mustaufi el-Mumalik is very popular with all classes, and has the support and confidence of the country. It is to be hoped, therefore, that he will succeed in carrying out at least part of his programme. He has the great advantage of having the American advisers in full charge of all the financial departments, and this fact has already made itself felt in the different administrations.

Salaries in Arrears.

The Government obtained a few days ago an advance of a million tomans (some £200,000) against future royalties payable by the Anglo-Persian Oil Company; but this sum was soon swallowed up in paying off arrears of salaries due to Government officials and to the Army, which is the main source of drain upon the revenues of the country.

There has again been dissatisfaction among the police force during the week on account of the non-payment of their salaries, and as on two or more former occasions, this was made the pretext for their threatening to come out on strike. A demonstration was held by them in the Parliament Square with a view to bringing their grievances to the notice of the Mejliss; but, on promise of a payment on account, the demonstrators were induced to disperse, and resumed work without any further incidents.

We have received the following telegram from Limassol, dated April 9:—On the occasion of the Greek National Day Te Deums and prayers for union with Greece were sung in all the churches on the island. Towns and villages were beflagged with Greek flags. Large crowds everywhere cheered for a union with Greece. English Philhellene speakers expressed the conviction that England will do her duty by ceding Cyprus to Greece. Perfect order prevailed everywhere.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A GRAVE OF REPUTATIONS.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—In THE NEAR EAST of March 29 your Cairo Correspondent suggests that an expert from India or Scotland Yard be sent for to deal with the situation arising from the political outrages. If this suggestion were acted on, it would only mean the erection of another tombstone in the already overcrowded cemetery of the Egyptian Public Security Department! In the past it has not proved very difficult to acquire a reputation for administrative ability in Egypt, but the organisation of the police has been the undoing of all who have hitherto undertaken the task. The late Lord Kitchener is the one exception, but the writer has no hesitation in saying that this was owing to Lord Kitchener's personality and the fact that he was dealing with a weak Judicial Adviser; the chances are, too, that, had Lord Kitchener's association with the police extended for more than a few months, he, too, would have been numbered among the fallen.

It must not be supposed, however, that in public security matters the Egyptian Government has been badly served; on the contrary, the long list of police advisers, commencing with Valentine Baker and ending with Mr. Monteith Smith, lately retired, contains men who have all made their mark in other vocations, and have only failed in the police because the task has been an impossible one. The truth is that with the police under the Interior and the Parquet under the Minister of Justice, the maintenance of public security may be likened to two coachmen, each holding a rein, endeavouring to drive a pair of horses when neither were agreed as to the road to travel on!

Neither does the trouble end here, as the parquet and judiciary are both recruited from the School of Law, full of Nationalists and extremists, and generally recognised as a seminary of sedition, where many plots against the ruling authorities were hatched and all the student strikes originated. On leaving this Law School the first official post the young lawyer is appointed to is a substitute of the Parquet, which carries with it the control and supervision of all police investigations.

In the early days the British Commandant of Police in the cities and the Public Security officials in the Interior countered this Parquet influence by the employment of Levantine secret agents, who rendered valuable service, but were not altogether trustworthy on financial matters. These agents being for the most part local subjects, were subject to the Native Courts, and nothing the Parquet enjoyed more than ferreting out doubtful transactions on their part and then instituting prosecutions for bribery. The case in which the head of the C.I.D. in Cairo was prosecuted and sentenced to a long term of imprisonment is a good example of what the Parquet could do. It is ten years since the writer left Egypt, and five-and-twenty since he severed his connection with the police service, but, reading the daily papers, his one source of information, enables him to gather pretty correctly what is now occurring. It is that, the British influence being practically non-existent, the C.I.D. is being run by the Parquet, or, at all events, by men who have been trained in the School of Law. Now, although "Set a thief to catch a thief" is a good adage to work on, a police official brought up with the School of Law tradition is not likely to look for the perpetrators of these outrages amongst his former associates, and, without wishing to libel the School of Law by saying that these outrages are the work of the law students, the writer has at the same time little doubt that there are many law students who would regard an outrage on a Briton as a legitimate means to an end, though the law students would be far more trustworthy than a Levantine in the matter of bribery and corruption. The problem is further complicated by the political parties which have now developed in the State, whose object is not to govern, but to prevent the other from governing. The result is that an Egyptian Cabinet strong enough to enforce public security measures cannot be found. The Zaghloul Party is undoubtedly being run by the lawyers and judiciary, and probably the Adly-ites by the Idara officials or executive. As to Adly Pasha himself, his brain-power is certainly equal to Zaghloul's or any of his lieutenants, but, as a whole, it may be accepted that the brains are on the side of the Zaghloulists. Anyhow, between the two there is the making of a strong Government and a strong Opposition, which is really all that the British Government asks if only political outrages could be eliminated. The British Government has unfortunately created a bad precedent in Ireland, and the Egyptian extremists will take some severe lessons before they realise that the British Cabinet has said the last word in the matter of concession. The question is: How are these outrages, which both parties condemn, to be brought to an end? The answer is the creation of a strong Government. As soon as Zaghloul has finished his cure, let him be summoned to a round-table conference in the endeavour to construct a constitution which both parties will accept. Should they fail to agree, let new elections be held on the Kitchener franchise, and the party numerically the strongest be called on to form a Cabinet and govern. Let the date of evacuation of Cairo be definitely fixed, not vaguely hinted at, and for every outrage occurring after then let the date be postponed also for a fixed period.

Let the new Cabinet set about drawing up a new constitution, and if it pleases the Cabinet to speak of the Sudan as a dependency of Egypt, let them do so, but let the British Government state plainly the number of years the present status quo will continue, at the expiration of which the Sudanese will be given a free choice of (a) governing themselves, (b) throwing in their lot with Egypt, (c) continuing under British tutelage. If the Egyptians do not like the decision, let them retake the Sudan by force and expect to find a British army on the side of the Sudanese.

Such methods of restoring order in Egypt are what common sense dictates, and cannot well be refused by the Egyptians. At the same time, if the new Egyptian Cabinet is wise, one of its first measures will be a decree prescribing corporal punishment for all students indulging in political meetings or school strikes. Egyptians, whether they be radical reformers or conservative Moslems, all mellow with age, but they are cursed with a youth which cannot be trusted and has never been licked into obeying orders of their elders and superiors.—I am, etc.,

It is difficult to decide whether this is an autobiography expanded and decorated into a novel or a work of fiction most skilfully represented in autobiographical form. We are inclined to the former theory. In either case the result is a tremendously vivid account of life in India from the point of view of a man who entered the India Civil Service in 1912 and who retired in 1922, unable to bear the changed conditions. Andrew Allan, the hero of the book, finds, however, that India has become his home, and we leave him looking forward to happiness as "a fruit farmer on the Mahamalai Hills in Southern India." Allan's experiences in Madras during these ten years, none of which is exaggerated or other than might have befallen anyone in the same position, are told in a simple way, and with an interest and an air of reality which have made them into a most readable story.

The book is also worth reading as a sincere and, within its limitations, a successful attempt to show the change which has recently taken place in a Service of great traditions. That this is the author's main object is shown in the introductory verses and the title of the book. Looking back on 1912, he writes: "From where I sit, at Hulikal, on the Mahamalais, I can look out over an immense prospect of foothill and plains country to distant ranges that close in the horizon. Not even the most distant of these, where all blues have finally merged into a toneless grey that is partly sky and partly tangible earth, not even Perumbetta itself, by which men here test the visibility of the clearest days—not any of them seems so inaccessibly remote and dim as those times of which I have just written."

All the other characters are described only as they affect Allan, and we are left with the impression that they are "real people," who are so clear in the writer's mind that his knowledge of them, in some cases intimate and in others slight, is communicated to the reader.

We think that this book, even more than most stories of life in India, will, owing to the lack of undue emphasis and air of reserve with which it is written, appeal most to those who have lived in the country themselves. The author has, we should imagine, failed, even as Allan in his letters home failed, to give people who are not already interested in India any "intelligible view" of it.

LANDS OF THE THUNDERBOLT

By the EARL OF RONALDSHAY, P.C., G.C.S.I., etc.

Illustrated with photographs by the author. 16s. net.

An account of the manners and scenery of the little visited countries of Sikkim, Chumbi and Bhutan, by a famous administrator, traveller and sportsman, whose knowledge of India is unrivalled.

Sunday Times—"His detailed accounts of various journeyings are sparkling and vivid. His book does much to lift the veil from a mysterious corner of the world into which few travellers ever venture—fewer still with Lord Ronaldshay's particular gift."

CONSTABLE: LONDON, W.C.2.

There seems to be deep sincerity in the words: "I had under-estimated the depth of my own interest in India and her affairs, the extent to which I was bound up in her fortunes. The deliberate uninterest of people I met at home depressed and thwarted me. I was a fish out of water."

Mr. Hilton Brown has made Andrew Allan tell his story in the words of a man who has given his heart to India, and who has come near to having it broken.

HYGIENE IN THE WAR.

"HISTORY OF THE GREAT WAR, BASED ON OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS. MEDICAL SERVICES. HYGIENE OF THE WAR." Vols. I. and II. (London: H.M. Stationery Office, 21s. each.)

The importance of hygiene during the Great War was possibly in inverse ratio to its general interest, and the homage which posterity will gladly pay to the contributors to the least exciting of studies—"Hygiene of the War"—cannot be measured. The standard of efficiency which British Medical Services reached between 1914 and 1918 was extraordinary, and a record, such as is here set down, of the development of that efficiency must be invaluable to the medical officers of future warriors.

Of peculiar interest to our readers will be the chapters on Water Supply in Egypt and Palestine, in Mesopotamia, Italy, and Macedonia, and on the character of the water in North Sinai, and on the Wadi el Ghuzzee near Gaza. It cannot be expected that much of the matter will, except to those possessed of technical or intimate knowledge of the various subjects, be read for any other purpose than that of instruction; and certainly it is outside our scope or competence to make any detailed observations on these two volumes. But it is quite obvious that this history, which is abundantly illustrated, is indispensable to serious students of war hygiene.

THE ROUMANIAN CONSTITUTION.

The passing of the new Constitution through both Houses of the Roumanian Parliament has not brought this distracted country any nearer to internal peace. For fifteen months M. Bratianu has now held office in the teeth of exceptionally bitter opposition. To the outside world there is something intensely pathetic in Roumania's political feuds. Within a month after the conclusion of the Great War the Roumanians of Transylvania formed a National Government and proclaimed the union of their country with the kingdom of Roumania. When the coronation of King Ferdinand as Sovereign of Great Roumania took place last October in the same town as the great assembly of December, 1918, Transylvanians were, almost to a man, absent from the ceremony. To the Constitution as drafted by the Liberal Government they have offered a relentless opposition, and declare that they will not acknowledge it even when it becomes law. This attitude is understood to be based on the allegation that at the elections a year ago the Liberal Party resorted to methods of terrorism and corruption that entirely vitiated the polling as a reflection of the national will. From the fact that the grievance of the Transylvanians and other parties of the Opposition has been maintained unswervingly for a whole year, even to the extent of boycotting the Coronation, may be inferred the intensity of the feeling on the subject. It is difficult to believe that Great Roumania can be permanently governed in defiance of Transylvanian opinion, but M. Bratianu, who certainly does not lack political courage, has persisted in the attempt for a year, and throughout this period would seem to have chosen to rule with the big stick rather than to embark upon a policy of compromise. In the circumstances it is not a matter for surprise that M. Bratianu should be reported to be weary of office and to be seeking an opportunity to withdraw from his leadership of the Liberal Party. Even if the statement be not true, it is likely to serve as an incentive to the Opposition to persist in their uncompromising hostility. The immediate effect of the new Constitution has been to make the various parties close up their ranks. The only politician in the country who for experience and adroitness can be compared with M. Bratianu is M. Marghiloman. Ever since the War he has been in the political wilderness on account of his pro-German leanings. Even if his views towards Germany have not changed, it is being realised by his countrymen that they are now of academic interest rather than of political concern in connection with Roumanian affairs as they are to-day. If a working agreement could be reached between M. Marghiloman, of the Conservative Party, General Averescu, of the Popular Party, M. Vaida-Voevod and M. Maniu, representing the Transylvanian Nationalists, and the leader of the Tsaranists or Peasant Party, the position of M. Bratianu could hardly fail to be shaken.

It will be unfortunate for Roumania if the great services rendered by the Liberal Party to the country are lost sight of as a result of a lapse from constitutionalism and the principles of strict democracy. To the Liberals belongs the chief credit for the introduction of land reform and the extension of the franchise. Their administrative record under previous Governments compared favourably with that of any other party, and they can certainly claim a very large share of the business intellect of the community. Why the strong position that they held in Roumania, even when numerically weak in Parliament, as they were in 1921, should have been stultified by electoral methods which seem to have been exceptional even for the Balkans, is not apparent. If there had been less justice in the protests against those methods M. Bratianu might have been expected to make his peace with the Opposition, at least to the extent required for a national observance of the Coronation festivities and for an agreed Constitution. That he has refused to meet his political opponents in any way suggests a strong cause or a stout heart. The situation is undoubtedly obscure. There is little desire on the part of foreign observers to try to apportion blame, however much they may regret to see Roumania labouring under the disadvantage of grave political unrest. They notice that M. Bratianu seems to have retained the complete confidence of the Crown, and this factor, while exercising its effect on foreign opinion, in one respect adds to the anxiety, lest the Crown itself be dragged into the unhappy dissensions of the Roumanian people.

Although interest abroad in the new Roumanian Constitution centres mainly in the nationalisation of the sub-soil and its effect on the prospects of oil companies, there are other matters which have aroused controversy. In Roumania itself there is considerable uneasiness among the minorities over the clause which somewhat baldly declares that every "Roumanian" will have rights of citizenship. It is remembered that M. Bratianu preferred to resign his Premiership to signing the minorities clauses of the Treaty of Versailles, and it is feared that the Constitution has hit upon a device for evading the decisions of the Peace Treaties. M. Bratianu is understood to have declared that these fears are groundless, but they can hardly be regarded as unnatural in the light of past experience. The Hungarian Government has challenged certain provisions of Roumania's agrarian law as being contrary to the Treaty of Trianon, and has appealed to the League of Nations on the subject. Thus in two directions the question of the compatibility of Roumanian laws with her Treaty obligations is being raised. The point is only germane to a discussion on the internal situation in Roumania in so far as it serves to confirm the Opposition in their contention that all the acts and decisions of a Government elected, as they declare, illegally must be regarded as null and void. M. Bratianu's opponents, however, would merely be falling into his error if they tried to redraft the Constitution without reference to the Liberal Party. What, therefore, is required at this juncture in Roumania is an influence above party politics, which can be exerted to bring the warring parties into collaboration for the purpose of framing an agreed Constitution.

IRAK AND ITS RAILWAYS.

The Present Situation.

In the debate in the House of Commons on March 1 on Middle Eastern Services Supplementary Estimates discussion turned largely on the Irak Railways. A number of members volunteered statistics, but in most cases there was little indication as to the exact point of time to which these applied. Even the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies was not able in every instance to bring his information up to date, in view of the fact that he was speaking before the end of the Railways' financial year. Thus Mr. Ormsby-Gore could only state that it was expected that the section of the line from Basrah to Hillah would pay this year, 1922-23. From information that has now reached this country it is known that revenue on this section has exceeded expenditure, and that in achieving this result maintenance has not been altogether deferred, much having been paid for out of revenue which under normal conditions would have been charged to capital. Mr. Ormsby-Gore spoke of the Irak Railways as having been at one time possibly the most heavily officialled line in the world, but added that "the whole of that has changed during the last year." Colonel Wedgwood, speaking later in the debate, quoted as authoritative a statement that there were no fewer than 1,200 "administrators" for the three simple lines of railway, of whom 700 were whites.

We are in a position to give the accurate figures.

At the end of April, 1922, the total railway staff was 10,495, of whom 503 were British, 4,312 Indian, and 5,680 local. At the end of March, 1923, the figures are: 369 British, 1,974 Indian, and 5,796 local, a total of 8,139. These figures amply bear out Mr. Ormsby-Gore's statement, while proving the inaccuracy of Colonel Wedgwood's information.

Reconstruction Work.

It has been stated—and the estimate was repeated in the House of Commons debate—that £2,500,000 would have to be spent at once on reconstruction work on the railways, to be followed during the next five years by a further expenditure of £3,000,000 or £3,500,000. Of the Basrah-Hillah section it was also stated, apparently with authority: "It was extremely costly to build, owing to the marshy nature of so much of the route traversed, and it is costly to maintain. It requires realignment and permanent works, which will give rise to fresh heavy expenditure." If there was at any time any authority for such a statement, it is without foundation to-day. In the past few years there has been a change of conditions in the labour market as well as a reduction in the price of materials; further, there exists now a correct realisation of the requirements of a railway to meet the demands for transport based on actual experience.

The Basrah-Hillah line does skirt swamps, but in its alignment is not affected in any way by them now. It is true that, if there had been no swamps, the length of line would have been considerably shortened; but the alignment calls for no changes until a very much greater volume of traffic justifies it. There are three major timber bridges which must be replaced in the course of the next four years. The total cost of replacement is estimated at less than £100,000. The only realignment contemplated in the near future is the construction of a seven-mile connection from near Hillah to the Hindiah Barrage, to form a loop with the Musaiyib line, and connecting with the main line. This small length of line will enable twenty miles of first-class track to be dismantled for use elsewhere, and will reduce working expenses considerably.

The Need for Extensions.

Capital expenditure is urgently required for feeder lines, for which there is an ever-increasing demand. These feeder lines are expected to pay handsomely, and will very materially add to the traffic of the main line. As an instance may be cited the construction of a line from Hindiah Barrage to Kerbela, which could be carried out at a cost to the Railway of, say, £40,000; but the profit on the new section at a conservative estimate would be £10,000, and the resulting benefit to the main line would be at least £25,000. A further extension from Kerbela to Kufa would yield a large return from pilgrim traffic and from the export of rice-grown in that area, with a corresponding increase in the earnings of the main line.

It is essential to the development and security of Irak that these feeder lines should be constructed. The export of grain has been rendered possible by the existence of the railway, and the development of cotton growing, which is attracting the attention of the majority of the cultivators in the country. will be very great in the well-watered areas through which the railway passes for a considerable part of its length.

Among other useful extensions may be mentioned the proposed line from Kingerban, the terminus of a 33-mile branch from Karaghan, a junction some fifteen miles south of Khanakin, to Mosul, via Kifri, Kirkuk, and Erbil, which would tap a very large grain-producing area, would bring in the much-needed fuel for the households of Baghdad, and would carry the building and road-making material of which the capital is in urgent need. (A line to connect Mosul, Kirkuk, and Suleimanieh, it will be recalled, figures in the programme of railway construction included in the Chester Concession, which is now under the consideration of the Turkish Government.)

The development of traffic from Felluja, Ramadi, Hit, and the upper reaches of the Euphrates generally is also understood to be engaging the careful attention of the Irak Railway Administration. This traffic can be carried by river to the Hindiah Barrage, and from there to the markets by rail, and it is hoped that it may be commercially possible to bring in the produce and materials (lime, stone, and bitumen) to the various markets and to carry the goods required by these river towns and the desert tribes that they serve.

River Competition.

The railway through the Euphrates valley has been of immense benefit to the country, and, although it is in competition with the Tigris River steamer companies for Baghdad traffic, it is not in competition for the large and growing traffic of the country through which it passes. The line has been used, and is being used, for practically all military traffic from the Base to Baghdad, and has made it economically possible to export the produce of the immense and increasing areas under cultivation.

As an example of the rate-cutting that has accompanied the competition for Baghdad traffic it may be mentioned that goods are being carried by river from Basrah to Baghdad for 12s. per ton. The Tigris is a difficult, tortuous river, and the distance from the port to the capital is 500 miles. It is only during the high-water season that voyages can be made with full loads. In the low-water season, not only is the carrying capacity of the steamers and barges restricted by the depth of water, but the channels also become more difficult, and journeys may be unduly protracted.

Railway Prospects.

In view of the fact that what may be called the commercialisation of the railways has been introduced only comparatively recently, it is considered that the results are still capable of considerable expansion. The prospects for the year just begun are said to be good. A good harvest is all but assured; export of grain is expected to be greater than in the past year, and forward bookings of transport have already been made.

For the benefit of those who, on the authority of our Press Ahithophels, picture to themselves Irak as one vast desert waste, this attempt to give, as it were, the Railways' point of view may conclude with a brief extract from a private letter from Baghdad:—"The country is at its best just now (the middle of March), the wheat, barley, and great stretches of summer vegetables form a wonderful picture. The desert and uncultivated areas are a mass of flowers—poppies, anemones, lupins, and many others make carpets of scarlet, blue, and gold."

THE EARL OF CARNARVON.

"We deeply regret to record the death, at the age of fifty-five, of the Earl of Carnarvon, which occurred at Cairo on April 5. For more than a fortnight Lord Carnarvon had been seriously ill from pneumonia and poisoning, and his death was scarcely unexpected. His name will be permanently associated with the recent discovery of the tomb of Tutankhamen in the Valley of the Kings.

It was almost by chance that Lord Carnarvon's interest was turned to Egyptology. In 1907, while convalescing from an accident, he asked Sir Wallis Budge, Keeper of Egyptian and Assyrian Antiquities at the British Museum, to suggest for him a recreative occupation. As a consequence he was introduced to Mr. Howard Carter, with whom he worked assiduously until success crowned their joint efforts last year. For long their expensive endeavours in Egypt were unrewarded, but in 1915 the two excavators turned their attention to the Valley of the Tombs of the Kings, which Mr. Howard Carter was convinced, contrary to public opinion, had not been exhaustively explored. How they went on with undamped ardour through seven unrewarded years; how the actual discovery of Tutankhamen's tomb was made last November; how the tomb was recently closed, to be reopened next autumn—these and other details are sufficiently well known. It is pathetic to realise that Lord Carnarvon could not actually meet Tutankhamen face to face, but his fame in connection with Egyptology as one who made what is probably the most wonderful find in history is secure. Both in Egypt and in England his loss will be severely felt, and his place in official archaeology cannot be filled. He has well been called "the last of the noble patrons of Egyptology."

NOTES AND NEWS.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The Negotiations with Turkey.

Interest in the second stage of the Lausanne Conference, which is to open on April 23, centres almost entirely in the French attitude on the economic clauses. As far as Great Britain is concerned, it would hardly be an exaggeration to say that peace might be signed with the Turks to-morrow. Needless to add, this point of view will not affect the British contribution to the solidarity of the Allies at the resumed conference. The negotiations that are to be entered upon between Allied interests in Turkey and the Turkish Government involve in the main, I understand, the public companies rather than private firms. Great Britain is represented by very few of the concessionaire type. Such interests as are concerned have asked for the services of Sir Harry Lamb as liaison officer with the Turkish authorities, and a better choice could not have been made.

Angora's Legislative Kites.

Search for the bright side of things in connection with the anxieties and uncomfortable experiences of Allied subjects in Turkey during the last year or so will, I think, reveal the fact that it is not without its advantages that Angora should have been allowed to threaten Constantinople with samples of its home-made legislation. It is admitted that in several directions the Nationalist régime has introduced some sound innovations. But the Anatolian backwoodsman has been rather forward in running off the rails, and there is some reason to suppose that he is already voted a nuisance by the Constantinople Turk. Although taxation threats have been directed mainly against the foreigner, the Turkish community is also involved, and has not been sorry to see the forceful protests raised by the former. The net result, one may hope, especially after the new elections, will be that some of the pet legislation of the late National Assembly will be quietly dropped.

Prospects in India.

There have been three interesting and important pronouncements in connection with Indian trade and its prospects during the past week—two in the chairman's speech at the annual meeting of each of the two great banks, the Chartered Bank and the National Bank of India, and the third by Lord Inchcape in the course of conversation in France on his return from India. Lord Inchcape, fresh from the wielding of the axe to the extent of a nearly thirteen million sterling cut from a total expenditure of over a hundred and five millions, contented himself with the brief expression that "everything promises to go well with India." Sir Montagu Turner, Chairman of the Chartered Bank, gave a reasoned explanation of the faith that was in him. "India," he said, "is a country of immense resources and wonderful recuperative powers, and, provided that retrench-ments, as suggested by the Inchcape Committee, are effected, the political agitator is reasonably restrained, and normal conditions prevail in Europe and America, I can see no reason why India should not be, ere long, in a very satisfactory financial position."

Hastening Slowly.

The emphasis that Sir Montagu Turner laid on the need for traders to work cautiously and to refrain from overloading Eastern markets with unrequired goods finds support in the burden of Mr. Robert Williamson's remarks at the annual meeting of the National Bank of India. The persistent demand for gold in India during the past year and in the first quarter of this year has been justified to some extent by the balance of trade, which has been in favour of India since March, 1922. Mr. Williamson considered the country more settled, and the great mass of the people more contented, than two or three years ago. With the higher price of cotton, trade conditions, from an Indian's outlook, with the outer world are decidedly "patchy." Large buyers for India's food supplies and raw materials are badly needed; when they are forthcoming Indians will respond by purchases from Lancashire and elsewhere.

Roumanian Oil.

A further important development in the Roumanian oil industry has taken place with the absorption of the Orion Oil Company by the Phoenix Oil and Transport Company. This latter organisation, it will be recalled, took over last December the Roumanian Consolidated Oilfields, and it now becomes one of the leading companies in the Roumanian fields with an oil production of 10,000 tons a month, with a refinery and the necessary installations for dealing with its output in every stage from the well to the consumer. The enterprise of the Phoenix Oil Company, it is to be hoped, will bring to British participation in Roumania's oilfields a measure of success that has been conspicuously absent in the past, while exercising a salutary influence on the exploitation of these fields.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS

Constantinople, April 2.

The general situation of the market shows no improvement. A state of uncertainty continues, with the result that transactions are restricted to the absolute needs of local consumption. Apart from certain rare articles, such as manufactured goods, business is restricted to a minimum.

Manufactured goods, on account of the lively demand from Anatolia, remain firm. Moreover, several Persian merchants have arrived, in order to purchase cloths for Persia. A large quantity of stocks have thus been absorbed.

Cabots.—There has been no resumption of business with Roumania. Thanks to the demands from Persia and Anatolia, the prices continue firm. Stock, 100-150 bales.

Empty Sacks from Calcutta.—The tendency towards a resumption of business which had manifested itself with regard to Eastern Thrace and Anatolia has been stopped by the rise in the prices. Stock, 200 bales.

Colonial Produce.—Crystallised sugar.—The rise in sugar previously reported has continued in the markets of origin. Merchants have maintained the same attitude as during the past month; they have abstained from giving orders at the prices which, to them, seem too high to last.

Apart from some insignificant orders at Trieste, where the quotations are more advantageous, the only transactions which have been effected have been on existing stock. The latter has fallen from 2,000 tons to about 1,500 tons.

The prices here are £2 to £2 10s. lower in comparison with those of the countries of origin. They are at present quoted (prices in transit) as follow:—Java sugar, £31-£31 10s. per ton; American, £32-£32 10s.; and Dutch, £32-£33 10s. per ton.

The position in regard to cube sugar shows the same characteristics as crystallised sugar. Price in transit, £35 per ton. Stock, 500 tons.

Coffee.—This article remains firm in the countries of origin, with a tendency to a rise in price. Those merchants who were encouraged by the increase to pass big orders find themselves obliged, in the absence of any outlet, to warehouse their goods. The prices here have been influenced by this fact. The present stocks are estimated at about 4,500 sacks, the sale of which proceeds slowly. This state of affairs also hinders the dealers from passing new orders. Price in transit, Pts. 56 to 62 per oke, according to quality; in bond, 90 to 96 per oke, according to quality.

Flour.—The application as from March 1 of the new tariff on flour, entailing a quintupled tax, has led to a marked falling-off in arrivals and an almost complete stoppage of new orders. It is obvious that if these taxes are maintained the importation of flour will be rendered impossible. As a remedy for this state of affairs, merchants will be obliged to buy wheat. It is understood that some orders have already been placed in America.

Arrivals amount to 70,000 sacks of flour, the greater part having been delivered prior to March 1. Prices have risen as a result of the increase in the duty. Sales have been quiet. Stock amounts to between 15,000 and 20,000 sacks.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Drop in Futures.

The Commercial Company of Egypt, in their report for the week ended March 30, state: "Since our last report the Futures market has displayed great activity, but closes weak. The reaction in New York has continued and, as this year, on account of the restricted demand for fine counts, the prices of Egyptian cotton have followed the prices of American very closely, the recent setback of the latter has affected our market seriously.

The Ministry of Agriculture has issued a circular calling attention to the fact that this year the law prohibiting the storing of cotton in seed in the interior after April 30 will again become operative. The result will be that during next month the remainder of the cotton in the interior will be sent down to Alexandria.

The exports of the week have again been heavier than the arrivals, and the stock shows a further reduction and stands at 1,955,000 kantars, against 2,269,000 kantars a year ago.

Spot.—Total sales this week amount to about 5,400 bales, of which we estimate 3,300 bales Sakellaridis, 2,000 bales uppers, 50 bales white, and 50 bales brown.

Sakellarides.—All grades have been dealt in, but sellers have been very reluctant to follow the drop in Futures. There has been a slightly increased demand for the low grades, and business has been done at fairly high prices. For fully good fair to good and good buyers have been fairly plentiful, but unwilling to pay the premiums asked, and only a small turnover has been registered.

Uppers.—The last two sessions have shown a somewhat increased demand for this variety, mainly for the better grades. The price of spot against contracts remains about unchanged.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Business on Fair Scale.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended April 4:—

During the short business which is covered by the following, a very fair business has taken place, a fact that has proved rather a pleasant surprise in face of our previous experience of holiday markets in the past, and goes further to confirm our remarks in last week's report with regard to the steady trade that is going on here in Egyptian cotton. The bulk of the trade has taken place in Sakellaridis, 16½d. to 17½d., with Upper Egyptians 16d. to 16½d., proving a very good second. There was some hesitancy when the markets reopened after the holidays in the demand for uppers, but yesterday's recovery in the New York market was sufficient to draw attention once more in this direction, and both speculators and American spinners were again in the market. Sakellaridis shows signs of a renewed hardening in the basis, even in Liverpool, where a large stock is available, whilst in Alexandria the advance is still more pronounced. Cotton is being shipped rapidly from Egypt, and in that quarter the statistical position is regarded as being distinctly "bullish." Owing to the reversing of the premium between the two markets, Liverpool has been for some time now considerably cheaper than Alexandria, and cotton quoted c.i.f. from Egypt at 18d. can be matched here at fully ½d. per lb. less. In these circumstances it is not surprising that very little c.i.f. business is taking place. One or two new crop shipments of Sudan

Sakel have appeared on the market during the week, and seem to compare favourably with shipments received last year. The fancy prices being asked, however, are rather against it when one reflects that first-class Sakellaridis can be bought for 20d. Total sales, 3,000 bales. Quotations of fully good fair and above are reduced 10 points all round.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended April 7 states:—

A feature of the past week has been the recovery in American raw cotton rates, but, although the effect has been to induce sellers to adopt a stiffer attitude, buyers evidently do not intend to be influenced to the extent of placing orders for more than the minimum they require for immediate use.

Yarn.—Though the above-mentioned recovery in raw cotton is reflected in the higher quotations for yarns spun from the American staple, buyers are distinctly shy, and the market has remained dull, orders for export having been on a very small scale. The big reduction in the amount of yarn now being manufactured, though reducing stocks in hand, has had little or no effect on the attitude of users. The new regulations intended to prevent the sale of yarn by any mill at less than the price which covers the cost of production have not yet been taken very seriously, as the prices given by the Provisional Emergency Committee as minima are considerably above those at which ample supplies are on offer in the market.

Cloth.—Though conditions cannot be described as anything but dull, the cloth market has certainly closed the week with more activity than it commenced. India and China have placed a few orders for Fancies of various kinds and Fine Fabric, but orders for Dhooties and plain Grey Goods are conspicuous by their absence. Better news is said to be coming forward from the Levant, and a slightly increased demand has been noted.

Raw Cotton.—As mentioned above, there has been a marked rise in quotations for the American staple, though the undertone is extremely unsettled. Most of the sales which have taken place in Liverpool are reported to have been on Continental account. Spinners here continue to restrict their "spot" purchases to their immediate requirements. Closing prices are as follows:—American Fully Middling, 15.98d.; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 17.40d.

DIRECTORS' REPORT.

(Presented at the Sixty-ninth Ordinary General Meeting, 4th April, 1923.)

The Directors have now to submit to the Shareholders the Balance-sheet and Profit and Loss Account of the Bank for the year ended 31st December last.

These show a net profit, after providing for all bad and doubtful debts, of £1,004,701 4s 5d, inclusive of £215,169 15s 5d brought forward from the previous year. The Interim Dividend at the rate of Fourteen per cent. per annum paid in September last absorbed £210,000. The amount now available is therefore £794,701 4s 5d, and the Directors propose to pay a Final Dividend at the rate of Fourteen per cent. per annum, together with a Bonus of Six shillings and three pence per share, making Twenty and a-quarter per cent. per annum for the whole year, free of Income-tax, to add £100,000 to the Reserve Fund, which will then stand at £3,800,000; to add £25,000 to the Officers' Superannuation Fund; to write off Premises Account £50,000, and to carry forward the balance of £222,201 4s 5d.

Company Meetings.

CHARTERED BANK OF INDIA, AUSTRALIA, AND CHINA.

Improvement of Trade.

Sir Montagu Turner's Speech.

The sixty-ninth ordinary general meeting of the shareholders of the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China was held on April 4 on the bank's premises, 38, Bishopsgate, E.C. Sir Montagu Cornish Turner (chairman of the company) presided.

The Chief Manager (Mr. W. E. Preston) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman said: Gentlemen,—The figures in our statement of accounts reflect fairly accurately the trend of business during the past year at the various points in the East and Far East covered by the operations of this institution. At no single point have we witnessed a great spurt in business, no indication of that real revival in trade which we are hoping for so keenly as the solution of many of our difficulties, social, commercial, and political. On the other hand, international trade has not been entirely dead, and we might reasonably say it has shown an improvement on the position of 1921. We can say, for instance, that the effect of the terrific slump in prices of commodities is gradually working itself out; that the top-heavy load of unsold or rejected goods in India, China, and the East generally has been very appreciably lightened, though at heavy cost; and that we see rays of encouraging sunshine in place of the depressing dark clouds which encircled our horizon and obscured our vision some twelve months ago. All that is to the good.

Caution Desirable.

A spirit, a rightful spirit, of caution prevails at the present time and should be encouraged. Operators must work cautiously, and absolutely refrain from overloading Eastern markets with unrequired goods. We have no fear for the future. Once peace is assured—we cannot believe that the present chaos will be allowed to continue indefinitely—and the purchasing power of the consumer has been restored, we can reasonably expect an active trade between East and West.

India, for instance, with the advantage of a low exchange and the bountiful crops after two favourable south-west monsoons, has surplus stocks of wheat, seeds, barley, rice, cotton, and other commodities available for export as soon as the Western markets can take the goods.

In regard to exports from India, it is worth noting that in the year 1922 shipments of raw cotton to Japan totalled about 263,000 tons, valued at Rs.30,26,33,914. During the same period Shanghai took about 60,000 bales of yarn, compared with 500,000 to 600,000 bales some ten years ago, illustrating the unpleasant fact for Indian mills that the cotton mills in North China have increased with marked rapidity, and that there are to-day about 2,000,000 active spindles now at work.

Imports of Gold and Silver.

Further, in connection with the trade of India it is interesting to note that the imports of gold into India were:—In 1920, £12,054,086; in 1921, £7,204,864; and in 1922, £19,678,961. And the exports were:—In 1920, £5,083,956; in 1921, £20,242,221; and in 1922, £49,355. Silver imports were:—In 1920, £3,461,808; in 1921, £11,229,315; and in 1922, £12,108,845. And silver exports were:—In 1920, £2,417,937; in 1921, £1,989,238; and in 1922, £1,723,906. The imports of gold for the first quarter of this year have also been unusually heavy to meet the requirements of marriage ceremonies, and, perhaps, for hoarding purposes. Imports of gold and silver in January, 1923, were Rs.6,16,53,552 or £4,110,236; and in February, 1923, Rs.10,85,00,000, or £7,233,333. Mr. Findlay Shirras, in his book "Indian Finance and Banking," estimates that India, in the forty-six years from 1874 to 1919, absorbed gold coin and bullion to the amount of £250,000,000, or five times the world's average annual production in the same period.

India's Financial Position.

As regards India's financial position, we have heard a great deal lately about her Budget deficits. While it is true that they do exist, or have existed, they are due to abnormal demands and abnormal conditions. India is a country of immense resources and wonderful recuperative powers, and, provided that retrenchments, as suggested by the Inchcape Committee, are effected, the political agitator is reasonably restrained, and normal conditions prevail in Europe and America, I can see no reason why India should not be ere long in a very satisfactory financial position.

China has also products available for export to Western markets, but unhappily she is still greatly handicapped by internal unrest, and one almost despairs of seeing a really firm civil Government which could control the various elements of misrule and disturbance, a constant source of danger to the masses of humble traders who yearn to be let alone and be given a chance of peaceful life.

The Tea Industry.

As regards the position of special Eastern commodities, we must congratulate our friends engaged in the tea industry on the most satisfactory position in which they find themselves. The demand for tea of high grades and consumption of tea has increased more than we could have expected, and has, I imagine, exceeded the most sanguine expectations. The Straits and Federated Malay States have also benefited by a marked improvement in rubber and tin, though it must be remembered that in the case of rubber the improvement is in a measure due to restricted output; and before a real, substantial, and steady rise in the price of rubber can be looked for, there must be an increased legitimate demand for the article.

Looking all round, we ought to be satisfied with the position generally, in view of the prevailing world-wide state of political unsettlement and unrest. It is earnestly to be hoped that the present position of affairs in Central Europe may not be allowed to continue, to the great detriment of civilisation, and that in England all classes will recognise that strikes must be averted, that hearty co-operation must exist between employer and employed, and that increased output and increased exports are essential if we wish to maintain the credit of this country in the world of finance.

Balance-sheet Figures.

Turning to the figures of our balance-sheet, although our total figures for 1922 (£60,153,372 15s. 10d.) show a reduction as against the £61,767,780 18s. 8d. for the same period in 1921, the decrease is more apparent than real, as our Indian figures this year have been brought into our accounts at a 1s. 4d. rupee instead of 1s. 8d., as in 1921. This more particularly applies to the items in our balance-sheet under the heading of current and other accounts at £25,765,183 2s. 4d., and bills discounted and loans at £17,456,245 17s. 7d., whilst the latter, in addition, reflects the pleasing liquidation which has taken place in the derelict Eastern advances.

Our cash in hand and at bankers at £4,515,804 16s. 9d. is down £2,135,962 1s. 5d. on last year's total, but our holdings of bills of exchange, including Treasury bills, have correspondingly been increased from £16,422,953 16s. 10d. to £17,932,445, whilst our holdings of Government and other securities now stand at £12,159,013 18s., against £9,432,796 8s. 8d. on December 31, 1921. Our fixed deposits at £16,643,106 8s. 7d. are within £5,048 15s. 2d. of our 1921 figures. With the exception of our bank premises account, which shows an increase of £189,388 14s. 1d., due mainly to cost of our new Shanghai and Java premises, the other items in our balance-sheet do not call for comment.

Trustee Department.

I have to remind you that at the close of this meeting an extraordinary general meeting will be held to pass certain resolutions, copies of which have already been circulated. The effect is to create a trustee department in this bank. For some time past, to meet the convenience of our constituents, we have had a special department to deal with the payment of income-tax and the recoveries of income-tax. Many of our friends, who have been our constituents in the East, have suggested that we should also have a trustee department, and after consideration the board decided to meet this reasonable request. We have every hope that it will be successful.

In conclusion, I desire on behalf of the board to congratulate Mr. Preston, as chief manager of this bank, on the very satisfactory position disclosed in our report. We tender our thanks to him, to Mr. Bruce, Mr. Miller, to the managers abroad, and to the entire staff for the excellent work they have put in, and for the manner in which they have conducted our business, both at home and abroad, in these most difficult times.

I now move, "That the report now presented, together with the balance-sheet and profit and loss account, be approved and adopted."

Sir Alfred Dent, K.C.M.G., seconded the resolution, and it was carried unanimously.

Dividend and Bonus.

The Chairman then moved: "That a dividend at the rate of 14 per cent. per annum for the half-year ended December 31 last, together with a bonus of 6s. 3d. per share, free of income-tax, be now declared, payable on and after the 11th inst."

The Right Hon. Lord George Hamilton, G.C.S.I., seconded the motion, and it was unanimously approved.

The Chairman next proposed the re-election of the retiring directors, Sir Alfred Dent, K.C.M.G., Mr. Thomas Cuthbertson, and Mr. J. M. G. Proffit.

This was seconded by the Right Hon. Sir John N. Jordan, G.C.M.G., G.C.I.E., K.C.B., and unanimously adopted.

On the proposition of Mr. Robert F. Banks, seconded by Mr. Henry B. Henley, the auditors, Mr. D. C. Wilson, F.C.A., and Mr. H. C. K. Stileman, F.C.A., were reappointed.

Votes of Thanks to Directors and Staff.

Mr. Frederick Tomkinson proposed a cordial vote of thanks to the directors and the staff for their successful management of the bank. In doing so, he said that the shareholders were greatly indebted to all concerned in the working of the bank, from the chairman downwards, for the able way in which its affairs had been conducted during a most strenuous year. He particularly wished to mention the staff abroad, who worked often in climatic conditions which were not as favourable as those at home, and the shareholders in London owed a debt of gratitude to them for the able assistance they had given to the board. With regard to the chief manager at home, he was well known in banking circles, and needed no further praise.

Mr. Bernard R. Glover seconded the vote, and it was unanimously accorded.

The Chairman briefly acknowledged the compliment on behalf of the board, and Mr. W. E. Preston (chief manager), who responded on behalf of the staff, said that it had been their endeavour through somewhat trying times to be the means of presenting to the shareholders what the latter had stated to be satisfactory figures, and, provided trade conditions during the next year were no worse, they could only endeavour to repeat them.

Extraordinary General Meeting.

An extraordinary general meeting was then held, at which resolutions were passed approving a supplemental Royal Charter and altering the provisions of the company's Deed of Settlement dated March 20, 1854.

Mr. Tomkinson said he did not think the shareholders would wish to separate without passing a very cordial vote of thanks to Sir Montagu Turner for the able way in which he had presided on the present occasion, and also for the speech he had delivered, which had been particularly interesting from various points of view. He would not touch upon those points, but he did wish to say how much he, and doubtless other shareholders present, appreciated what Sir Montagu had said about trade, and his statement that if the Government showed a strong hand business people would feel secure—as, indeed, had been shown since Gandhi's seclusion.

The vote was cordially approved.

The Chairman briefly acknowledged the compliment, and added that a meeting would be held about three weeks hence for the purpose of submitting for confirmation the resolutions which had just been passed at the extraordinary general meeting.

The proceedings then terminated.

NATIONAL BANK OF INDIA.

Improving Indian Position.

Mr. Robert Williamson's Speech.

The ordinary general meeting of the National Bank of India, Ltd., was held on April 4 at the Wesleyan Hall, Bishopsgate. Mr. Robert Williamson (deputy-chairman) presided.

Mr. C. Nicoll (general manager) having read the notice convening the meeting and the auditors' report,

The Chairman said:—Ladies and gentlemen, the report of the directors and the accounts for the year ending December 31, 1922, have been before you for some days, and I may presume we may, as usual, take them as read.

We are pleased to be able to put before you such satisfactory results from our operations, for trade conditions throughout the year have not been favourable. In addition, we have had to contend with very keen competition in our business, and margins in exchange have thereby been very bare. Still, our resources one way and another have been well employed, and we are able to show a net profit of £535,160 5s. 5d., to which there falls to be added £164,095 12s. 8d. brought forward from the previous year, the total at our disposal being thus £699,255 18s. 1d., which compares with the slightly larger sum of £704,095 12s. 8d. for the year 1921. A diminution in profits has been experienced by most banking concerns. We have provided for all bad and doubtful debts.

Our proposals to you to-day are: to place £100,000 to the credit of our reserve account, raising the total to £2,700,000, or £700,000 in excess of our paid-up capital, £20,000 to the pension fund for the bank's officers, and to write down our house property account by £20,000. The remaining balance permits of our paying quite easily to the shareholders our usual dividend at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum, free of income-tax, which, with the interim dividend, will cost £400,000, and carrying forward £159,255 18s. 1d. undivided profits.

We have already expended some money in building new office premises at Cochin and Newera Eliya; we are now engaged in an important addition to the Bombay office, and in the future—not immediate—we shall have a considerable sum to find in connection with an entirely new office at Colombo, the cost of the site for which we have already paid. These outlays, therefore, make it essential for us to write down our property account.

I trust you will be as well pleased with these figures as we are, and be in agreement with us in the matter of disposal of profits.

The Balance Sheet.

Inasmuch as there are some changes in the balance-sheet figures in comparison with those of the previous year, I may as well glance at them now.

If you will look at the liability side you will observe that current, fixed deposit, and other accounts total £32,267,601. There is some little falling off here compared with the previous year, but this is not to be wondered at considering the competition of Indian Government Six per Cent. tax-free bonds and other issues. Bills payable show an increase, but acceptances for customers are down. This.

of course, is a reflex of the smaller volume of business passing.

Turning to the assets side, I would point out that there is an increase in our holdings of both rupee and sterling securities—in the latter case the sum of £5,581,175 represents an increase of £3,308,944 over a year ago. These are all gilt-edged, and about 90 per cent. of them are short-dated bonds. Our investments total £8,639,271, and stood in our books at December 31 well under market value. In cash and securities we held nearly £14,000,000—a very strong position—to which, moreover, there falls to be added a considerable amount representing our holding in Treasury bills included in bills of exchange, so that our cash balance could be readily augmented at any moment.

As in the case of acceptances, bills of exchange show a falling off, and this again is an indication of the smaller business passing both in imports and exports.

Discounts, loans, etc., stand at £14,247,130, and I think that, on the whole, our figures make a very satisfactory showing.

India's Demand for Gold.

A very notable point in connection with Indian business is the persistent demand experienced for gold in the past year, which still continues, and more keenly perhaps than ever before. At times in recent weeks there were orders in the London market for two or three times more than the quantity available for sale. When I was addressing you at this time last year I gave you some details of imports and exports, and those applicable to silver as well, but they were somewhat fragmentary as regards the year 1921. I have had them looked into again for that year and also 1922, with the following result:—

GOLD—

Imported 1921.....	£7,205,000
Exported 1921.....	20,300,000
Surplus of exports	£13,095,000
Imported 1922.....	£19,700,000
Exported 1922.....	50,000
Surplus of imports	£19,650,000

SILVER—

Imported 1921.....	£11,300,000
Exported 1921.....	2,000,000
Surplus of imports	£9,300,000
Imported 1922.....	£12,500,000
Exported 1922.....	1,760,000
Surplus of imports	£10,740,000

Therefore, in 1922 the surplus of imports of gold and silver combined reached the large sum of £30,000,000.

In 1921, it is believed, a considerable amount of gold was sent from Bombay to Japan, probably connected with repayment of money borrowed by our Government from that country, while there were also fairly large supplies sold to America, an unusual operation, a tempting price being offered for the metal.

In addition to these imports and exports, India for the last few years has retained all the gold the produce of the Southern Indian Mines, which for the years 1920, 1921, 1922, totalled 1,189,623 ozs., and also the whole of the silver from the Burmah Corporation Company's important undertaking in the Shan States.

In 1922 India must have received probably something like a quarter of the world's production of gold, and, although the mints are still closed to the coinage of silver to the public, about one-half of the output of that metal.

Since the beginning of this year the demand for gold has been stronger than ever, and for the three months up to date the value of the shipments is estimated at £10,000,000, which includes shipments from America, and of silver £3,500,000. The former figures are very big, and I would myself expect some slacking off in the demand, but at this moment there is no evidence of that.

Balance of Trade.

In the balance of trade figures for the past year—largely adverse to India for each of the two previous years, as I pointed out to you—a very gratifying change has taken place, and we find some little justification for the purchases of the precious metals in such volume, which I have been bringing to your notice. Since March of last year the balance has been in favour of India, and for the whole year the total is Rs.11,35,00,000, or £7,600,000, but we need to see a much greater improvement, and we must all hope for an early return to pre-war conditions to bring this about. At the moment the outlook in Europe is dismal enough, and the problems to be settled are most difficult and complex.

Notwithstanding some differences among the politicians at Delhi, the country as a whole strikes me, from what I read, as more settled, and the great mass of the people more contented than two to three years ago. I assume that the large crops reaped from the sowings in the autumn and cold weather of 1921 have contributed to this improvement. In a note issued by the Viceroy a few days ago in connection with the proposed addition to the tax on salt, I was glad to read that the cost of living had fallen and that he anticipated a further decline.

A year ago, I told you of the favourable monsoon of 1921, and of the abundant crops, particularly of wheat in the Punjab and in the United Provinces, which would be harvested. The ban upon exports was removed at the end of September last, and since then probably not more than 200,000 tons have been exported. There must still be a great quantity available from that harvest, but the matter of prices there and here seems to prevent business being carried through.

I believe the monsoon last year has been even more favourable than in 1921, and still larger crops are again almost a certainty. There are not lacking indications of improvement, quite definite in this country in the case of coal, iron, and steel, probably due to the intrusion in the Ruhr, but not visible in Lancashire piecegoods, etc. The supply in India of these latter cannot be abundant, due perhaps to middling American cotton costing fully 15d. per lb. Some months ago the price was between 9d. and 10d. per lb., on which basis the outlook for business was then really promising. Now, with the higher price of cotton, trade conditions from an Indian outlook with the outer world are decidedly "patchy." European affairs still remain very much "out of joint," and we seem yet to be some distance away from making a real all-round start on pre-war lines. We badly need large buyers for India's food supplies and raw materials, and when they are forthcoming Indians will respond by purchases from Lancashire and elsewhere.

We all hope that complete success will attend the efforts of the present Government to smooth out the obstacles which block the way.

Exchange.

Throughout the greater part of last year rates of exchange ruled fairly steady in the neighbourhood of 1s. 4d. per rupee, but in January of this year there was something of a surprise when the rate made a rapid upward movement until it reached 1s. 5½d. for T.T.

The average rate for money of the Imperial Bank of India has been about 4½ per cent., but on December 14 it had risen to 6 per cent., on December 28 to 7 per cent., and on January 11 last to 8 per cent., which is still the current rate, but with some indications of ease. There was great tightness in the money market, the real foundation for which may have been due to too rapid deflation in the currency by Government. But at the time a considerable amount of financing had to be done in connection with shipments of cotton to China and Japan, and speculation, especially on the part of bullion dealers, became very active, and these factors had an influence in bringing about this sudden change. The jump has not been of very long duration, and the rate of exchange is now back to about 1s. 4 1/16d.

The matter of a return to what is called the old fixed rate of 1s. 4d. is still very much in the air. Apparently difficulties in Europe and with Turkey must first be disposed of, says the Finance Minister, before that matter can be tackled.

Positions in East Africa.

As regards East Africa, there is, I think, some improvement in the prospects of both trade and agriculture.

The export trade of the country is more active and its products, such as sisal, maize, coffee, hides, etc., find a ready market. The Uganda cotton crop, although it will not realise the original estimate of about 100,000 bales.

will be fairly large, and should assist in the offtake of imported goods through the buying power produced from its sale. The repeal of the Kenya income-tax and revision of Customs duties should also improve matters.

There are certain political disturbances locally almost inseparable from the growth of a young country with a mixed population such as Kenya has, which we all trust are capable of adjustment. The outlook in this direction is promising, as deputations from the disputants are coming here to interview the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

It is only fitting that, before I close my remarks, I should, on behalf of my colleagues and myself, express our hearty appreciation of the efforts of our managers and staff at home and abroad during the past year, which have enabled us to lay before you so satisfactory a result of a strenuous period.

I beg to propose:—"That the report of the directors and statement of accounts for the year ended December 31, 1922, be received and adopted, and that a dividend for the six months to December 31, 1922, at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum be paid on the shares of the company registered at this date, the same to be payable, free of income-tax, on and after April 5, 1923."

After this resolution has been seconded by Mr. Miller, if anyone wishes to ask any questions before I put it to the meeting I shall be pleased to answer them.

Mr. Robert Miller: I have much pleasure in seconding the resolution which has just been proposed.

The resolution was carried unanimously, without discussion.

Re-election of Directors.

The Chairman: I have much pleasure in proposing: "That Mr. Robert Campbell be re-elected a director of the bank." I avail myself of this opportunity to say a few words about our chairman, whose absence to-day every one of you, I am sure, as deeply regrets as we his colleagues do. A year ago I thought it possible that he might again be able to preside at some of our board meetings in the past year and at to-day's meeting, but, unfortunately, the state of his health has made that impossible. He is still much of an invalid, but fairly well. He continues to take a keen interest in the business of the bank, and is furnished every day with copies of our telegrams. Although not present, he is always at our disposal if and when we want to consult him, and with that we must rest satisfied.

Mr. J. N. Stuart: I have great pleasure in seconding the resolution.

The motion was unanimously adopted.

The other retiring directors—Mr. J. D. Nimmo and Mr. J. N. Stuart—were unanimously re-elected, and the auditors were re-appointed.

Mr. H. H. Nelson then proposed: "That a very hearty vote of thanks be given to the chairman and directors for the care and prudence exercised in conducting the affairs of the bank during the past year, and to the general manager and staff for their valuable services." He said that he personally—and he thought he could speak on behalf of all the shareholders—was delighted to know that the bank still had the advantage of the clear intellect, the wonderful knowledge, and the splendid character as a man of business and as a gentleman of Mr. Robert Campbell to assist the able body of directors in the conduct of their affairs. He thought the prosperity of the bank was largely due to Mr. Campbell's wisdom and knowledge in the selection of his associates and in selection of his staff.

Mr. Frederick Tomkinson seconded the motion, which was unanimously approved.

The Chairman briefly returned thanks, and said care would be taken that the vote of thanks should be transmitted to the staff abroad.

The proceedings then terminated.

THE NATIONAL BANK OF EGYPT.

The twenty-third annual general meeting of the shareholders in the National Bank of Egypt was held on March 19 at the head office of the bank in Cairo. Mr. B. Hornsby, C.B.E. (the Governor), who presided, said: Gentlemen, we have the honour to submit to you the balance-sheet and profit and loss account for the year 1922.

You will notice that the gross profits amount to £906,869. After deducting £404,775 for expenses there remains an available balance of £502,094, which enables us to propose to you the allocation of £50,000 to the special reserve and the payment of a dividend of 15 per cent. requiring £450,000.

The gross profits are £85,000 below those of 1921. We are pleased, however, to report a decrease of £28,000 in expenses, so that the net profit is only about £50,000 less than last year. Having regard to the shrinkage in the margin of interest which took place during the year, I think we may congratulate ourselves on this result.

The total of our balance-sheet shows an increase over last year of about seven millions, due almost entirely to the larger balance which we hold for the Egyptian Government.

It is satisfactory to note that there has been no decrease in our deposits from the general public, which remain at about the same figure as they were at the end of 1921.

Our holding of Government securities shows a large increase over last year. These securities, of which a large part falls due in the near future, appear in our books at a considerably less sum than they would realise at present-day prices.

Our advances are slightly lower, but the item of bills of exchange is much higher on account of the rapidity with which the cotton crop has been exported. These bills are of the highest class, and constitute an extremely liquid asset.

We regret to have to inform you that we have not been able to make much progress in respect of the claims against our German and Austrian debtors, and we have been obliged to institute proceedings before the Mixed Arbitral Tribunals constituted by the Peace Treaties. Our principal debtor appears to be striving to delay matters, and there is as yet no sign of this particular case being heard in the near future; we continue to do our utmost to bring matters to a successful conclusion.

Note Issue.

Our note issue, which was £E37,000,000 on January 1, 1922, fell gradually till the end of August, when it touched its lowest point during the year, £E26,300,000. On December 31 it was back to £E33,200,000, showing a decrease for 1922 of nearly four millions.

The following figures give the highest and lowest point reached by the Issue during each of the past five years. It must be remembered, however, that this was an abnormal period, and it would be incorrect to draw any pessimistic conclusions from the difference between the highest and lowest figures attained.

	Highest. £E.	Lowest. £E.
1918	46,100,000	29,200,000
1919	68,200,000	39,900,000

Egypt's Foreign Trade—Increased Exports.

The following statistics of the foreign trade of Egypt from 1917 to 1922 show that the adverse balance of the year 1920-21 has been corrected and that exports have once again exceeded imports. These figures refer, of course, only to merchandise; to obtain a true estimate of the economic state of the country account must be taken of invisible factors on both sides, such as debt charges, etc.

Cotton Crop.

The cotton crop of this past winter has been marketed with more than usual rapidity. Prices have again been disappointing for growers, and it is certain that the finer qualities of Sakellaridis have not obtained the same premium over American cotton as in the past. On the other hand, the lower qualities and Upper Egypt cotton have maintained their position and during this season it has been possible to dispose of a large accumulation of low cotton which had been unsaleable for the last two or three years.

Purchase of Egyptian Securities.

It is interesting to note that since the war this country has acquired from foreign holders a great number of Egyptian securities. England, France, and Germany, for reasons connected with their own situation, have been constant sellers, and thanks to the prosperity of previous years the Egyptian market has been able to absorb easily all that was offered.

According to the statistics published by the Caisse de la Dette, the proportion of coupons of Egyptian Unified Debt paid in Egypt, which was only 5½ per cent. in May, 1916, had risen to 37 per cent. in November, 1920. At those same dates the proportion of coupons paid in London free of income-tax rose from 18½ per cent. to 35½ per cent. Details of the payment of coupons of the Privileged Debt show a similar increase.

Account must be taken, it is true, of the shrinkage of the public fortune which has taken place owing to the depreciation of European currencies. During the war there were numerous investments of Egyptian money in War Loans of the Allies, and since the Armistice Russian roubles, Austrian crowns, and German marks have been very largely bought. It is almost impossible to estimate what the amount involved may be, but it is certainly considerable.

THE SUDAN.

Progress of Railway and Irrigation Schemes.

Notwithstanding the universal trade depression, economic and financial conditions in the Sudan have been fairly satisfactory, as may be seen from the following figures of exports and imports for the last five years:—

	Imports. £E.	Exports. £E.	Total. £E.
1918	4,024,582	4,210,384	8,234,966
1919	4,805,745	3,029,569	7,835,314
1920	7,006,865	5,075,971	12,082,836
1921	5,806,070	2,318,533	8,124,603
1922	4,252,890	2,298,770	6,551,660

The value of exports is roughly the same as in 1921. Imports show a marked decrease, owing to the suspension of work on the White Nile dam and on the Gezira Irrigation Scheme.

I alluded last year to the negotiations then in progress relative to the issue of a further loan by the Sudan Government. These negotiations have been so far successful that a 4½ per cent. loan for £3,250,000, the principal and interest of which are guaranteed by the British Government, has recently been issued, and work on the Gezira Scheme is again in full swing.

In addition to these works, the building of a new line linking up Kassala to the Khartoum-Port Sudan Railway has been started, the completion of which will greatly facilitate the transport to Port Sudan of the products of Kassala Province and further develop the country's trade.

During the past year we have had to deplore the death of two of our colleagues on the London Committee, the Hon. Algernon Mills and Sir Carl Meyer, Bart. Both these gentlemen had been members of our board since the foundation of the bank, and we shall greatly miss their wide business experience and their sound judgment. We desire to express to their families our heartfelt sympathy.

New Directors.

Since our last general meeting we have elected H.E. Adly Pacha Yeghen to our board. The name and reputation of Adly Pacha are well known to you, and we are sure you will share the satisfaction we feel in having obtained his collaboration.

In the place of the Hon. Algernon Mills we have elected Lord Cullen of Ashbourne, whose long experience in the city will be of great value to our London Committee.

In accordance with the statutes, these two nominations require your confirmation.

The directors who retire by rotation this year are Mr. H. E. Barker and Mr. Robert Rolo, who offer themselves for re-election.

Finally, the board desire to thank the sub-governors, the managers, and the staff for the services they have rendered during the year.

The accounts of the British Trade Corporation for the year 1922 show a credit balance of £39,412, compared with an adverse balance of £193,075 at December 31, 1921. The directors state that they find it necessary to recommend the writing down of a further £2 10s. on each of the 200,000 shares of the original issue in respect of depreciation of assets in 1921.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Chester Concession.

In the interval before the reopening of the Lausanne Conference next Monday the Chester concession for railway construction in, and the general development of, Anatolia and its endorsement by the Angora National Assembly tend to monopolise interest in Near Eastern affairs. The American project has been under consideration in Turkey for a considerable period. In well-informed quarters it has always been regarded as a serious scheme, although some doubt has been entertained in regard to the ability of the promoters to raise the capital required. Turkish opinion would seem on the whole to have been unfavourable; the wide scope of the concession was regarded with suspicion, and fears were entertained lest Turkey might be placing herself too completely into the hands of a single Power. For many weeks the concession was ostensibly the target for unpromising opposition on the part of a Committee of the Angora Assembly. It was then submitted to a plenary session, and immediately ratified by 185 votes to 21.

The Development of Turkey.

The concession that has thus been granted to an American group of financiers provides for the construction of a network of railways in Anatolia and for the rebuilding of Angora, and gives to the concessionnaires mining rights over all territories within ten kilometres of either side of the railway lines included in the concession. As one of the proposed railways is to connect Mosul with Kirkuk and Suleimaniyah—all three towns outside Turkey to-day—it is evident that the main concern of both Turks and Americans has been to make the concession as comprehensive as possible, without paying much regard to such details as the rights or interests of others. A protest against the concession has been lodged by the French Government on the ground that it infringes a similar agreement made between Turkey and France in 1914. If the Chester group were to appear in Irak to-morrow to claim the Mosul oilfields on the strength of the concession it is conceivable that the British Government would also feel obliged to enter a caveat against the agreement. In other respects there would seem to be little ground on which to base legitimate objections to the project. Turkey is a free agent in such matters, and it was not improbable that she would turn to America, if only to vent her spite against the French, whose Turkish policy now has few admirers either inside or outside France. A more dispassionate basis for a highly important agreement would have been better for Turkey, as her pique may have tended to obscure the obvious advantage of interesting several Powers rather than one alone in her development.

The Need for Circumspection.

If it be a fact that the Chester concession as ratified by the Angora Assembly does provide for the construction of railways in Irak, its weakness, from Turkey's point of view, will probably be that its comprehensive character will commit the Turks to expenditure which is not justified in the present state of their national finances. There is an analogy in the American loan to Yugoslavia, which involves that country in the unnecessary extravagance—as it must be in present circumstances—of a railway to the Adriatic coast. The Chester project includes the conversion of Angora into a Turkish Washington—a very laudable undertaking, perhaps, when for a generation or two such a thing as official salaries being in arrear has not been heard of in Turkey, but at this stage of the country's development, with Constantinople already equipped as a capital, an entirely senseless proceeding. Great Britain's interest lies in seeing Turkey develop on sound, practical lines, and she is not likely to take up the attitude that Americans are less capable than the British of carrying out that development. But she will be justifiably sceptical of the wisdom of any project that is open to the charge of pandering to Turkish vanity, and is not inspired solely by the desire to promote Turkey's good. If the United States Government finds itself called upon to take official cognisance of the Chester concession, it is to be hoped that it will insist upon making its own special charge the strict safeguarding of Turkish interests. Turkey stands in need of expert advice and sympathetic helpers in every department of the State; she does not want to fall into the hands of mere money-lenders.

France and the Concession.

The Chester concession places France in a grave quandary, and it is hardly a matter for surprise that the French Government should be reported to be considering the advisability of asking for a delay in the resumption of the Lausanne negotiations in order to take further stock of the position created by Turkey's action. In February, 1914, Turkey negotiated a loan of £22,000,000 in France, and was paid at once more than £16,000,000 of this sum; the quid pro quo for France was the grant of important railway, harbour, and mining concessions in Anatolia. Turkey received her French gold, but the War cancelled the railway concession. It was the knowledge, no doubt, that the rival American group of 1914 was still in the field for a concession in Turkey that prompted French insistence upon the inclusion in the Lausanne draft Treaty of a clause (Article 94) providing that all concessions granted by Turkey before October 29, 1914, should be restored in their entirety, notwithstanding the non-fulfilment by Turkey of all the conditions requisite for their final confirmation. The Chester concession goes much farther than the Franco-Turkish loan agreement of 1914, which gave French interests the right to construct three thousand kilometres of railway in Anatolia, including the Samsun-Sivas-Arga line, with branches to Kastamuni and to Yozgad on the west, and to Erzerum, Trebizond, and Van on the east. Article 94 of the draft Treaty and the Chester concession are incompatible. It remains to be seen, therefore, whether France will resign the hopes that she has so long entertained of securing economic supremacy in Turkey, or will challenge the American concession even to the extent of delaying the Peace Treaty.

Storm Signals in Roumania.

In spite of the efforts in imagination of one or two English daily papers, a "revolution" has not yet broken out in Roumania. It is true that the Government has taken the step of mobilising a certain number of troops—a sinister admission of its lack of confidence in its own position—but, so far, fire-hoses only, and not artillery, have been brought into action in the streets of Bucharest. The occasion was a public meeting of the Opposition parties, which appears to have been as peaceful in its conduct and intentions as it was formidable in its dimensions. The Government took alarm, and by its action has banged, if it has not also barred, the door leading to the possibility of a compromise with its opponents. It seems thus to have left itself with little else than a policy of terrorism to fall back upon, and no one who knows much about the Roumanian character will augur success for such a policy. We can but hope that at the eleventh hour wiser counsels will prevail, or that King Ferdinand, whose attitude is apparently not understood by the Opposition, will provide the outside influence that is badly needed to bring the warring factions to a saner frame of mind.

The Slavery Scare.

There is a tendency to challenge the accuracy of the information regarding the extent to which slave-dealing is carried on to-day in Abyssinia. The evidence of Major H. A. C. Darley, quoted in these columns last week, is now alleged to be out of date and not to be applicable to present-day conditions. Credit is given to the Regent for a noticeable improvement in regard to the evil. It is to be hoped that these later accounts are correct. As the subject is to come before the League of Nations, the world ought to be informed exactly how the matter stands, whether the traffic in slaves still takes place in Abyssinia, and whether any large number of people is still kept in slavery.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

The Premiership.

Though everyone expected the early retirement from the Premiership of Mr. Bonar Law, on the grounds of his delicate health, the news, now stated with every appearance of authority, that the Premiership will very shortly be vacant came as rather a surprise. The information, however, comes from a not disinterested source. A few weeks ago there was but one name on people's lips as the successor of the present Premier—that of Mr. Stanley Baldwin, the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but since that time various things, such as adverse by-elections and a defeat of the Government in the House, have impressed upon the country the weakness of the Administration. Consequently, there is much talk of a Unionist Government which shall include such ex-Ministers as Mr. Austen Chamberlain, Lord Balfour, Sir Robert Horne, and Lord Birkenhead.

Such a formation as this would mean in effect the triumph of policy over principle, and would, therefore, be vigorously opposed by the Die-Hard element in the present Administration, which, unfortunately, scarcely has the intelligence to formulate its principles into a policy. It must be admitted that Mr. Bonar Law's Government has disappointed, but he took over at an extremely difficult time, and the expedient of jainéance that he has adopted needed far more courage than might have been supposed. No one doubts the ability of Mr. Austen Chamberlain and of his colleagues, but we are well content with their absence. Especially are we not convinced by their partial suggestion that they alone stand between us and Socialism. But, of course, the country (which was supposed at the time of the Carlton Club incident to be unanimously behind what is now the present Government, and is now supposed to be behind the ex-Unionist Ministers) will have no say in the choice of Mr. Bonar Law's successor.

Scuffle and Song in the House.

The House has just had a week full of incident. It re-assembled on Monday; the Government had a motion arising out of the grievances of ex-Service men in Government employ defeated by seven votes on Tuesday, affected on Wednesday to ignore this defeat, and for their sins had "The Red Flag" sung at them by some Labour members and one or two of their members hustled, and on Thursday and Friday were completely obstructed in their business by the simmering Labour extremists. It was not a helpful week for the Government. Whether, as, of course, was at once said by the middle-class voter, it has badly damaged the cause of Labour, whose leaders are manifestly incapable of controlling their followers, and so on, and so on, is much more problematical. To suppose that good manners in the House are a sine quâ non in the consideration of those who vote Labour is really rather absurd; and the fact that the successful tactics of these extremists have so angered the Press hardly points to any rooted conviction that Socialism is further away than ever. If the Government were neither slack nor weak, such tactics as these could not possibly succeed; but when an unexpected streak of gold is found (for that, in effect, was what the Government defeat amounted to), it were the grossest folly to expect that the Labour member, like any capitalist, would not exploit it to the fullest.

Beyond any doubt at all, this behaviour of the Labour people was extremely offensive, and to be condemned utterly. But are they to be blamed more than the voters who put them in the House? In any case, there is little to be feared from such incidents as these, because fear can arise only of something that is strong, and the past week has shown but weakness on the part both of the Government and of its Opposition.

The Government and the Strikes.

A building strike has at the eleventh hour been averted, but the agricultural dispute in Norfolk yet remains unsettled. Upon the Report of the Tribunal to which I referred last week the Government have not yet made up their mind, but they appear to be doubtful about some of its provisions. In an official statement they say nothing on the questions of malting barley and of wheat offals, and on the duty on hops they are delaying action. But they are definitely going to help—though this does not amount to salvation—the farmer over local rates. On the whole, however, the intentions of the Government are obscure; and the affair in Norfolk meanwhile drags hopelessly on.

The King and the Pope.

There are cynics who affirm that Christianity is dead in these islands, but even they would not deny the still-existing vitality of Protestantism. It is extraordinary, but it is nevertheless indisputable, that fear of the supremacy of the Pope still lingers on, when much more important fears have died away, in the hearts of our independent race. There are, for instance, literally thousands of well-intentioned folk who deplore the forthcoming visit of His Majesty to the Vatican. Some of them had a meeting about it last week, and packed the Albert Hall with themselves and with resolutions concerning the sorrow that would overtake them were such a visit to take place, and demanding the immediate withdrawal of the British Envoy to the Vatican. This particular kind of Protestant has a certain justification when he contends that a visit by our present King is not on all fours with the visit by the late King, because, though it is not reported as being said at the Albert Hall, the Roman Catholic religion has on the Continent made a considerable stride in the last few years. But even if Roman Catholics all over the world were to regard this visit as a recognition on our part of the superiority and supremacy of the Pope, one does not easily see what harm it would do us. However, such a manifestation of the old-fashioned independence is rather exhilarating; it is, however misguided it may be, so much better than the more prevalent indifference, and something really ought to be done with it.

The Canonization of Henry VI.

To this picture of Protestant England there is, of course, another side, and it was provided the other day by Mr. Shane Leslie, who has been studying the prospects of the canonization of King Henry VI. It appears that in the British Museum are manuscripts containing the record of many miracles performed by Henry VI., and the written testimony of some of them is being forwarded to the Congregation of Rites in Rome. Further, there was for forty years and from all parts of England a pilgrimage to the Royal Saint's grave at Windsor. It had been hoped that the Pope would be able to assure King George, on his approaching visit, that "Harry of Windsor" was a canonized saint: but the matter has not yet been sufficiently sifted.

Thus it will be seen how impossible it is to get away from our "Roman" past; to stretch an arm freely in the twentieth century is but to be reminded of a foot fast in the fifteenth. They may at Albert Hall say that you cannot put the hands of the clock back; but history seems to say that you can—that is, to those who believe in history.

The Rage of London.

At the moment, despite many lapses in our judgment—chiefly to be manifested in our appreciation of American imports—things are brighter in the London theatres. I do not mean that "success" is not still the sole criterion of the value of a play, but that "success" is occasionally attending plays that are worth while. There is, for a very notable instance, Eugene O'Neill's play, "Anna Christie," in the production of which is to be found most unusually fine acting. Art—real art—has somehow found its way into what will in all probability be a commercial success. Again, London is readily appreciating the appearance of the Teatro del Piccoli from Rome; these puppets, indeed, are already "the rage of the town." They have explored very deeply, these Italians, into the possibilities of the puppets; they have made them technically perfect, and they have so linked them up with music as to enforce treatment of them as serious art. We have long been familiar with the comic possibilities of puppets—it is a quite favourite music-hall turn—but Londoners had never before seen marionettes turned to tragic purpose. Even now people are discussing the limits, sometimes as if none existed, of the uses to which marionettes can be put; and certainly no one who has not seen these at the New Scala Theatre can have any conception of how surely their artificiality wears off and of how illusion bathes us round.

Modern "Politics."

Much entertainment was derived from an article on "Liberty," by Mussolini, which the Morning Post republished the other day. The article itself was full of shrewd sense, but what was interesting to us was the way in which our organ of Tory opinion—the "best" newspaper in this country—linked it up with that vague mass of instinctive desires and hatreds which the post-War generation calls its political opinions. For no one can doubt that the old-fashioned, constitutional Liberalism and Conservatism in Great Britain are dying; those who intimately experienced the War have come in an unexpected way to count the end and almost to ignore the means. Of course, there is great haziness about so dangerous a doctrine; in Italy, where the end—the extermination or checking of Socialism and Liberalism—was counted worthy, the means that Mussolini employed also are counted good; in Russia, the means are condemned along with the end. Whether this very utilitarian principle is an inevitable revolt from the Victorian mode of political thought, or whether it is merely a passing effect of War-fatigue, it is difficult to tell, but certainly the tendency or willingness to desert constitutional methods is quite deep and wide in England—much wider than the comparatively narrow radius of the Morning Post might suggest.

London's Largest Club.

In these days of superlatives, skyscrapers, and trusts, a "largest" club in London was inevitable, and it appears to have been opened recently. A certain Glasgow man, Mr. T. C. Gordon, is responsible for it, and he has already collected 5,000 members. The premises are in King Street, off Baker Street, and they contain an immense hall where 1,500 people can dine or 1,000 can dance, a billiard-room with forty tables, a table-tennis room with thirty tables, and reading, writing, smoking, and card rooms. The organiser hopes for a membership of 20,000, so that the name of the club—the London Club—is appropriate enough.

I suppose one should say nothing about this institution, for which, incidentally, the annual subscription is a guinea for men and half a guinea for women, until one has seen it, but it all sounds a little oppressing. But undoubtedly it will be unique, like no other club in the world, and its members ought to wear some distinctive signs. Perhaps after a month or two they will develop them.

MOSLEM WAR VICTIMS IN ANATOLIA.

We have received from the Rt. Hon. Syed Ameer Ali, President of the British Red Crescent Society, a copy of a letter written by Mr. L. R. Whittall, describing the sufferings of the Moslem victims of the war in Anatolia. Mr. Whittall points out that the Turkish Government is impotent to rebuild the towns and villages devastated during the fighting between Greek and Turk, and he appeals for assistance on behalf of the destitute Moslems of this region. The Turks, he says, are accusing Europe of indifference to the suffering of Moslems, and he thinks that a demonstration by Great Britain of sympathy towards these Moslems would have beneficial political consequences.

Contributions to the British Red Crescent Society should be sent to the Honorary Treasurer, Mr. A. S. M. Anik, 2, Fenchurch Avenue, E.C.3.

ANZAC DAY.

The eighth anniversary of the landing of the Australian and New Zealand troops on the Gallipoli Peninsula will be celebrated on "Anzac Day," April 25. The London branch of the Australian Natives' Association is organising a series of ceremonies at the principal military cemeteries in this country, where Australian and New Zealand soldiers are buried.

TRAVELS IN ARABIA.

Under the auspices of the Near and Middle East Association, Mrs. A. McGrath (Miss Rosita Forbes) gave a lecture on April 13 on her recent travels in Arabia and Palestine, at the residence of the Dowager Lady Boyle, 64, Queen's Gate. The chair was taken by Captain Bennett, and a large gathering included Vice-Admiral Sir Sidney Fremantle, Sir Edward and Lady Boyle, Lady Grogan, Lady Kitty Vincent, Reshad Pasha and Mme. Reshad, and Chefik Bey.

Mrs. McGrath said that she recognised two great divisions in Arabia to-day. In the centre were the Wahabis, the most ascetic and fanatical race in Islam, standing for all that was most retrograde. France realised the danger of the Wahabis nine months ago, and sent a mission to Ibn Saud. It was certain we did not realise it enough. Since the War we had cut up Arabia into States incapable of fighting the Wahabis. Turning to Irak, she declared that the country could never pay the expenses of the British Army. Instead of ruling we ought to guide, and Irak had intelligent men who only needed encouragement to come to the front, and this they were not receiving. We dreamt of a great return from Irak. It was very doubtful whether the great valley of the Tigris and the Euphrates would ever prove profitable because of the labour question. Possibly in a few generations adequate labour might be available, but it was problematical. From Irak they came to Syria. As they knew, France divided Syria the other day into five provinces, with Arab governors. France was an admirable coloniser, but could not get away from the idea of turning Arabs into very inferior Frenchmen. Transjordan was a hopeful region. It possessed the only railway in the country that paid its way. The fact that there were only two trains a week was possibly the reason. Across the river they came to that too much promised land. The ordinary Palestinian, farmer or peasant, did not care who ruled so long as he could sell his produce at a little profit. The Government was much too efficient for the needs of the country, and would be capable of running an excellent Crown Colony. Palestine was suffering from an acute form of mental and moral indigestion. Forty per cent. of the land was all rocks. A great deal was talked out there of intensive agriculture. It was very doubtful whether it would pay. Little labour was available, and the farmer used very poor materials. He believed himself in danger of losing his little to the Zionists, and so they had this political movement that was passing through Palestine. The country needed Jewish capital. There could be industries along the coast, but Palestine was never meant to be forced into the world's markets.

The Near and Middle East.

From Our Own Correspondents.

Cairo, April 5.

The Release of Zaghloul Pasha.

Since my last letter the situation has undergone a considerable improvement owing to the decision to release Zaghloul Pasha from Gibraltar. The news was sprung on the public on Saturday morning by the publication of a supplement by Al Mokattam containing a telegram from London giving a résumé of the Foreign Office statement, and it came as a welcome surprise. On all sides the British Government's decision is warmly approved. It is felt that, although this step should have been taken long ago, the British authorities have more than remedied the unfortunate effect on the situation of this omission in the past by seizing the present admirably suitable juncture for making this important announcement. Certainly no better psychological moment could in the circumstances have been chosen, and this step, coming on the top of the two concessions in regard to the Wafd and the fines for the recent outrages, should materially strengthen the position of the Yehia Ibrahim Cabinet, which, provided that it obtains proper support from the King and the Residency, may be expected to put through a Constitution on proper democratic lines in the very near future.

The present outlook is, indeed, very hopeful. On the one hand, the opposition to the Cabinet is by no means as active as one might have expected; and, on the other hand, the absence of any popular outburst on the receipt of the news of Zaghloul Pasha's release, such as has occurred on similar occasions in the past, is certainly an indication of the existence of a more conciliatory spirit in the country.

Important Criminal Trial.

To-day an important trial under martial law opened at Kasr El Nil Barracks. Fifteen Egyptians, mostly students, appeared before a Military Court, presided over by Col. J. Byron, C.R.A., with Judge Munro as Advocate-General, on a general charge of conspiracy to murder members of the British Army, British officials, and witnesses in various cases that have been before the Military Court, and in certain cases on individual charges of murder and attempted murder against certain officials who have during the past two years been victims of outrages.

Mr. F. M. Maxwell, assisted by Mr. Duncan Wallace, prosecuted, and Mr. Reginald Silley and Tewfik Bey Doss were retained for the defence by the Government. There are fifty-eight witnesses for the prosecution, and there are bound to be a large number for the defence; consequently the case will last a considerable time. To-day's proceedings were confined to reading the charges and taking the evidence of a witness who is leaving Egypt to-morrow, and the case was adjourned until next week to enable counsel for the defence to study the dossiers.

This is the first case which the newly constituted Criminal Investigation Department or Special Section of the Public Instruction Department has brought before the Military Courts, and it promises to eclipse in importance the famous Vengeance Society or Abdel Rahman Bey Fahmy case, which was tried in the autumn of 1920.

As mentioned, the fifteen Egyptians are charged with conspiracy to kill British subjects and witnesses before the Military Courts; but the individual charges brought against certain of them cover anti-British outrages starting from the attempt on the life of Lieutenant Knight in November, 1919, and include the shooting of Mr. Aldred Brown and Bimbashi Cave, the attempted poisoning of several witnesses in the Abdel Rahman Bey Fahmy case, the attempted murder of Col. Pigott and Mr. Thomas Brown (the murder of the latter's coachman), and the murder of the servant of Mr. Gayer-Anderson, until recently Oriental Secretary to the Residency. It is hoped that in the course of the trial the organisation which has been responsible for the long series of anti-British outrages will be disclosed.

The Assuan Dam Commemorative Tablet.

There has been no little comment in British circles at the news published by the local Press of the removal of one of the commemorative tablets on the Assuan Dam. The masonry bears several inscriptions putting on record the laying of the foundation stone and the opening of the original and the heightened Dam, but the tablet which has been removed is the one recording how the work was done, and runs as follows:—"This Dam was designed and built by British Engineers. Egyptians, assisted by Greeks, excavated to the rock foundations, and built the rubble masonry. Skilled Italian workmen dressed the granite ashla."

This tablet was put up, after the heightening, by Sir Murdoch MacDonald, then Adviser to the Ministry of Public Works, and its removal not unnaturally aroused considerable indignation amongst the British community. Exactly why and on whose orders it was removed is a mystery, for no one in authority at the Ministry of Public Works gave the order or knows anything about the removal. The explanation given is that in all probability the tablet was temporarily removed for cleaning and recolouring, as the level, much higher than was A Scientific Conversazione.

A most instructive conversazione was given the other day by the Cairo Scientific Society at the School of Medicine at Kasr El Aini. The usual exhibits of microbes in various stages and of the progress of diseases were shown, and very lucid explanations were given by the attendant doctors and scientists, mostly Egyptians. But amongst the unusual and interesting exhibits must be classed the audible water-level recorder and the Egyptian State Telegraphs and Telephones display. The former is an instrument which announces by means of a gramophone the level of the water which it is desired to know. The gramophone is connected with the telephone system, on which it has a number, and the water-level can be ascertained many miles away by any official merely calling up the telephone number of the automatic recorder. This recorder is in active use at the Delta Barrage, and has given much satisfaction. The Egyptian State Telegraphs and Telephones showed first a miniature telephone exchange at work in connection with the main exchange, while the sister service had a Wheatstone high-speed set in active operation. Watching the latter at work, one understood how it was the telegraph administration had been able to handle with such extraordinary rapidity and efficiency the enormous amount of work suddenly hurled at it a month ago at Luxor when excitement in connection with the Tutankhamen tomb was at its height.

ALBANIA.

Tirana, April 7.

The Kossovo Rising.

Since the suppression of the rising in the prefecture of Kossovo, Albania has enjoyed perfect tranquillity. It is necessary, in view of the way in which the foreign Press has exploited the matter, briefly to describe the nature of this rising. It was started by two malcontents, Bairam Tsur and Hasan Prishtina, who, taking advantage of the non-settlement of the boundary question, had sought refuge in the neutral zone. This zone contained about 1,000 Albanians who had deserted from the Serbian army in Kossovo. Though their cause was hopeless, these deserters obeyed the orders of their two leaders, attacked the Albanian garrison on the frontier, and marched on Kruma, the centre of the prefecture of Kossovo. Fortunately, Government forces arrived in time, and the rebels were crushed.

Such was this last rising, the importance of which has been so much exaggerated in foreign journals. Now that the boundary question has been settled and the neutral zone exists no longer, it may be safely prophesied that no further rising will take place in Kossovo, and, consequently, order will reign throughout Albania.

Albanian Foreign Policy.

Albania is maintaining friendly relations with other States, with the League of Nations, and, particularly, with her neighbours. The recent deadlock between Albania and Greece has given place to a mutual understanding, and diplomatic representatives have been exchanged, M. Midhat Frasherri being accredited to Athens and M. Panourgias to Tirana.

Parliamentary Activities.

Parliament assembled on March 1, after a vacation of about three months. It has approved, with some modifications, the concession dealing with the construction of the narrow gauge between Durazzo and Berat which was given by the Government to an Albanian company, and yesterday it approved the Bill for the confiscation of the movable and immovable property of Essad Pasha.

The present Parliament is, theoretically, a continuation of the Senate created by the Congress of Lushnia. In accordance with the provisions of this Congress, the Senate would continue its existence until the boundaries were definitely delimited, and then a Constituent Assembly would be called, which Assembly would decide upon the definitive form of the Albanian State. This question of political procedure has aroused some discussion, and, with a view to its settlement, M. Milto Tutulani, Deputy for Berat, is bringing forward a motion which will be the subject of one of the Parliamentary debates. But in all probability this Parliament will not die until steps have been taken towards the approval of the various concessions concluded between the Government and foreign companies.

Foreign Enterprise and Concessions.

In spite of her abundant natural resources, Albania is not, as is well known, in a good condition, either economically or financially. The Albanian Government sees that the basis of any improvement in the situation lies in the introduction of foreign capital, and is doing its utmost to stimulate foreign enterprise in Albania. Understandings have been reached between many foreign companies in Tirana and the Government, but so far only one contract has been approved by Parliament. This contract is the one concerning the exploitation of the forests in the vicinity of "Bregu i Matit," and was made between the Government and the German company "Inak."

The most important of the concessions are, of course, those dealing with oil. The well which the Italians, during their military occupation, dug near Valona aroused the curiosity of oil companies, of which the first to come down to Albania was the Anglo-Persian Oil Company. Besides this company, there are American, French, and Italian companies, all seeking oil concessions in Albania. The contract with the Anglo-Persian Company has recently been submitted to Parliament, and at the moment it is passing through different committees. Apparently, the consensus of opinion among the Deputies is not to accept the clause in the contract which grants a monopoly, and which is, therefore, its most important clause. It is said that if Parliament refuses to grant a monopoly the Anglo-Persian Company will submit another contract. The American oil companies (Standard Oil and Sinclair) are ready, being inclined to the policy of the open door, to propose more favourable terms than those contained in the Anglo-Persian contract. Broadly speaking, the Government's policy should, it is thought, be to consider first the economic and then the political interests of Albania.

YUGOSLAVIA.

Liubliana, April 12.

The New Yugoslav Government.

All interest in public life is at the moment centred round the question: What will the new Government be? Will it bring a solution of the Serbo-Croat dilemma, or mean a mere continuation of the previous régime? In other words, will the present—more Unionist than Centralist—Constitution remain in force, or will it have to give place to a revised version of itself, something more on autonomist or federal lines? A definite solution of this question is what the public expects of the new Government. Yet the election campaign and the election results show that it is still too early to hope for a solution. Conditions are not yet ripe, and the leadership still lies with extremist views, preventing rational compromise.

"Race" demagoguery secured the victory of all particularist parties. It was the cry against M. Raditch and for Great Serbia that won Serbia for the Radicals. The catchword of a Great Croatia gave M. Raditch almost every single mandate in Croatia. Of course, it is well known that both M. Pashitch and M. Raditch would be very glad and prepared to find a solution to the Serbo-Croat quarrel. But the ears of the electors are still ringing with the election prophecies and promises of both, and the solution of Yugoslavia's greatest inner-political problem is to-day rather technical than judicial.

Possibilities of Reconciliation.

It is probable that the recent election will not yet provide the desired decision, but that the present régime will continue, and with it the present Opposition, but less sharply opposed. The putting through of the Constitution will be shelved; the most necessary current business will be dealt with. But in other respects the struggle for power will go on, for M. Raditch and M. Pashitch both hope for further increase of power. Whether these hopes are justified we will not discuss. But we wish to point out that it is very improbable that the class parties should lose further ground. The very insistence upon extremist slogans indicates the happy mean which the class parties (in contrast to "race" parties) alone can realise. Labour will collect its scattered forces, the class consciousness of the peasant will grow, and this will create the basis for a policy economical rather than racial, and incidentally provide the possibility for an agreement.

The Government will resign on April 15, a day before the new Parliament meets for the first time. The following forecasts are being generally hazarded in regard to new party combinations: If M. Raditch attends the Skupshtina, then there are only two possibilities. Either M. Pashitch will combine with the Democrats—which might mean a pro-Constitution Government, or a compromise with M. Raditch—which would entail a revision of the Constitution, this being a sine qua non for the Croats. The alternative is a fresh General Election. Should M. Raditch, however, not go to Belgrade, then we may see another all-Radical Government, constantly menaced by the Damocles sword of M. Raditch's arrival, and hence by no means in an enviable position.

The key of the situation is in M. Raditch's hands. In order to establish his position he has formed a bloc with the Slovene Clericals (21 deputies) and the Yugoslav Mohammedans (18 deputies). The importance of this bloc is not great, however. It is too weak to form a Government, further allies it will scarcely find, and the divergencies between the factions are too great to permit of a united front in a campaign. M. Raditch is a Republican—at least, so he says; M. Koroshets (the Clerical leader) is a Republican or Monarchist according to circumstances; but the Mohammedans are decidedly Monarchists. M. Raditch wants Yugoslavia remodelled on federal lines; M. Koroshets demands racial autonomy, and the Mohammedans desire local government. The Raditch Party is a strongly anti-Clerical peasant party, and the Mohammedans are a religious party of great landlords. Truly a troubled outlook for the Revisionist bloc!

A coalition between Radicals and Democrats is not likely. The Democrats were thrust out of the last Government in most cavalier fashion, and the election campaign was very bitter. MM. Pashitch and Pribitchevitch are for the coalition; but, in spite of their prestige with their respective parties, they may not be able to effect their end. Still more unlikely is an agreement between the Radicals and M. Raditch. First of all, M. Raditch is so unstable of opinion that his word cannot be relied upon. Secondly, nobody knows to this day what is his minimum programme. The sitting of his club brought no certainty, and even now we are no wiser, although M. Raditch's emissaries are in Belgrade, and already negotiating with the leading politicians there. In one respect there is nevertheless an improvement. At least, the opponents have begun to meet and to discuss, and M. Raditch has more definitely endorsed the State standpoint.

In order to force a way out of this almost insoluble dilemma, some Belgrade papers have been pretty free with the word "amputation." What Serbia won by the sword is to remain Serbian; the rest may secede, if it would rather not remain part of the realm. The proposal is interesting, but has found no adherents anywhere, and has been definitely rejected. More sensible is the suggestion of the Politika that the Crown should summon all the irreconcilable party leaders to meet together.

Constantinople, April 3.

The Temettu.

There has been so much agitation over the recently promulgated Temettu Law (earned income-tax), especially in regard to the tax on salaries, which has been increased from 3 per cent. to 15 per cent., that the Government has consented to reconsider the matter, and it is announced that certain modifications will shortly be issued.

There is no doubt that the rate of 15 per cent. is excessive, especially in view of the fact that no minimum salary is provided for, from which figure the taxable salary should be reckoned.

Turco-Armenian Association.

On Friday afternoon last the Turco-Armenian Association held a tea at the Hotel Tokatlian, which was attended by upwards of 200 members and their friends. Those present included Mgr. Aslanian, locum-tenens to the Armenian Patriarch, who presided, Zia Bey (Prefect of the town), Hazim Bey (Governor-General of Trebizond), Assim Bey (Governor of Pera), Djelal Bey (ex-Governor-General of Konia), Vehli Bey (Assistant-Director of Police), and Mr. B. Kérestédjian (a sub-Director of the Imperial Ottoman Bank and Hon. President of the Association). Speeches were made in furtherance of the aims of the Association, which are the fostering of friendly relations between the Turkish and Armenian peoples. Mr. Kérestéd-jian, in the course of his remarks, expressed the wish that all the misunderstandings that had arisen between the two peoples in the past might disappear. "The Turkish nation," he said, "is noble and heroic. Her heart is accessible to pity, but she strikes her fist at those who act treacherously." Zia Bey expressed the view that the Armenians were a necessary element of the country, while the Turks were its foundation. "Henceforth," he said, "we should hope for nothing more from the foreigner." Many and stirring speeches were made by other speakers during the afternoon, all dwelling on the topic of devotion to their common country and the mutual benefits to be derived from the closer rapprochement between the two peoples.

This Association was founded in 1919 under the name of "Committee of Turco-Armenian Youth." In 1922 it changed its name, and its official title now is "Turc-Ermeni-Tehali," which signifies "Committee of Turco-Armenian Rapprochement." Mustapha Kemal Pasha, in a recent letter addressed to the President, accorded his encouragement and approval to the objects of the Association.

Mr. Steeg's Visit to Angora.

There has been much speculation on the part of the Press as to the exact object of a recent journey to Angora of Mr. Louis Steeg, the Director-General of the Imperial Ottoman Bank, and different papers have been publishing various versions both of the cause and effect of the visit. An early report had it that Mr. Steeg had gone to arrange for a new issue of paper money, but this was promptly and categorically denied by the Commissariat of Public Economy, and those spreading such a report were threatened with prosecution. The Tanine understood that Mr. Steeg had made propositions concerning important financial enterprises in the name of certain groups represented by the Imperial Ottoman Bank. The paper added that the competition that is cropping up in these days between different groups of capitalists anxious to carry out financial schemes in Turkey has attained considerable proportions. The Ikdam announced that the Director of the Bank had asked for the payment of half a million liras borrowed from the Bank from the previous Government. The curiosity of the Vakit was sufficiently aroused to cause it to approach the French High Commissioner on the subject. It was informed that "Mr. Steeg had long wanted to come into personal contact with the Finance Commissariat. He will discuss with them questions affecting the relations between the Government and the Bank. It is well understood, however, that general financial questions may be discussed. Mr. Steeg," the statement concluded, "has not been charged with any official mission by the French Government."

The Journal d'Orient yesterday announced that the question of the renewal of the concession for the Bank, which expires in 1925, was the main object of the visit, and that in this connection the Government have agreed to it on the following stipulations:—

1. Change of name, in view of the non-recognition of the title "Imperial Ottoman."
2. The Director-General of the Bank to be of Turkish nationality.
3. The Chief of Service to be selected from the Turkish element.

Allied Forces, it has been proposed to form an international golf club, which shall be ready to take over the existing one as soon as this event occurs. The moving spirits in this matter are Mr. A. T. Waugh, C.M.G., British Consul-General; Mr. Ravndal, Mr. Bergeron, Mr. Helm (British High Commission), and Mr. Jordan (British Consulate). A meeting is being held this week, to which all interested in the ancient game have been invited.

Inter-Church Relations.

An interesting ceremony took place last Sunday on the occasion of the Greek Easter, when the Œcumenical Patriarch, with the approval of the Lord Bishop of Gibraltar and of the Archbishop of Canterbury, invested the Rev. R. F. Borough, chaplain of the Crimean Memorial Church, with a gold pectoral cross in recognition of the work done by him to further friendly relations between the two Churches.

PRESS ON THE NEAR EAST.

The Example of Sofia.

The Westminster Gazette of April 3 is of the opinion that Bulgaria, in recently passing sentence on certain ex-Ministers and officials, has given the world a valuable object-lesson—the lesson that statesmen have a responsibility to their people. "In Bulgaria," it says, "there lingers yet the Cromwellian spirit." The actual sentences it does not applaud, for they "have more than the scent of revenge about them," but the treason trial itself "will belong to history."

The Bulgarians have endeavoured in dramatic fashion to put themselves right with Europe, and especially with their natural ally, Serbia. Unfortunately the punishments they have decreed miss the principal offenders. The ex-King Ferdinand and the Prime Minister Radoslavoff are out of the reach of the Court. We can express the hope that in these circumstances means will be found to reduce the punishment of those who have surrendered to jurisdiction. Yet we regard the action taken in Bulgaria as having a real value. It demonstrates that even in the younger countries Kings and Ministers who betray the higher interests of the commonwealth do so at a risk they must reckon with in coming to a decision.

The Future of Turkey.

"Peace," says the Constantinople correspondent of the Glasgow Herald, "is now the watchword in New Turkey." This writer summarises the effects of an all-round peace with Turkey (1) on the inner state of the country, (2) on the situation of foreign Powers and their subjects in Turkey, and (3) on the future development of other Islamic States. He says that Turkey will become an officially and generally recognised Republic, continuing:—

Will Turkey remain a Republic for any length of time or for ever? Who can tell? Islamic theocracy is such a supple doctrine that as long as there is a Caliph an Islamic State may adopt practically any form of government, from Turkish despotism of olden days to the Constitutional Monarchy recognised by the "Young Turkish" Party or the Republican régime introduced by the Nationalists. . . . But the popularity of Mustapha Kemal Pasha is due more to his personal charm than to the principle he advocates. And there is no doubt that this new Republicanism, the separation of Church and State, and the depriving the Caliph of all political power, have given rise to a secret but growing opposition among orthodox Mohammedans and Old Turks generally which may in time make itself openly heard and felt. You must add to the number of the malcontents those numerous employees of the Sublime Porte and of those other central Governmental offices in Constantinople which have been either suppressed by the revolution or transferred to Angora or cut down as to their personnel. These men belong to the Turkish "intelligenza," know what a vote means, and when they can they will vote against the Nationalists.

It has been already said in Constantinople that Mustapha Kemal Pasha's present victory is his last. It seems also very likely that Turkish extremists both of the Right and of the Left will use as an arm against the Moderate Nationalists and their chief the concessions they have already made to the Western Powers, and which they are about to make when signing at last the treaty of peace.

The position of foreigners in Turkey this writer is unable to forecast. But on the emergence in 1923 of a New Turkey and of its effect upon Islam he writes thus:—

This event will encourage those Islamic States which are already nominally independent to strive still more ardently for complete independence, and those which are semi or entirely dependent to weaken or shake off that dependence. Much trouble for "mandatory" and other Powers will result. But this question has to be faced, and faced at once. And it will take all the prudence, statesmanship, and sense of justice of the Western nations to solve it peacefully and equitably. A treaty recognising the new Republican régime in Turkey will also certainly encourage Republican politicians in other Islamic States. That may become for some of them a source of grave inner difficulties, which should be treated only as such by the other Governments.

But, underlying these purely political questions, there will always be and always increase in importance the economic element of national and international life. This element, I firmly believe, will serve to convince the nations of the world that an essential economic solidarity exists between them, whatever be their dissimilarity from the ethnical, political, or religious point of view.

THE COSMOLOGY OF BUDDHISM.

"A MANUAL OF BUDDHIST PHILOSOPHY." By W. Montgomery McGovern, Ph.D. Oxon. Vol. I. Cosmology. (London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner & Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

Buddhists recognise three "jewels" or objects of worship—namely, the Buddha, Sangha, the Order he established, and Dharma, his teachings. Dr. McGovern limits himself to the last. Originally a simple religious and ethical code, it has grown in the hands of commentators into an attempt to interpret the whole universe in terms of reason. The Abidharma, or system of philosophy which thus took shape, drew inspiration from India between the first and fourth centuries of our era, and from Chinese sources during the half-millennium that followed. In attempting to trace the evolution of Buddhistic speculation Dr. McGovern was faced by enormous difficulties. The revival of Brahmanism in India proved fatal to the literature of the creed which had well-nigh superseded it; and a scanty remnant survives in the work of ignorant Tibetan translators. Students must therefore fall back on Chinese versions, couched in a monosyllabic language where word-pictures may mean a noun, a verb, or a preposition. Dr. McGovern modestly admits that his work is a not altogether successful attempt to further, in an infinitesimal degree, our knowledge of the history of Buddhist philosophy. At the best we can but nibble at the vast storehouse of material before us, and then scurry away into print before the immensity of the subject shall have dawned upon us to such an extent that we are awed into silence.

He distinguishes between relative and transcendental philosophy, the first connoting analysis of phenomena and the second covering theories regarding the ultimate nature of things. Relative philosophy has three main divisions, concerned respectively with cosmic synthesis, analysis, and dynamics. The first step in synthesis was to establish a system of computation; and here the tendency of the Asiatic mind towards extreme elaboration has produced tables for reckoning time, size, and distance which are baffling in their immensity. The next step was to develop theories regarding the sentient and inanimate universe. The outcome of Buddhistic research in this direction contrasts strangely with that of Western science. Working without the aid of complex instruments, these old philosophers drew largely on their imagination, and this work is "the stuff that dreams are made of." They recognised a progressive growth in human life and stature during an Age of Perfection, which was followed by two of progressive decline, and has ended in an "Age of Degeneration and Quarrelling." Cosmic geography is a branch of synthetic philosophy. Commentators agree in holding that Mount Meru rears its lofty head in the centre of this and an infinite number of other worlds. Ranged round it are seven circles, washed by a great ocean in which four continents are located. The southernmost of these is Jambudvipa, the world which we inhabit. In very early times it included only India, but geographical discovery has added other countries—even America—to its bounds.

Buddhism postulates an infinite series of hells, wherein the damned suffer tortures commensurate with the evil they have wrought during a previous existence. There are hot and cold hells ranged in shafts beneath Jambudvipa, in which the punishments inflicted reach an ascending pitch of agony inconceivable to the Western mind. The Buddhistic heavens are equally complex. The lowest, occupying excrescences on Mount Meru, are inhabited by saved souls which still retain a measure of earthly dross. They are placed on probation; by dint of accumulating merit they rise to higher realms and finally attain Nirvana.

Just as the cosmic synthesis of Buddhism covers the sphere of our physical sciences, so its cosmic analysis corresponds with the metaphysical speculations which befogged our own ancestors. Its aim is to discover the ultimate elements of which the universe is composed; and the method adopted may be subjective or objective. Since every sentient being is a universe in itself, one may generalise from the contents of a single personality, or consider the universe without reference to its components. The Buddha was an agnostic as regards the external world, and his metaphysical teaching was necessarily subjective. But it passed through the alembic of Indian philosophy, which was given to minute analytical sub-division. The attitude of the three great schools which came into being was progressively objective, and it has produced most complicated charts of all the Dharmas or factors in life. It must be remembered that, in metaphysics, the word "dharma" is not used in its ordinary sense as connoting "religion" or "law." The conception differs materially from Plato's "Idea" and Aristotle's "Form." It is, in Dr. McGovern's opinion, "one of the most original contributions of Buddhism to the history of human thought." The number of Dharmas dealt with increased with the spread of knowledge. The simplest classification considered them under four headings—viz., Mind, Mental Properties, Matter, and the Highest Reality, sometimes styled Nirvana.

Cosmic dynamic concerns itself with causality. The Buddha taught that all phenomena are due to an infinite and endless chain of causes and effects. In enunciating these doctrines he anticipated the latest trend of speculation, and may be justly styled the Father of Pragmatism. The theory of Karma is closely related to that of causality. This word originally meant "action"; later the result of conduct in the guise of reward or punishment; and, finally, the whole law of causation with reference to its bearing on moral retribution.

Dr. McGovern's book is the result of profound research. It will be found useful by the small group of scholars which is grappling with the ramifications of Buddhistic thought, but must always be "caviare to the general."

Sir Frederick Eley and Miss Eley left London on April 12 to join the Caledonia at Marseilles for Port Said. Major-General and Mrs. H. F. Cooke will be passengers to Bombay.

Mr. D. M. Dalal, High Commissioner for India, arrived in London on April 15, and will take over charge of his department at the offices at Grosvenor Gardens from Mr. J. W. Bhore, the Acting High Commissioner, this week.

The Dowager Countess of Carnarvon, accompanied by Dr. Marcus Johnson, left Cairo on April 14 for Port Said with the body of the late Earl, and sailed for home the following day. The funeral will be held at Highclere on the 28th inst., memorial services being held simultaneously in various places, including Cairo.

Mrs. Arthur Walter, who has recovered from a serious attack of pleuro-pneumonia, left the French Hospital, Jerusalem, last week, after a stay of over a month, on a visit with her daughter, Mrs. Arthur Gill, to the High Commissioner and Lady Samuel at Government House. They will afterwards go to Jaffa and thence to England, where they hope to arrive at the beginning of June.

OBITUARY.

The death occurred at Famagusta, Cyprus, on March 23, at the age of 72 years, of Dr. A. H. Moghabghab, late Health Officer and formerly District Medical Officer of Famagusta. Descended from one of the oldest families of the Lebanon, he came at an early age under the personal influence and friendship of Bliss, Post, Van Dyck, and other eminent educationists and reformers of the Near East. Having on political grounds refused an appointment as physician to the Governor of the Lebanon, he accepted service under the British Government of Cyprus in the early days of the Occupation, and for forty years was closely associated with the history of the town and district of Famagusta. No one who visited that ancient town in former days could forget the striking personality of the late Dr. Moghabghab and his generosity and hospitality.

His father was the Rev. Halil Moghabghab, builder of the first Protestant church on Mount Lebanon.

THE POSITION IN INDIA.

Lord Inchcape, on his return from what may fairly be described as a tour de force, is reported to have expressed the opinion that everything promises to go well with India. A verdict couched in such unqualified terms regarding a population of more than 300,000,000 would invite criticism, if it were not recognised as intended to be relative to Lord Inchcape's mission to India, and we have no doubt that he would himself have expressed a more qualified view had he been required to look farther ahead. Beginning at the top, it must be recognised that the Government of India has, to all appearance, benefited by the changes made last winter, and, while there are obvious risks of internal friction and resulting loss of efficiency, at the moment it is functioning with a reasonable degree of vigour and sagacity. The central Legislature has practically finished its task, and it would be futile to attempt a forecast of its future working until the views of the electors have been declared. It has not as yet developed anything which can be called a party system, and some of its brightest stars have perceptibly paled; but, on the other hand, new men have come forward, and, while there are absolutely no data for a forecast of the next election, the hope may be expressed that a sufficient number of its members will secure re-election to enable the new Chambers to start at least on the level which has been attained. As to the provincial Governments and Legislatures, all that can usefully be said is that the highly experimental Constitution has answered its severest critics merely by continuing to exist. No one can withhold sympathy from the popular Ministers, all of them eager to push forward urgent measures of construction, and all of them crippled by the universal lack of funds. In such circumstances it would be unfair to lay much stress on occasional expressions of individual disappointment, or even bitterness, and it is better merely to insist on the need for patience and steadfastness alike in the provinces and at the centre. The new Constitution has not brought a ready-made millennium, but its possibilities for good are becoming more and more manifest, provided always that it is worked in the spirit of toleration and good will which was postulated by its founders.

At the moment this spirit appears to be gaining ground. The extremist-reactionaries, who have done so much to propagate a gospel of intolerance and hate, are at loggerheads among themselves, and are exerting much less influence among the people at large. It would, however, be a mistake to regard them as extinct volcanoes, because their inspiration comes from ideas which still prevail widely in India. The old aspirations towards geographical isolation, spiritual ascendancy, economic privilege, and political tyranny still sway many minds, unconsciously perhaps, but not less effectively, and until they are finally mastered by the new spirit they are bound to make their presence felt, particularly at times when the people at large are for any reason uneasy or distressed. The present lull must in fact be attributed in great measure to a marked improvement in the economic situation. The sky is not indeed entirely clear, and in the last few days we have read of renewed manifestations of industrial unrest and of a serious and apparently unexpected recrudescence of plague; but after making all necessary allowances, the fact remains that the people are much better off than has been the case for some time past. The country is amply stocked with food, internal prices are falling, there is work for almost everybody, and foreign markets are showing signs of recovering their ability to absorb the produce which India has to spare. The national income is thus increasing, and people who are making money, however little it may be, have less time, and less inclination, to listen to revolutionary doctrines than when business is stagnant and funds low. The improvement in the position is definite, but in our judgment it cannot safely be regarded as permanent. Some error of policy may at any moment furnish a rallying-point for the disorganised forces of malignancy; a failure of crops, or a serious setback in markets abroad, may provide them with the fulcrum they require in order to move opinion in the mass; and, while there are reasonable grounds for hope, there are the best possible reasons for continued watchfulness on the part of the Administration.

The real anxiety for the future seems to us to arise from the fact that India is still, apparently, determined to live from hand to mouth. Readers in this country are naturally disposed to assume that at least a large share of the increased national income is being devoted to progressive improvement. They expect to hear of additional capital applied to the equipment of agriculture and to the development of manufacturing industries, of expenditure on schools and colleges, or on libraries and laboratories for research, of far-reaching schemes to make the country more fit to live in, and ensure that the next generation shall be better than the last. We wish it were possible to gratify such expectations as these, but all that can be said is, that if any such movements are on foot, they are being conducted so stealthily as to escape the notice of the Indian Press. The provincial administrations are crippled for want of capital, and from all quarters we hear of the postponement of desirable and remunerative schemes, while there are no signs of private enterprise or liberality stepping in to fill the gap. Meanwhile, the country at large is devoting no small share of the increment in its income to the purchase of jewellery, while a disproportionate amount of intellectual power is being wasted in attempts to annex the possessions of other individuals. We have recently commented at length on these unfavourable features of the present situation, and here it must suffice to say that their continuance is inconsistent with the permanent change which is required to enable India to play her part among the nations of the world. So long as resources are dissipated in superfluities, and brains wasted on merely predatory speculation, India must remain the sport of destiny, happy in one season, and perhaps starving in the next; at times peaceful, at others a prey to tumult and faction. A period of prosperity is indeed a definite gain, but what is most wanted is such a union of foresight, energy, and public spirit as will suffice to turn the additional resources to profitable account, and thereby build up by degrees adequate reserves against the lean years which may lie ahead. To our mind, that is the real lesson to be drawn from India's recent contents and present relative prosperity.

THE SUDAN—V.

THE SUDAN RAILWAYS.

The Desert Survey.

The picture that most naturally rises before our minds when we think of a desert is that of a vast level tract of sand across which the traveller is as free to direct his way in whatsoever direction he wishes as the sailor is to set a course for his ship on open sea; where, in fact, for the traveller or the engineer there are no obstacles to surmount and no difficulties to overcome save the risk of storm, the lack of water, and the absence of landmarks. However accurate such a picture may be as a representation of the Western Sahara, it certainly conveys no true impression of that rugged and barren region which lies between the great bend of the Nile and the mountains which border the Red Sea. Through this desert runs the main line of the Sudan Railways between Halfa and Abu Hamed, and so far from the region being the level, unbroken expanse which one associates with the term desert, it is true to say that the physical features of the country—the ranges of hills and the courses of the valleys—determine the track of the line as rigidly as the contours of the Pennine Range fix the railway routes between the plains of Lancashire and the dales of the West Riding.

When the desert railway was begun in 1897 the country through which it was to pass was unknown and unmapped, and the engineers of that day had first to explore it and then to fix the route for the line. Such a task to-day is rendered immeasurably easier by the aeroplane and the motor-car; but in the year when the Sudan railway system was growing up the camel was the only means of transport for the traveller and the engineer. The ship of the desert is a common and not inaccurate definition of the camel; it is less well known that this indispensable and wholly unattractive creature is not only the ship, but also the log, and it is this combination of functions which have made it possible to employ on "camel reconnaissances" a system of dead reckoning which has yielded surprisingly accurate results. The regularity of the camel space is remarkable, and once the animal has been timed at its normal gait over a measured mile the distance he will cover in any given time can be assumed with a very small margin of error.

As the camel unites the functions of the ship and the log, so his owner, the desert Arab, makes good the want of chart and landmarks by his uncanny and unfailingly accurate sense of direction. The almost imperceptible fold of the ground, the tiniest knoll, half seen through a quivering heat haze, are to him beacons as familiar and as unmistakable as Chanctonbury Ring is to the downland shepherd; and even where the hard line of the horizon is unbroken by the smallest landmark his instinct is no less sure. Nor is it only during the preliminary reconnaissance of an unmapped country that this gift has proved invaluable; it has also proved of immense assistance in determining the final track of the railway after the general line has been indicated by the first rough surveys. Where the rocky valleys open out, with the plain and the hills on either hand receding into the distance, and where nothing lies ahead but the level desert like the open sea at the mouth of a slowly widening estuary, there comes the real opportunity to test the sagacity of the Arab guide. Forty miles away lies the group of wells by which the railway must pass; their position has been computed on the earlier reconnaissances by the dead-reckoning of the compass and the camels' pace; the approximate bearing is known, but there is no landmark to give the true direction, for the highest point of the low ridge which marks the position of the wells is still below the horizon. The Arab guide is summoned and is shown how to turn the telescope on its tripod. He glances at the position of the sun, and then bends his eyes towards the low hills on either hand, standing back a few paces he looks along the telescope as along the barrel of a gun; again he scrutinises the horizon, and then approaching the instrument, he turns the telescope through a minute arc. That way, he says, lies the well. And so it is proved to be, for, after some twenty-five miles of the distance have been traversed, the low ridge marking the site of wells appears above the horizon with the saddle over which the railway must pass, almost coinciding with the centre line of the survey. Forty miles of straight railway track, unbroken by the smallest curve, bear witness to-day to the unerring sense of direction which is inherited by the nomad tribesmen of the desert.

THE RAILWAY IN BEING.

The establishment of civilised rule throughout a country nearly as large as India and over a medley of tribes and races, some still sunk in barbarism, others half-civilised and but recently emancipated from a ruthless tyranny, and others, again, whom the destruction of that tyranny had deposed from their evil ascendancy—such was the task that confronted the Government of the Sudan in the year 1899, after the final overthrow of the Dervish power and the death of the Khalifa Abdullah. In the prosecution of the task and in the achievement of the results which we see to-day the system of communications established throughout the country played an important part. The re-occupation of the Sudan twenty-five years ago was rendered possible by the construction of the railway to Khartoum, and the extension and development of the railway system has since then been the most prominent factor in promoting the prosperity of the country. By facilitating the interchange of commodities it has fostered the growth of agriculture and local industries, and by stimulating the free flow of labour from one locality to another it has brought about the development of fertile districts which had been depopulated and laid waste by famine and the sword.

The change which has been wrought in the material condition of the people is nowhere more marked than in that part of the Nile Valley which lies between the Atbara River and Khartoum. Twenty-four years ago hardly a village existed throughout the whole length of 200 miles; famine, pestilence, and Dervish raids had all but wiped out the population, and a few tiny groups of huts scattered here and there by the river were the only vestiges of human occupation. To-day villages cluster thickly along both banks, large areas are under cultivation, and herds of cattle and flocks of sheep and goats graze everywhere through the scrub that fringes the edge of the desert plateau. Along the valley of the Blue Nile south of Khartoum the change is equally marked, and the development of the trade in cattle and gum has made Kordofan one of the richest provinces in the country. The change which has been wrought in the condition of the riverain population has, however, no counterpart among the desert nomads. Their wild and inhospitable country is capable of no more than of providing them with a bare livelihood, and, while the establishment of ordered government has freed them from inter-tribal raids and given them peace and security, they still regard the railway with a doubtful eye, nor has its coming made any change in their habits or in their outlook on life.

The desert dweller tends and waters his flock and moves from one grazing ground to another, as his forefathers have done from generation to generation, and if his infrequent journeys to the port of Suakin or the markets of Berber take him and his camel a month to accomplish, he is quite indifferent—two days or thirty out of three score years and ten, the difference is negligible; time has no meaning for him save in its relation to the succession of the seasons and the span of life. Nor does it make any appeal to him that the train rolling past the wells where he waters his flocks is carrying more than a thousand camel loads.

One fact he understands and appreciates—that the building of a railway through his country has in no way interfered with his water supply, but has, on the contrary, increased it; for not only was every care taken to avoid any diminution in the supply available for the native population from the wells which already existed, but also new wells were sunk which have been of no small benefit to the herdsman and his flocks.

Across these 300 miles of desert that separates the Nile Valley from the Red Sea passes by far the greater part of the external trade of the Sudan. Passengers and mails and the bulk of the Egyptian traffic follow the Nile Valley route by Halfa and Shellal, but the Red Sea line is necessarily the main artery for the commerce of the country, because it is the shortest route to the sea.

Here in the desert one realises better than anywhere else how much the railway means to the Sudan of to-day. Away to the westward across the hills and the desert it is ten days' journey by camel to the Valley of the Nile, and 300 miles and more to the southward again lies the fertile region whence comes the cotton and oil seed, gum arabic and grain, which form the wealth of the country. Eastward, 100 miles away beyond the passes of the hills, lies the harbour of Port Sudan—the main gateway of the Sudan trade.

Here to-night at the wells that for generations were visited by none save the nomad Arab with his flocks, the inward and outward bound trains will pass, and by to-morrow the towns and villages of the Nile Valley will receive the goods despatched this morning from the coast, and the traffic loaded yesterday in the markets of the Gezira will be discharged into the warehouses on the quayside at Port Sudan.

COTTON GROWING IN THE SUDAN.

A REPORT by Mr. W. H. HIMBURY

(General Manager of the British Cotton Growing Association).

[The General Manager of the British Cotton Growing Association, Mr. W. H. Himbury, has recently concluded visits to India, Egypt, and the Sudan, and the results of his investigations have been embodied in two reports which were submitted to the 225th meeting of the Council of the Association, held on April 10 at the Royal Exchange, Manchester. Mr. Himbury reached Khartoum on February 24. After visiting the properties of the Sudan Plantations Syndicate in the Gezira and the Makwar Dam, he went by car from Atbara to Kassala and spent some days examining conditions in the Gash Delta. The results of his inquiries are embodied in the following "Conclusions":—]

In weighing up the possibilities for cotton in any country with adequate transport facilities, the three most important factors to be determined are:—1, Suitable soil; 2, suitable climatic conditions; and 3, sufficient labour. In the Gezira you have a plain composed of rich alluvial black soil 7, 8, and 9 feet deep, heavy clayey substance, which, during the absence of water, cracks badly. As to quantity, the plain exceeds 3,000,000 acres in extent. Recently the Director of Agriculture went over a part of the area to pick out 300,000 acres to be irrigated by the dam when completed, and I understand he only had to cut out about 5,000 acres, and some of the land was considered to be better than that at present under cultivation. At one time I believe something like 1,000,000 acres of dura were grown on this plain; therefore, the question of suitable soil can be answered in the affirmative.

As regards climatic conditions, these should comprise water and sun. Of the latter there is plenty; of the former, rain being insufficient, moisture must be obtained by irrigation. Satisfactory tests have been made at Tayiba, Barakat, and Hosh, and a further 10,000 acres are being developed at Wad el Nau. Such areas, however, are naturally limited, and we have to look for a larger supply, which necessitate the construction of a dam, such as is being built at Makwar. This work is now being undertaken by a well-known firm of contractors, Messrs. Pearson and Sons, and it appears to be going on satisfactorily, and from information received from reliable sources it should be completed by June, 1925. Unfortunately, this will not give us all the water required for the full Gezira scheme; it will only be possible to irrigate 100,000 acres, owing to the fact that Egypt is extremely anxious and nervous about her water supply, and has laid it down that only sufficient water for 100,000 acres must be held up. This is a difficulty which must be met, and, fortunately, there is a possible solution by finding the water elsewhere, and at no great capital expenditure. Some of us might argue that it is not reasonable for Egypt to be so exacting, there being plenty of water available, etc., but the point is nervousness does exist, so much so that the Egyptian Government have sent an expert irrigation engineer to Lake Victoria to study the question; and, to be fair, we must do nothing likely to upset one proved cotton proposition for the sake of another. Therefore, for the present, the water supply limits the area to 100,000 acres.

The last point is labour, and here again the Sudan is fortunate in having a fair agricultural population, used to producing crops from the land; but, of course, it is doubtful if anything like the population could be found immediately for 1,000,000 acres of cotton. So far the Sudan Plantations Syndicate has had no difficulty in finding tenants for their blocks opened up by pumps; the last one of 10,000 acres at Wad el Nau is already tenanted, and will be cultivated in June. The growers of cotton have made money; they are prosperous, and, so far as the present population admits, tenants will be forthcoming. Another noticeable feature is that the prosperity enjoyed has been the means of families increasing rapidly—although part of this is rightly attributed to the Health Department, which tries to keep alive the infants born, with the result that infant mortality has greatly decreased.

A further especially interesting point to me was the large Hausa population. One came across towns from 5,000 to 8,000 inhabitants of Hausas from the Northern Provinces of Nigeria, and their huts were well stocked with infants. It was really wonderful, and speaks well both for the Administration and the prosperity of the country. Here these people, who had formerly trekked to Mecca and had picked cotton to earn their subsistence en route, had been so attracted by the country that they had settled down, and were now becoming tenants for cotton-growing. If this continues, it will help to solve the population difficulty—and Northern Nigeria can well afford to lose some of its people without any great injury. I am informed that a year after the dam is opened the 100,000 acres of cotton will be under cultivation; but we must look ahead and work for the larger water supply and the necessary labour—both of which must take time.

Only one factor of an adverse character did I notice in the Gezira, and that was the question of diseases and pests. Already several pests have made their appearance, Asal and Thrips being the chief offenders, and not enough was being done, for no real remedy has so far been found for their elimination, or being kept in check. Mr. Hewison's department has done good work, and I have the greatest praise for their efforts; a tremendous amount of their time and trouble is being taken up with looking after the marketing of native crops at Kassala, Tokar, Gedaref, etc. The department was further handicapped for funds—the present research scheme for the Gezira is run with funds found jointly by the Government and the Sudan Plantations Syndicate, but I do not think the system works successfully; it is not large enough, and there appears to be something lacking in control. I should like to see much greater effort made. This has been pointed out, and we can only hope that something will shortly be done to improve matters. Therefore, given the necessary water, sufficient labour, and expert knowledge to deal with diseases and pests, you have in the Gezira a second Egypt.

In addition, there are several other propositions in the Sudan, but of a minor character—the chief being Kassala, Tokar, and Gedaref.

Of Kassala you have a large river flooding 80,000 to 200,000 acres, and in this connection it must be remembered that the volume of water the Gash deposits from year to year is uncertain, and that it is not possible to store it, so that the object must be to make use of all the water possible during the years of large flood and average out in years of small flood. Labour again, whilst of an agricultural turn of mind, is not used to working hard. It sows, weeds, and picks the crop; no other cultivation is done. This speaks well for the climate and the soil—which gives good crops year after year. It is rich, as good and perhaps in places even better than the Gezira, being 12 to 15 feet deep. The railway will make all the difference by saving transport and bringing cultivators on to the land—and if one realises that the Kassala proposition can never be a Gezira, owing to its possibilities being limited to the land the river Gash irrigates, then I am convinced the scheme is an exceedingly good one, and will in time give us 60,000 to 100,000 bales of excellent cotton.

As I have pointed out, the railway means the success of Kassala, and once it reaches there it makes another place—Gedaref—a possibility. Here is a large area with a good population, and where already satisfactory rain-grown cotton of the American type is produced; but its development is hampered for transport.

Finally, we have Tokar, which I did not visit, but where excellent Sakel cotton has been grown for the past two years. The proposition is not dissimilar to Kassala, the land here being irrigated by the river Baraka. The volume of water it spills, however, is considerably less than the Gash. Over 20,000 bales have been grown at Tokar, and by carefully directing the water during times of big floods probably twice this quantity might be obtained; but with a low Baraka you might not get 20,000 bales. The soil is excellent, and after the flood the seed is planted—and in some cases left until the cotton is ready to pick. I was told of a Greek who planted some cotton, went away, and then during the high prices came back with his wife—picked the crop, which he sold for 7s. per lb.—making a small fortune for a little work.

The Sudan has truly the making of a great cotton-growing country. That it will finally develop into one I am convinced—because we shall get our water and solve our insect pests and disease troubles. Therefore, whatever happens, the Sudan must not lose its British Administration, and it is up to Lancashire more than any other part of the country to see it is so.

NOTES AND NEWS.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The Budget.

There were no surprises in Mr. Baldwin's first Budget, which almost exactly coincided with anticipations. Weeks ago I forecasted a further reduction in the income-tax and a rebate on beer. These constitute two of the three principal concessions, the third being a reduction by half of the Corporations Profits Tax. There are in addition minor concessions in regard to postage, telephones, table waters, and cider. We ought, I suppose, to be thankful for small mercies, and, on the financial position, 6d. off the income-tax probably represented all that could safely be done, but business men will not be of two minds as to the extent of the concession that could have been made if this Administration and its predecessor had really faced the question of effecting economies in the Civil Service. It can only be hoped that Mr. Baldwin's hint of further substantial economies during the current year will be amply fulfilled, so that at the second time of asking he may be able to give us at least the other 6d. that he should have been in a position to concede now. The most satisfactory feature of the Budget is the alteration in the Corporations Profits Tax. This tax, which might aptly have been named a tax on business enterprise—for that is what it is in effect—should never have been imposed, and the City will regard the present concession as an indication that another year will witness its disappearance.

Angora and the Chester Concession.

The latest moves by the Angora authorities have, unfortunately, tended to complicate the coming negotiations at Lausanne, and it is no longer possible to look forward with unmixed optimism to the resumption of pourparlers. The principal difficulty is likely to arise over what is known as the Chester Concession, to the details of which I have referred on several occasions. It had been thought that the Turks would refrain from committing themselves definitely in this direction until they knew how they stood with the Allies, and, in particular, with Great Britain, whose assistance in reconstruction is indispensable to them. The Angora Parliament is, however, reported to have ratified the agreement, thus granting the Americans practically a monopoly of concessions in Turkey, and ignoring the agreement entered into with France before the war. The view is taken in some quarters that the chief object the Turks have in view is to involve another Power in Asia Minor, and, while that may be very probable, one may legitimately wonder what the Turks expect to gain by an action which, whatever other consequences it may have, can only result in delaying the restoration of the country.

The Turkish Debt.

Another strange move that is reported from Angora, and one which suggests that the Turks are as intransigent as ever, is the issuing of a statement by the Government to the effect that the payment of coupons on the Turkish loans since 1918 is to be regarded as "null and void." One would like to believe that some misunderstanding exists over the question, for it is almost incredible that the Angora authorities should deliberately take a step which would not only further impede the deliberations at Lausanne, but would deal a very serious blow to Turkish credit. In any case, it is difficult to see what the Turks could expect to gain by such an action. Surely they do not think the bondholders will be prepared to refund interest they have rightfully received.

A British Bank Required.

In the report on Bulgaria which will be found in another column reference is made to the establishment of an international bank in that country, and it is pointed out that so far there is no Anglo-Bulgarian bank. The need for such an institution has been urged time and again in these columns, but while negotiations have long been on foot to that end, nothing has yet been arranged. Needless to say, British trade enterprise is, and must continue to be, severely handicapped without the support of a British banking institution. I have often wondered why one of the great joint stock institutions has not seized the opportunity afforded in Bulgaria and elsewhere of extending its business. That it would be well worth while is abundantly proved by the experience of British banks in other Near Eastern countries.

Trade of the Sudan.

There was a very marked decline in the value of the external trade of the Sudan in 1922, the figures being £E6,621,360, as compared with £E8,179,289 in 1921. This decrease was mainly in regard to imports, the value of the exports being much the same as in the previous year. This maintenance of exports in a period of pronounced depression is a fact of special significance, and gives ground for the hope that with the improvement in world conditions there will be a very rapid expansion in the trade of the Sudan.

British Consular Reports.

II.—BULGARIA.

The following extracts are taken from a report on the economic and financial conditions in Bulgaria in 1922 by Mr. Douglas MacKillop, Secretary-in-Charge Commercial Affairs, H.M. Legation, Sofia :—

If the position of the country is regarded from the purely economic point of view, it appears to be most satisfactory and full of promise for the future, the more so as the high level of commercial morality, great potentialities of expansion, and considerable undeveloped mineral resources, may be regarded as constant factors in Bulgaria's favour. It would be fallacious, however, to set down this favourable aspect as presenting a true picture of the country's position without some mention of the influences which condition and govern the whole of the activities of the country. These influences are entirely separate from, or only indirectly related to, commerce and economics, and any discussion of them would be, of course, out of place here. The most important are the uncertain situation in the Near East generally, the lack of any reliable auguries as to the permanent attitude of the Government towards trade and industry, and the reparations question. It is, in the first place, apparent that, so long as conditions in the Near East remain unsettled, the resultant atmosphere of uncertainty must be harmful to trade. The second influence on trade conditions, in common with all others, is the policy of the Bulgarian Government, which operates in the interest of the peasant rather than the industrialist. The policy of substituting the co-operative system for private enterprise in banking, agriculture, and eventually in industry, to which they are in principle committed, has not been carried into effect. Private trade has, however, been hampered in consequence. Co-operation in Bulgaria is a very real economic phenomenon, and may become in the future the basis of production and exchange.

International Bank.

The formation of an international bank in Sofia has been practically accomplished. It was expected that it would commence operations about the middle of January. For the present the only branches will be in Paris, Berlin, and also in Switzerland. The foundation capital indicated is 75,000,000 leva (about £110,000), of which 40,000,000 leva is subscribed by foreign interests, chiefly Swiss and Belgian. It was the original intention of the Bulgarian Government to attract British and American capital to this undertaking, but the proposal met with hardly any response from financial circles in these two countries.

Foreign capital is also very largely engaged in Bulgarian limited companies, of which there are at present 487 in the country, having a total capital of 1,081,084,000 leva.

There is still no Anglo-Bulgarian bank in Sofia. Proposals have been made from time to time with the object of realising this project, but up to the present none of these schemes has matured. There is, however, a branch in Sofia of the Banque Hongroise-Bulgare which is affiliated to the British and Hungarian Bank, Ltd., in which British capital has a majority interest.

Small British Trade.

Great Britain's purchases in Bulgaria during 1921 amounted to less than £40,000. The time may have passed when Bulgarian cereals were of interest to the British purchaser, but a study of the possibilities of employing Bulgarian tobacco, which is both cheap and of quite good quality, might well repay the British trader. Great Britain in 1921 stood third in the table of countries of origin of imported goods, Italy and Germany holding the first two places—Italy being in this connection the natural heir and successor of Austria-Hungary. So far as can be estimated, a large drop in the quantity of imports took place during 1922, to the detriment of all high valuta countries and to the relative, if not absolute, advantage of countries in the position of Germany and Austria. The tendency to increase in imports from Czechoslovakia was, for instance, abruptly checked by the appreciation in the value of the Czech crown.

When the obstacles with which British trade has to contend are considered—the depreciated currency of Bulgaria, the cost of freights, the customs dues—this result must be considered as a satisfactory one, particularly as British exporters in general, owing to a feeling of uncertainty as to the country's prospects and an unwillingness to accept terms of payment as stipulated, have followed a cautious policy.

As a general rule, little interest has hitherto been taken by British firms in invitations to tender issued by Government Departments owing, apparently, partly to a mistaken view of the security of payment—not a single case is on record of any default—and partly to a dislike of the difficult conditions stipulated by the different Ministries. As long as competing firms of foreign nationality are willing to accept these conditions, however, there is little prospect of inducing the Bulgarian Government to effect any change in their policy in this respect.

If, in spite of these unfavourable circumstances, British imports have attained a relatively high though naturally decreasing figure, it can be laid down with some confidence that a certain minimum exists of demand for British goods, while a change of policy on the part of British traders—which appears to be unlikely, and would imply the dangers (as well as the rewards) of taking a certain amount of risk—would certainly stimulate and increase that demand.

Tobacco.

The great increase in the tobacco sowings in Bulgaria is chiefly due to the incorporation in the country since 1912 of the tobacco-growing territories in the south and west. A certain amount of land in old Bulgaria has also been planted with tobacco in preference to other crops as a result of the post-war demand. The fall in the tobacco sowings in 1921 was due to a crisis in the European market owing to a temporary glut, in which the poorer qualities of Bulgarian tobacco suffered, and great quantities of the previous year's crop remained unsold, and was in effect due to over-production in the preceding year. Demand, however, revived in 1922, and the peasants were encouraged once more to sow tobacco, though not to the level of the record year of 1920. The sowings will probably fluctuate for some years to come until the amount of the reasonably steady demand has been ascertained by experience. At the present moment Germany is a large purchaser (the export to Germany of tobacco in January, 1922, was 1,891,318 kilos to a value of 56,761,801 leva), while America is also a buyer to a considerable extent, American consumers apparently preferring an admixture of Oriental tobacco in the home-grown variety, and the new Fordney tariff having rendered it necessary to purchase such tobacco in the cheapest market. British firms appear hitherto to have been prejudiced against tobacco grown in this country. This is unfortunate, as, without being superlatively good, its quality is sufficient to render it suitable for all but the highest class of cigarettes, and the price is remarkably low.

GUARANTEES FOR GREEK LOANS.

M. Cofinas, the Greek Minister of Finance, has made the following statement to the Greek Press:

The receipts of the public revenues set aside for the service of the Greek Public Debt amounted during the year 1922 to 465,000,000 drachmæ. After effecting the payments due on the loans controlled by the International Financial Commission, the latter turned over to the Greek Public Treasury a surplus of 180,000,000 drachmæ.

For the year 1923 these same revenues are estimated at 1,335 million drachmæ, and the surplus to be returned by the International Financial Commission to the Greek Public Treasury at 805 millions.

From the foregoing it is evident that, in spite of the rise in the rate of foreign exchange, the receipts of the revenues set aside for the Public Debt service are not only sufficient to cover the service of the gold loans, but also leave a considerable margin for the service of the loans not controlled by the International Commission.

As regards the old public debt in gold, the value of the coupons for 1923 has increased from 18 francs to 19 francs for the 1881, 1884, and 1890 Five per Cents., and from 14.40 francs to 14.80 francs for the 1889 Four per Cent., those of the loans of 1887 (Four per Cent.) and 1893 (Five per Cent.) remaining unchanged.

STOCK AND SHARE MARKETS.

GILT-EDGED FIRM.

Oils Strong.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

Owing to a series of unavoidable circumstances, it is three weeks since I have been able to deal with the markets. During that period, however, very little has happened of any importance, the holiday season for one thing and Budget anticipations for another exercising a restrictive influence on business. The general undertone of all the markets has been notably firm, and it is abundantly evident that once conditions generally are something like favourable the markets will go rapidly ahead. That consummation does not seem very likely, however, in the near future. The foreign political outlook is still the obstacle to a general trade revival, and it cannot be said that either in regard to Turkey or Germany matters have improved of late.

Strength of Gilt-edged.

The feature of the past week has been the strength of gilt-edged. Just before the Budget one might reasonably have expected more than a suspicion of dullness, but except for one period yesterday, when the market developed a rather uncertain tendency, a very firm tone has been maintained. Consols are 59½, War Loan Fives are 103½, the Conversion Loan is 79 5-16, while Fundings are 91 1-16. Indian stocks have been strong. The 3 per Cent. Loan is 60, the 5½ per Cent. Loan is 103½, while the 7 per Cent. Loan is 120.

The market in Foreign Government securities has been rather variable. French stocks have been fairly steady, War Loan Fives being 30, while the Four per Cents. are 23¾ x d. German Three per Cents. remain round about 15-16, while Italian Rentes are firm at 22½. In Near Eastern securities Egyptian stocks have been in good request, but Turkish Unified has been a dull spot, closing at 26½.

Industrials Irregular.

Industrials have been distinctly irregular as a result mainly of the labour situation. There have, however, been some decidedly firm spots, notably Tobaccos, which have been very strong. Bats are 94s., while Imperial Tobaccos are 87s. Textiles have also been fairly firm, with Courtaulds 69s. and Coats at 66s. 9d. Iron and Steel shares have been rather featureless. Armstrongs are 18s. 6d., Vickers are 15s., while Guest Keens are 42s. 6d. Shipping securities have been steady, with P. and O. deferred 315, Cunards 24s. 3d., and Furness Withys 34s. 9d. Bank shares have been very firm. Westminster's are 17½, Chartered of India are 19½, while National of India are 46¾.

Oils Steady.

Quite a good tone has ruled in the Oil group, and in a number of cases shares reached higher levels. Anglo-Persian ordinary are 4 3-32, while Burmahs are 5½. Among Egyptians, Anglo-Egyptian B have been strong, closing at 1 9-16. In the Roumanian group, Phoenix are 1 15-32, while Dacia Romanos are again better at 1½.

A new branch of the Westminster Bank, Ltd., has been opened at 26, Haymarket, S.W.1, under the management of Mr. W. C. Hodgson.

The Bank of England are prepared to receive the coupons due May 1 on Egyptian Unified Bonds. The necessary lists can be procured on application at the dividend pay office, 5-6, Lombard Street, E.C.

LONDON PRODUCE REPORT.

Oil Cakes Lower.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

Sugar.—Home refined has continued in fair demand. Tate's cubes have been done at 69s. 3d., Lyle's granulated has come to business at 63s. 9d., while London granulated is now 63s. 6d. Foreign descriptions have been firm. West Indian crystallised has been done at 56s. 6d., white Mauritius is 58s. 9d., while Czech granulated has come to business at 61s. 6d. Futures are: August 34s. 3d., November 26s. 1½d., December 26s. 3d.

Coffee.—The spot market has been steady. East Indian is unchanged at 112s., Costa Rica remains at 108s., Nairobi is unaltered at 93s., while Santos is 1s. down at 74s. Futures are: May 55s. 6d., July 55s. 6d.

Rice.—The market has been quiet but firm. Spanish Japan rice has again been in good request at advanced rates. American rice has also been in demand. The market position generally is strong, and it would not be at all surprising if prices advanced considerably in the near future.

Green Fruit.—Supplies of oranges have not kept pace with the demand, and there is at the present time a pronounced shortage. The result has been that prices have hardened. Quotations are: Jaffas, 19s. box (144's); Denias and Valencias, 21s. to 60s. box (240's to 504's). The position with regard to lemons is exactly the opposite. Supplies are now greatly in excess of requirements, and prices have eased off somewhat. Quotations are: 10s. to 16s. box (300's); 18s. 6d. to 35s. case (300's). Apples have continued to be a good market. Onions have been in fair request, with Egyptians moving off freely.

Dried Fruit.—This market has been good throughout, with business on a very fair scale. Currants have been a firm spot. Sultanias have been in exceptional request, and it is obvious that a continuance of the demand must lead to higher prices. Bosnian plums have again been a good feature, and the demand for this commodity is as good as for anything in this section. Supplies of figs are inadequate to meet the demand, and prices show a tendency to harden.

Oilseeds.—Linseed has weakened somewhat. Indian is 22s. 1½d., while La Plata is 20s. 9d. Rapeseed has been quiet, with Toria at 18s. 1½d. and real bold Ferozepore at 17s. 4½d. Cottonseed has hardened. Indian has come to business at 9s. 6d., Egyptian black has been done at 12s. 6d., while Sakellaridis is 11s. 7½d.

Oils.—Linseed has been firm, closing at 53s., at which it shows a considerable advance. Rape oil has been steady. Crude is 44s., and technical refined is 47s. Cotton oil has been firm. Refined common edible has been done at 46s., Egyptian crude has come to business at 42s., technical is 45s., while deodorised is 48s.

Oil Cakes.—There has been a sharp decline in this commodity. Linseed cake at 240s. is 15s. down, cotton meal cake is also 15s. down at 230s., coconut cake at 160s. has shed 15s., while cottonseed cake is 5s. lower at 130s.

AGRICULTURE IN IRAK.

The agricultural bulletin of Irak for the month ended February 15, gives the following particulars:—

The season has been marked by comparatively mild weather until the end of January when in the last week frost was recorded on the last five days. The scarcity of rain caused a certain amount of anxiety to cultivators who in some cases had not been able to irrigate land which had been sown. Pumps and water-lifts had been working full time for the greater part of the month. The situation was considerably relieved, however, by a good shower of rain on February 12. This had a very beneficial effect on winter crops, so that prospects are much better than what they were the previous month. Wheat and barley are reported to have made good growth, and there is a steady supply of winter vegetables. Seedlings from early-sown summer vegetables are being transplanted from seed beds to garden plots which are provided with artificial shelters to protect them from cold winds. It is not known as yet how the cultivated area compares with last year, but it is generally believed that it is considerably less. Green fodder has become more plentiful and there is still a sufficient supply of dry fodder from last year, but the situation is improving as a result of the recent rains. All classes of live-stock are in fairly good condition.

On the Government experimental station at Rustam the sowings of wheat and barley have been continued. None of the experiments have been irrigated yet with the exception of a few lines of wheats and barleys from North Africa. The staff are now engaged in working out the data collected from last year's cotton experiments, and further investigation has been made in tracing out the root system of the cotton plant in this country. Lucerne, flax, and mangolds are making satisfactory progress. 428 acres of wheat, 41 acres of barley, and 28 acres of winter vegetables have been grown on the share system with local cultivators.

Collection of soil samples has been continued in the area commanded by the Saklawiyah canal. It is hoped that this work will be completed by the end of February.

There is already a brisk demand for cotton seed this year, and it is anticipated that a fairly large area will be put under cultivation. In addition to the areas where cotton was grown last year cultivators are being canvassed in the Hilla, Karbala, and Diwaniyah districts, where it is hoped that there will be an ample supply of water to ensure the crop receiving its full requirements in the hottest part of the year. On the Yusufiyah and Saklawiyah canals the issue of seed is being restricted to such as can obtain a guarantee that they will be supplied with water sufficient for the area which they intend to sow.

A representative of the Department of Agriculture has gone to Mosul to make further investigations into the possibility of combating locusts. No satisfactory method has so far been evolved. Attempts have been made in the past to burn the young hoppers with cheap oil from the wells at Giyara, but the cost of transporting the oil to the breeding grounds combined with the inaccessibility of the latter rendered the scheme impracticable. Similarly the spraying of locusts with stomachic or contact poisons proved to be much too expensive. Past experience seems to indicate that the lines along which combative measures can be most economically and satisfactorily undertaken are those of egg collection and destruction in co-operation with the inhabitants of the affected area. It remains to be seen how far it is possible to initiate such measures in territory which is sparsely populated, and how far these are likely to prove effective.

Now that the export of grain has been re-established there are a number of problems that require to be solved in order to facilitate this trade. One of the most important is that of transport, and the railway is gradually providing a solution. A new station is proposed between Baghdad and Mahmudiyah for the benefit of cultivators on the Yusufiyah, who will thus be saved the cost of transporting grain to Baghdad. Providing purchase can be effected at the railway station there should be a saving of at least six rupees per ton which it is estimated is the cost of transporting grain by caravan from the Yusufiyah to Baghdad. As long as export continues via the Gulf there is no reason why grain should be back-railed to Baghdad in order to be reshipped or railed to Basrah again, unless prices at the latter market are very much below that of the former. It is to be hoped that merchants and brokers will take full advantage of the opportunity afforded them, but this remains to be seen.

The traffic receipts of the Egyptian Delta Light Railways for the ten days ended March 20 amounted to £E8,107.

The Dacia Romano Petroleum Syndicate, Ltd., has brought in a new well on the Moreni field. The well is under perfect control, and is flowing at the rate of 240 tons per day.

CONDITION OF EGYPTIAN CROPS.

The bulletin of the Egyptian Ministry of Agriculture gives the following particulars of crop conditions in March:—

Wheat.—Weather was, on the whole, favourable, though somewhat changeable in some districts. Water supply was ample everywhere. In Lower Egypt the bulk of the early-sown crop is in ear. In Upper Egypt the crop is approaching maturity, and harvesting is expected to take place towards the middle of April. Slight attacks of rust and smut were reported from several districts. The yield is expected to be almost normal.

Barley.—The general condition is slightly better than last month. The crop is maturing, and harvesting has already begun in Upper Egypt, and will soon be general.

Beans.—Unfavourable weather has slightly affected the crop, and caused some flower shedding in certain parts of Lower and Middle Egypt. Attacks of rust, broom-rape, and bean blight were reported. Harvesting is progressing in Upper Egypt, and is expected to be general in April.

Bersim.—The condition of the crop is the same as last month. The third cutting is now general. The last patches of temporary bersim are being ploughed up for cotton.

Helba.—Harvesting has begun in Upper Egypt, and will soon be general. Aphis and dodder caused considerable damage. The condition of the crop is less satisfactory than last month.

Onions.—Harvesting is progressing. The crop suffered from a severe attack of mildew (Peronospora) in Giza Province. The condition of the crop has considerably declined since last month's bulletin was published.

Lentils.—Harvesting and threshing are almost general. The attack of aphis was particularly severe in Qena Province.

Sugar-cane.—Preparation of land and sowing of the new crop are general. Cutting for factories is still going on. Slight attacks of stalk-borer and mealy bug were reported.

Cotton.—The preparation of land and sowing are progressing. Where sowing had already taken place, the young plants suffered to some extent from the unfavourable weather, which necessitated a certain amount of resowing. The water supply was sufficient, except in some localities situated at the tail end of canals.

Steaua Romana (British), Ltd., are advised that the fields' gross production of the Steaua Romana Company (Bucharest) for the month of March was 19,630 tons.

NEW COMPANY.

The registered office is at 428, Salisbury House, London Wall, E.C.2.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Business Restricted.

The Commercial Co. of Egypt, in their report for the week ended April 5, state:—

Since our last report the futures market has been very quiet, prices remaining almost unchanged. There is very little to report, as, owing to the Easter holidays, the market has been open only three days during the week. The demand from abroad has been negligible, and speculators have not taken much interest in the market. The New York market has fluctuated widely, but a firmer tone is now again in evidence. What little business has passed has been mostly in Sakellaridis, and the difference between that variety and Ashmouni has widened slightly farther. The arrivals from up-country do not cease, and the total quantity so far received has now reached 6,221,133 krs. Exports continue to be large, and the stock at Alexandria stands now at 1,929,154 krs., against 2,257,656 krs. a year ago.

Spot.—Total sales this week amount to about B/s 5100, of which we estimate B/s 3200 Sakellaridis, B/s 1800 Uppers, B/s 50 Brown, and B/s 50 White. Our market was closed from Friday to Monday last owing to the Easter holidays.

Sakellaridis.—There has been a slightly better demand for this variety during the week, and holders appear to be somewhat more inclined to sell. Staple cotton in all grades is becoming very much more difficult to find, and consequently obtains higher prices. The premiums for fully good fair to good and good have stiffened owing to the fairly consistent demand for these grades during the past few weeks. For fair to fully good fair the position remains about unchanged. There is always a small demand for low grades, but the available supplies are getting short.

Uppers.—All business during the week has been in the higher grades; cotton below fully good fair has been entirely neglected. The price of spot against contracts remains about unchanged.

Crop, 1923.—Our interior correspondents report that the nights recently have been very cold, and that resowing has had to be done on a large scale.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Heavy Buying for Russia.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended April 11:—

The first two days of the period under review produced a good paper inquiry, interest being stimulated by the recovery in the American market. Practically all Egyptian growths were included, but Sakellaridis was not quite so prominent as is usually the case, and in hardly an instance was the 17d. figure exceeded. Prices ruled steady, and a fair business of 500 bales a day resulted. On Monday, however, quite a sensation was caused by some heavy buying on Russian account, which was continued during the two succeeding days, some good lines, both in spot and c.i.f., being booked. A distinct hardening of prices has been felt in consequence. Apart from this export-buying, business has been quieter this week than has been the case for some little time, and unless the local demand improves again prices as a whole are not likely to retain to-day's level. The large stock of good to fine Sakellaridis hangs heavily on the market, and tenders of this cotton continue to be made, with the result that extra fine Sakellaridis was to-day reduced 30 points. On the other hand, fully good fair Sakellaridis continues in good request, and the basis for this cotton is likely to stiffen as the season advances. C.i.f. quotations from Egypt are still very dear compared with prices ruling on our market, and rumours are rife to the effect that an attempt will be made in Alexandria this month to "corner" the Upper market there.

Low cotton, 12d. and 13d., has been in fair request, and sellers are firm. Several hundred bales of Sudan Sakellaridis recently changed hands at about 19d. per lb. This year's Tokar Sakellaridis has not yet made its appearance here. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending April 6 were returned as 9,110 bales, and the weekly average since August 1, 1922, is now over 8,000 per week. This is the highest weekly average since the 1919 boom, and is very little behind the 1913 figures. This surely is an unmistakable sign that the Egyptian section of the trade is fast recovering. The Liverpool stock is steady at 126,000 bales. Total sales, 6,000 bales (including 450 Sudan). Quotations of Sakellaridis are raised 35 points, with the exception of extra fine, which is only 5 points higher. Brown and Upper are 20 points dearer all round. Fully good fair Sakellaridis to-day, 17.75d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Inquiry on Fair Scale.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended April 14 states:—

Another exceedingly quiet week has been experienced. Although inquiry has been on a fair scale, too much of it has been at prices which sellers are unwilling to consider. It appears evident that buyers abroad still distrust the present level of values, and are not willing to commit themselves beyond their immediate requirements.

Yarn.—Spinners maintain the firm attitude recently noted, but have not been successful in finding any appreciable amount of business to apply it to. As has been the case for so long past, the chief sufferers have been the spinners of the American staple, and it seems very probable that the 50 per cent. curtailment of output will be continued during May.

Cloth.—There has been a fair amount of inquiry, and possibly a little more business. India and China have purchased on about the same scale as recently, but there seems to be a slight improvement in the demand from Egypt and from Constantinople. It is said that in the latter place, for which comparatively few shipments have been made during the winter, there is some demand for stocks of certain lines whenever they can be picked up at tempting prices, and shippers appear to have more confidence in consigning goods to that market than has been the case recently.

Raw Cotton.—This market has been steadier, though not without fluctuations. There has been rather more spot business. The usual rumours with regard to the acreage being sown for the new crop, etc., are beginning to circulate, but it is too early yet for any definite news with regard to this. Closing prices are as follows:—American Fully Middling, 16.05; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 17.85.

The exports of plumbago from Ceylon in 1922 amounted to 211,235 cwt.

The Imperial Bank of Persia announce the numbers of 151 bonds, amounting to £8,380, of the Persian Government 5 per Cent. Sterling Loan, 1911, which have been drawn for redemption on May 15.

The Greek Legation announces that the site of the Royal stables in Athens is being put up for auction until May 14, 1923. Particulars can be obtained from the Greek Legation, 51, Upper Brook Street, London, W.1.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS

The following extracts are taken from recent reports received by the Imperial Ottoman Bank:—

Mosul, February.

The weather continues very favourable to the sowings. The rains alternating with days of fine weather are helping forward the germination. The pasture land is in excellent condition: the yield from the flocks is very good, and the butter season begins full of promise.

The commercial market is totally lacking in movement and business continues to be at a standstill owing to the scarcity of money, which is becoming daily more and more marked. A certain movement, however, in the export of the skins of martens and foxes may be noted.

Adana, February 28.

The heavy and abundant rains which have fallen here have been rather prejudicial to agriculture in general. The floods which have resulted, followed in many places by the overflowing of the banks of the rivers Seihoun and Djeihoun, have seriously injured the next grain harvest, either by covering the fields, where the wheat and barley had already sprouted, with mud, or, owing to the force of the current, having washed away the sown lands. Further, this uninterrupted spell of bad weather has prevented the farmer from sowing cotton seed, causing an appreciable delay. However, it is to be hoped that this delay will have no bad consequences for the sowing, which will benefit by a soil abundantly watered.

Mersina, March 1.

The atmospheric conditions appeared to be somewhat favourable to the winter harvests, but the persistent rains have hindered the sowings of cotton seed.

Tarsus, March 1.

The continuous rains which have fallen during the past month are considered by the farmer to be generally as favourable for the cereals as for the cotton. The fields thus soaked with rain will be in a better condition to receive the cotton seed.

Dijlah, March 1.

The excessive quantity of water which has fallen here can only have a rather unfavourable effect in regard to the cereals. On the other hand, the cotton seed, the sowing of which, it is true, is very late, will, it is said, benefit from the wet weather.

Jaffa, March 17.

A small quantity of dhari seed was shipped to Algiers during the week. Oranges continue to be shipped regularly.

This week the market in cereals, sesame and dhari has again been active, but the sellers have had to make considerable reductions on the higher prices ruling at the end of last week.

Jaffa, March.

Owing to the lack of rain at the end of the season, the harvest generally in Palestine, principally round about Beersheba, has been partially damaged. It is difficult to foretell now the value of the general yield. However, the harvest is certain to be below that of the preceding year. The price of wheat remains stationary, whilst barley has risen 25 p. per kantar.

The shipments of oranges to England continue on a large scale, and the prices realised are in all cases favourable to the shippers. About 650,000 cases have been forwarded to England up to the present, and there will be about 200,000 cases to be shipped before the end of the season.

Kermanshah, March 17.

Money in the interior is, for the moment, scarce. Business is at a standstill on account of the long holiday in connection with the Persian fête "Nevrouz."

THE GROWTH OF BOURGAS.

A feature of the year 1922 (says the recently issued British Consular report on Bulgaria) is the growth of the port of Bourgas. Offering, as it does, a slightly shorter sea route from Western Europe and having become, as a result of railway improvements, much nearer to Sofia than is Varna, it is gradually tending to equal the latter port, if not to exceed it. The grant of any effective outlet to Bulgaria at Dedeagatch would, of course, modify this tendency. The relative position of British shipping remains about the same as in 1921.

CUNARD COMPANY'S RESULTS.

The report of the Cunard Steamship Co., Ltd., states that, after providing for depreciation of ships and other property and plant, income-tax, corporation profits tax, debenture interest, and discount on debenture stock, there is a profit for the year of £394,587, which, added to the balance brought in from 1921, makes a total of £594,477. For 1921 the credit at the profit and loss account, including the amount brought in, was £669,106. The dividend on the preference stock has been paid, and the directors recommend a dividend on the ordinary shares, including the Government shares, of 7½ per cent., payable on April 30. This leaves a balance to go forward of £125,261, as compared with £199,890 brought in.

The services of the company have been satisfactorily maintained during the year, although conducted at certain disadvantages. A fair share of the Atlantic passenger traffic was obtained, but the third-class movement continued to be limited, owing to the operation of the United States law restricting immigration. The volume of freight carried shows a considerable increase over 1921, but the carrying rates, especially homeward from America, have fallen to a low level, owing to increased competition. The ordinary general meeting will be held at the company's offices, Liverpool, on April 25, at 11 a.m.

MERCURY ORES.

A new volume on mercury ores, in the Series of Monographs on Mineral Resources, with special reference to the British Empire, issued under the direction of the Mineral Resources Committee of the Imperial Institute, has just been published by Mr. John Murray (price 5s.). It is written by Mr. Edward Halse, A.R.S.M., M.Inst.M.M. Scientific and Technical Department, Imperial Institute.

Mercury or quicksilver, although somewhat widely distributed, only occurs in economic quantities in a few deposits in the world. It is largely used in the manufacture of certain drugs and chemicals. In the earlier part of the war fulminate of mercury was in great demand for detonating high explosives, but later its use in this respect was largely superseded by other chemicals. The metal is also used in the manufacture of vermilion, and of red oxide of mercury, utilised in preservative paints for the bottoms of ships. Mercury is also used in certain electrical apparatus, in the construction of certain instruments, in the amalgamation of gold and silver ores, and for a few other purposes. The world's production of mercury in pre-war years amounted to about 4,500 short tons. During the war, 1917 was the only year in which the production exceeded this amount by about 160 tons, which was largely due to the increased outputs from the United States and China. Since the war there has been a sharp decline in the world's production, that for 1921 amounting to about 2,332 short tons, or nearly half of the 1912 production. This fall in production has been largely due to the suspension of working of many of the low-grade mines of the United States, and to a decrease in the exports from China.

The first chapter of the monograph deals briefly with mercury minerals; the mining methods, concentration and reduction of the same; and the properties, uses, prices, and world's production of the metal. In the second chapter the deposits of the British Empire are described, the principal being those of Kamloops Lake and Barclay Sound, Vancouver Island, British Columbia; Pulganbar, New South Wales; Kilkivan and Cooktown, Queensland; Puhupuhi and Ohaeawai, New Zealand. The third and last chapter describes the mercury deposits of foreign countries, notably those of Idria, in Carniola; Monte Amiata, in Italy; Nikitovka, in Southern Russia; Almaden, in Spain; the United States; and Huancavelica, in Peru. The minor occurrences of Yugoslavia, Asia Minor, China, Mexico, Brazil, Colombia, and other South American countries are also described. A map shows the chief mercury occurrences in the world, and the volume concludes with a list of publications on mercury.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Lausanne Conference.

Five months have passed since the Lausanne Conference was opened on November 20, 1922. The relatively little interest taken by the countries concerned in the negotiations resumed this week is a measure of the desire of all for peace, and proof that any further postponement of the Near East settlement will be the arbitrary work of one or more individuals and not due to any conflict of principles between the nations. The Turkish people, it is certain, are set upon peace no less keenly than the others. The chief danger to a successful issue to the Conference would seem to lie in French pique and Turkish ignorance of economics. Public opinion in France has been encouraged to expect great things of a much-advertised Franco-Turkish friendship. But this plant has withered even more rapidly than it grew, and there is a tendency on the part of the French Government to try to extract from the Turks through the Treaty what it had been led to expect would be conceded by them of their own free will. The economic clauses, as drafted by the Allies, are necessarily of an intricate character, for the adequate comprehension of which neither the Turkish delegation nor, probably, any single Turk is intellectually equipped. The Turks, therefore, suspecting all manner of pitfalls in the technical phraseology that they do not understand, hope to conceal their ignorance by deferring the consideration of the economic clauses. Unless the British representatives can convince the French that their present policy is as fatal to their real interests as was that of M. Franklin-Bouillon, and can persuade the Turks that no designs on their independence and material progress lurk in the economic clauses, the resumed negotiations at Lausanne may be almost as protracted as the first part of the Conference.

Turkey's Apprenticeship.

All those who have been able to follow the Nationalist movement closely are ready to recognise the good intentions behind some of its activities and to pay a tribute to some of the work actually accomplished. Angora, however, has not learnt the art of hastening slowly. The industry of the National Assembly has been prodigious; in the first seven months of its existence it passed fifty-six laws. The complete absence of legal phraseology would not be altogether a disadvantage if the general appearance of the legislation as a whole did not betray a hastiness in drafting and often insufficient consideration of the subject. An illustration of the failure of the Government and of the Assembly to consider a question in all its possible bearings is afforded by the application of Prohibition to Constantinople. It seems to have occurred to no one in Angora that the Public Debt Administration derived considerable revenue from the duty paid on alcoholic liquor, and that, consequently, steps would have to be taken to replace that revenue. Orders were given to apply Prohibition to Constantinople, and since then various "face-saving" postponements have had to be resorted to, as the difficulties in the way of application came to be appreciated.

The Analogy of Russia.

It would be well for the Nationalist Turks if they could realise that all that is best in the world is interested in the success of the new Turkey. What is not desirable—and, so far, it cannot be ruled as entirely out of the question—is that Nationalist Turkey should bear the same relation to the Turkey of Abdul Hamid as Bolshevist Russia bears to the old corrupt Russia under the Tsars. Misgivings, however, are bound to arise on this subject when the present-day situation in Smyrna is taken into consideration. The visa on a foreign passport, it is reported, has to be signed by the Governor, the Chief Police Officer, the Chief Military Officer, and the Chief Medical Officer, in addition to various formalities at the Treasury and the Passport Office. The Turkish explanation for this elaborate procedure is not known, but to the foreigner it appears to be merely a clumsy method of providing emoluments of office to a number of officials, regardless of administrative efficiency. Again it is hardly up to the European standard of diplomacy that, in order to register displeasure against Italy, a company of soldiers should be marched down to the quay under an officer, should be drawn up opposite an Italian man-of-war, and should solemnly point and discharge unloaded rifles in the direction of the vessel. Mustapha Kemal Pasha, Ismet Pasha, and the other leaders of the new Turkey are admittedly capable of better things than this; but unless they keep the Anatolian backwoodsman element in its place, Turkey will find the position to which it is entitled in the Moslem world taken by a more progressive and better administered State.

Domestic Problems in Turkey.

There are already many indications that Mustapha Kemal Pasha may find the task of holding his own against the Allies—who showed themselves anxious to meet him half-way—plain sailing compared with the difficulties that lie ahead of him in the domestic affairs of Turkey. He struck the popular imagination by proclaiming foreign interference an obsolete condition. To retain his position he must show, it would be thought, that the new Turkey has for the vast majority of Turks palpable advantages over the old. Redressing the balance against the foreigner may seem desirable to a post-war mood; but under settled conditions of peace it will quickly be found that the disadvantages of the foreigners' presence were as nothing in comparison with the disadvantages of his absence. Unless, therefore, material benefits are forthcoming in other directions, enthusiasm for the new order will wane, to the prejudice of the man responsible for its introduction. The new Treason Law that has effectually damped the interest of the Opposition in the elections bears a stronger likeness to the despotism of Abdul Hamid than to the legislation of a free country. The proclamation recently issued to the Islamic world by Sultan Mehmed V. suggests that the last has not yet been heard of the separation of the Sultanate and the Khalifate. If ever a country needed peace within its borders and without it is Turkey at the present time, and we can but hope that Mustapha Kemal Pasha will take advice from the experience of more settled countries, and not model his political practice on that of Balkan States.

Egypt's Constitution and After.

Now that an independent Egypt has her Constitution, the question that naturally comes to the minds of all those interested in the country is, "What will she do with it?" To Britons it will be of special interest to watch whether a certain anti-British feeling—not unnatural in the period of conflict—will at once be given full rein when martial law has been withdrawn, or whether this feeling will quickly give way to a desire to let bygones be bygones. The issue will determine the measure of Egypt's capacity for self-government. As to the ultimate relations between Egypt and Great Britain there need be no anxiety. The interests of the two countries are too closely allied to allow of permanent hostility between them. All that is open to doubt is the period for which the spirit in which an attempt at a trade boycott has been recently started will continue to manifest itself. It will probably be found that Anglo-Egyptian relations will leave little to be desired as soon as Egyptian political parties have learnt that in no circumstances will they be able to implicate, or to lay claim to having implicated, Britain or the British in Egyptian political differences.

The Frontier Outrages.

The recent outrages on the Indian Frontier have naturally elicited much comment in this country, but so far it cannot be said that the discussion has yielded any results of positive value. The most interesting contribution we have noticed is Lord Inchcape's letter to The Times, which contained an admirable diagnosis of the situation, but, alas! had nothing to offer in the way of a solution. Some "hundreds of thousands of well-armed barbarians, living in a sterile, mountainous country which cannot support them," are in fact the most unpleasant neighbours which a civilised community can have, but, short of civilising them by force, there is nothing for it but to sit tight, and offer them as few opportunities of mischief as may be possible. The question inevitably arises whether the Indian Government is wise to permit the presence of non-combatants in places where they can add nothing to the strength of the Frontier, but serve only as temptation to the enemy. In this respect the old tradition is one of liberality, or even laxity; but in these days, when the army is being reduced at any rate to the bare minimum, there appears to be a strong case for keeping such temptations well beyond the enemy's reach. In the meantime it is a relief to know that Miss Ellis is in a place of safety after her terrible experience.

Religious Acerbation in India.

The outburst of religious hatred at Amritsar and the prompt restoration of order furnish yet another illustration of the well-established principle that when Hindus and Moslems fall out there is work for Englishmen. The really significant feature of the present time is the apparent entry of Hinduism into the ranks of militant religions. According to the text-books, that great system does not trouble to make proselytes, though it may absorb individuals or tribes if they come forward, but, as a matter of fact, the efforts of Hindu missionaries to reclaim communities which have embraced Islam are just now exciting considerable attention not only in Amritsar, but over large areas in Northern India. To say that these efforts are political rather than religious is beside the point. Hinduism is a system of life which has not yet recognised the segregation of religious from other activities, and if the new fashion spreads it is bound to affect the life of the country as a whole. Islam in India has laid aside much of its traditional militancy, but if it is seriously attacked the old tradition will assuredly revive, and the national unification of which ardent politicians talk will again recede into the distant future.

Extremists in Power.

We warned our readers last week that the danger of the Indian Extremists was not extinct, and before the warning was fairly in print the mail brought news that the party had succeeded in capturing the municipal administration of most of the larger cities in the United Provinces, the centre of Indian urban life. The importance of this victory is brought out in a letter from Sir Ludovic Porter, who probably knows as much of the cities in question as any man now living. The moderate administrators, he tells us, have been simply swept away, and the men now in power have captured the machinery with the avowed intention of wrecking it. We have not yet received details of the voting, and it is still uncertain whether the results are to be read as a definite declaration of urban opinion or as a warning to moderate men that apathy at election time is out of place; but if the former reading is correct, it suggests that a similar fate may be in store for the Legislative Council, unless, which is quite possible, practical experience of extremist administration should produce a revulsion of popular feeling in the next six months.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

The Government's Stability.

It has been a week of alarums and excursions, and of would-be assassins without, who looked for signals from would-be traitors within. Mr. Garvin, who fills the rôle of First Murderer every Sunday, prophesies the immediate retirement of Mr. Bonar Law every time the Prime Minister sneezes; but, unluckily for him, the victim generally plays tennis vigorously on Saturday afternoons, which makes the prediction look a little foolish. The judicious may grieve, but the Die-Hards laugh at these knavish tricks.

The fact is that these rumours are a manoeuvre to get back the Unionist trio—Mr. Chamberlain, Sir Robert Horne, and Sir Lamington Evans—into the Cabinet. That would be a possible feat, and it may yet come off; but those who forward the scheme are suspect of something else. They are believed still to hanker after the Centre Party—which means, in effect, the return of Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Winston Churchill, and Lord Birkenhead.

Now this particular trio is another matter altogether. A certain number of Conservatives would probably swallow Mr. Churchill at a pinch. But nothing less than another world-war would make them tolerate the Welsh wizard in the fold again; he is too much like the wolf in the story of Little Red Riding Hood. And as to Lord Birkenhead, not even a world-war would induce the stalwarts to forgive him. He seems to have fallen, like Lucifer and bad pastry, "never to rise again."

Further, it must be admitted that the Government is doing better. It won the Ludlow election with a comfortable majority; it has held its own in the House of Commons since the recess; and Labour is ruining its own chances by playing the fool. There is an idea in that camp that "scenes" and disorder are evidence of activity, and a good advertisement. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald knows better. Every outbreak of the Opposition at Westminster simply strengthens the Government.

The Budget.

The Budget, too, was a great success. Not a word of objection has come from the Conservatives; and even Liberals and Labour men, who are bound to criticise in public, are glad enough in private to have sixpence off the income-tax. A penny off beer will reduce a legitimate working-class grievance, although the brewers might have borne a greater part of the reduction than they are actually carrying; and the concessions on postage and the telephone will also be useful.

There is no doubt that trade is reviving, and these reductions will be an additional help. I happened to be in Scotland a week or so ago, and even the cautious Glaswegian admitted that commercially things might be worse. (It is true that the admission was made after dinner, when discretion nods its drowsy head.) In Yorkshire the feeling was even more hopeful; apparently orders are coming in well, and although there is no boom, things are reasonably brisk.

On the Stock Exchange in London, too, shares are up—partly through the foreign investor—and are likely to go still higher; even industrials are looking up. I am told, too, that some of the recent capital issues have been heavily over-subscribed. All this is to the good; and the Budget, by improving our credit everywhere, will give its own little fillip.

Future Finance.

It is possible that further economies in expenditure and an additional repayment of debt will secure another small reduction of income-tax next year. If Mr. Baldwin could take off 3d. in 1924, and another 3d. in 1925, that would be about as much as we could expect from reductions in Whitehall; the bulk of the remaining burden is from the National Debt.

But the Chancellor of the Exchequer hinted at the possibility of a funding loan during the next few years—the date hypothetically mentioned is 1929, and it is suggested that this operation, if successfully performed, would mean another 1s. off the income-tax. It would then stand at 3s. in the £, and no further reduction would be expected for some years. But a rate of 3s. would be tolerable after the agonies of the past.

Sugar and the Sex Question.

There has been no reduction of the sugar duty, and the Labour Party is officially wroth—but in their heart of hearts they are rather pleased, because they can make play with this grievance for the woman's vote. Female enfranchisement has distinctly made a difference in the political aspect of taxation. Wives naturally prefer reductions on the "breakfast-table" duties, because it makes the housekeeping money go further; whereas beer is paid for out of trousers pockets as a rule.

On the other hand, the reduction of the tea duty last year was of no benefit to the consumer—the 4d. went to the producer or middleman. Apparently, any reduction of the sugar duty would have done the same—at any rate, Mr. Baldwin's argument to that effect has not been seriously challenged.

Sugar is rising all over the world—a fact which, incidentally, is helpful to our new beet sugar industry. It had cruelly hard luck at the start—three-quarters of the subscribed capital has been written off as lost this year—but it is now making headway. The promoters are to be congratulated on their plucky fight.

Shakespeare Celebrations.

The Shakespeare tercentenary is being celebrated this week—a little late in the day, owing to the War. It was inaugurated at Southwark Cathedral, where one of the dramatist's brothers was buried, and there are to be the usual functions and the inevitable speeches. (These inflections can hardly be avoided, even by the righteous.)

One wonders, by the way, whether anybody will recall the fact that Shakespeare had a horror of being dug up again after he was dead. The graveyard scene in "Hamlet" is a reflection of that feeling, and he was buried 20 ft. deep at Stratford in order to avoid the fate of poor Yorick. Our ancestors had little reverence for the dead, if old churchyard records are any evidence. If it had not been for the dramatist's precaution, and the curse which he had inscribed on his monument, I imagine that some of his idolaters would want to remove him to a national pantheon.

Last Week's Books.

Mr. Rudyard Kipling has broken his long silence with a history of "The Irish Guards in the Great War" (Macmillan). The book is a regimental history of the ordinary type, but it is full of the inimitable Kipling touches.

"De Senectute: More Last Words" (Fisher Unwin) is the final (and posthumous) contribution to letters of Frederic Harrison, who died a few weeks ago. I doubt whether much of Harrison's work will live, but there is a virility in the writing of this veteran of ninety which makes it interesting on that account alone.

The "Life of Sir Hubert Herkomer" (Hutchinson), by J. Saxon Mills, is the official life of the great artist. It was news to me that he was a naturalised Englishman who subsequently denaturalised himself and became a German again—after which he repudiated his native country a second time and once more became an Englishman.

The book is full of good stories—the funniest of all is Herbert Spencer's anxiety as to the shape of his nose on canvas. He wrote long letters to the artist discussing that organ, and Herkomer retaliated by calling him an "old porcupine"—but surely "old woman" would have been at least as adequate and true. The fact is that when he was a child Spencer's nose was cut open by his little sister with a carving knife—probably he irritated her to madness, as he did other people—and Spencer remained sensitive on the subject to the end. One had hardly imagined that so extremely ugly a philosopher would have been as vain of his appearance as a woman; but painters, like doctors, know terrible secrets—and sometimes reveal them.

OBITUARY.

LIEUT.-COL. J. W. BOYLE, D.S.O.

The recent death of Lieut.-Colonel J. W. Boyle, D.S.O.—Joe Boyle to his friends—brings to an end a romantic life, fuller of incident than the lives of most people. His story, as far as the Near East is concerned, dates from the time of the War, which had brought "Klondyke" Boyle from Canada to Europe. After service in Russia, he went to Roumania, where he had a serious illness. He was convinced that it was to the care and nursing of Queen Marie that he owed his life, and from that moment he laid himself out to do all that he could for the interests of Roumania. An opportunity soon offered, when, in 1918, a number of Roumanians who had taken refuge in Odessa were imprisoned by the Bolsheviks. Colonel Boyle undertook to obtain their release. He went by aeroplane to Odessa, and, tackling the Soviet Committee single-handed, by sheer force of character he secured its consent to his taking away the Roumanians. Their journey to Roumania was an Odyssey in itself, with the resourcefulness of the indomitable Boyle alone enabling them to escape alive. After the War, Colonel Boyle stayed on in Roumania, interesting himself in the oil industry. His health, however, had become seriously undermined. It was after a further spell of illness in England that he took a hurried journey to Batum for the purpose of securing the release of some Englishmen who had been arrested by the Bolsheviks in the Caucasus, but the men were released before he arrived. Colonel Boyle, in his younger days, had been a great athlete and a boxer: at a comparatively advanced age he could "put the weight" in championship form.

COLONEL W. H. NORMAN, D.S.O.

The death is reported from Poona of Colonel Walter H. Norman and Mrs. Norman. It is believed that their boat capsized in a sudden squall on Khadakwasla Lake, and both were drowned.

Colonel Walter Henry Norman, D.S.O., who was born in 1871, joined the Indian Army in 1891. He saw service with the China Expedition in 1901 as A.D.C. to the Commander, and accompanied the Indian Expeditionary Force to Mesopotamia, where he remained from 1916 to 1919. In June, 1920, he was appointed Brigade Commander in the Indian Southern Command.

ARMENIAN RELIEF.

The Armenian Red Cross and Refugee Fund has just published its eighth annual report for 1922. Contributions to the amount of £1,962 7s. 3d. were received during the year, bringing the total of the fund to nearly £30,000. The money collected has been expended on such items as materials for the workroom at Erivan, quinine and linen for the Erivan Hospital, condensed milk for Constantinople, relief work at Aleppo, Athens, Sofia, etc., etc. The aim of the fund is to help Armenians to help themselves, and the committee entreats the public generously to support its efforts for Armenian sufferers a little longer. Parcels of garments for refugees will be thankfully received and acknowledged if addressed to the Hon. Secretary, Armenian Ladies' Guild, 47a, Redcliffe Square, London, S.W.10. Contributions and all letters relating to the fund should be addressed to the Hon. Secretary, Miss Emily J. Robinson, 35a, Elsham Road, London, W.14.

The Near and Middle East.*

From Our Own Correspondents.

Cairo, April 12.

The Death of the Earl of Carnarvon.

The cables duly reported to you the death of the Earl of Carnarvon, which occurred on April 5. The fatal issue to his illness came as a surprise, for right up to the very last he showed signs of recovery, and, in fact, on the last day felt so much better that the doctor acceded to his request to be shaved. Lord Carnarvon made a wonderful fight for his life, and to the surprise of the doctors repeatedly rallied in a manner which spoke volumes for his powers of resistance. He passed away peacefully in the presence of Lady Carnarvon, Lord Porchester (his son, who had arrived but three days previously from India), and his daughter, Lady Evelyn Herbert, who bore, in a manner commanding universal admiration, the brunt of the first fortnight of his illness.

The news of his death was followed by a remarkable demonstration of sympathy. Messages from all parts poured in, including telegrams from the King, Queen Alexandra, Prince George, and the Queen of the Belgians. In Egypt also there was widespread expression of sympathy, and the callers at the Continental-Savoy Hotel included all the leading members of the British and foreign communities, as well as prominent Egyptians. Indeed, one may say that his death is mourned by the Egyptian community as much as by his fellow-countrymen, and the vernacular Press has more than made amends for the unfortunate personal attacks made on him three months ago by generous tributes to his friendship for Egypt and his self-sacrificing work in the cause of Egyptological science. After the first bitter attacks which were made in January and February, those responsible appeared to realise how baseless were their allegations and how ungenerously they were repaying a man who had throughout been such a friend. It is a satisfaction to find that they have at last made the amende honorable, but at the same time it is sincerely to be regretted that they did not do so during his lifetime.

While Lord Carnarvon's death has necessarily held up the work in the Valley of the Kings, there is no reason to believe that it will interfere with the completion of the investigation of the tomb of King Tutankhamen and all that it contains. Mr. Howard Carter is returning next week to the Valley, where Messrs. Mace, Lucas, Burton, and Callender have been carrying on in his absence, and have made considerable progress with the treatment and packing up of the objects removed from the ante-chamber. The work will, in fact, be continued during the next seasons, and be carried to completion as a fitting memorial to the Earl of Carnarvon.

Matters Political.

There is little to report on the political side. The draft Constitution is being carefully examined by a Committee of "Five," appointed from the midst of the Cabinet by the Prime Minister, and it is understood that the whole of the Cabinet is about to take the matter in hand. The Indemnity Bill is also under examination.

Departure of Prominent Residents.

The British community has had to deplore the departure of Archdeacon Horan, who last Saturday left for England on his retirement from the chaplaincy of All Saints, which he had held since February, 1915. The Bishop in his monthly letter in the diocesan magazine pays a warm tribute to the work done by Archdeacon Horan and to the great assistance given him by Mrs. Horan and Miss Dorothy Hall; and before their departure a pleasing little ceremony took place at the Residency, where Lord Allenby handed the retiring chaplain a handsome cheque subscribed by his admirers in the Anglican community.

The community has also had to deplore the departure of Lieut.-General Sir Walter Congreve, who, with Lady Congreve, left early in the week in order to take up the Southern Command in England. Sir Walter Congreve has been in command of the British troops in Egypt and Palestine since the summer of 1919, when he succeeded Lieut.-General Sir E. S. Bulfin. He has had an exceedingly exacting and busy term of office, not only in the matter of the demobilisation and the transformation of his command from a war to a peace footing, but also in regard to the administration of martial law.

Sir Walter, however, has contrived to handle the situation with great ability and success, and both he and Lady Congreve, who admirably seconded him on the social side, gained the affection and esteem of the military and civil elements of the British community, as well as the foreign and Egyptian communities, by all of whom their departure is greatly regretted.

Successful Gilbert and Sullivan Production.

The C.A.D.M.S. or, to give it its full name, the Cairo Amateur Dramatic and Musical Society, scored another great success last week when it produced Gilbert and Sullivan's "Gondoliers" at the Royal Opera House. The performance, which was given on six successive evenings and at a matinée, went with a swing and without a single hitch on each occasion, and the performers received repeated ovations from enthusiastic audiences.

The parts of Gianetta, Casilda, and Tesso—the leading feminine rôles—were ably filled by Miss Georgina Fischer, Mrs. Hugh Henson, and Mrs. Dabell. Mrs. A. P. Bolland was an admirable Duchess of Plaza Toro, and Mrs. St. John Diamant gave an excellent representation of the thankless rôle of Inez. Mr. W. Hayes has before now delighted us with his beautiful voice, and his singing of the part of Luiz came quite up to our expectations. Messrs. Burrell and Turner were very successful in the rôle of the two Gondolier heroes, while Major Leslie and Mr. Trimen as the Duke of Plaza Toro and Don Alhambra Del Bolera rose magnificently to the opportunities which those two parts gave them for displaying their histrionic and comedian talents. It was, as I have said, a pronouncedly successful performance, and not the least contribution to this success was the finished work of the chorus. The whole production reflects the greatest credit on the C.A.D.M.S. and on their producer, Mr. Lewis Cowan, to whose able direction the audience rightly paid tribute.

GREECE.

Athens, April 14.

The Prisoners' Return.

The Greek military prisoners have returned. Ragged and half-dead from maltreatment, starvation, and exposure, they look more like phantoms than soldiers of a once triumphant army. It is said that one member of the International Red Cross Commission who returned from Smyrna with the prisoners remarked, "I have never before seen skeletons walk." "It was no doubt the pitiful sight that these men presented that prompted the revolutionary leader, Colonel Plastiras, to remind them that they must avenge the deaths of their brothers and the destruction of their own lives and homes. "You," said Colonel Plastiras, addressing a number of the returned prisoners, "must retain in your hearts more than any other Greeks the holy fire of just indignation and revenge."

The Greek Government has protested to the Powers against the inhuman treatment of the Greek prisoners, and the Greek Red Cross has requested the International Red Cross to send representatives to Asia Minor to assist and protect the remaining prisoners who will not be released until the signature of peace.

The Serbian Free Zone.

Very little, if any, progress has been made in the negotiations between Yugoslavia and Greece with regard to the Serbian free zone at Salonika. Yugoslavia's reply to Greece's last counter-proposals has now been received and handed to the Foreign Office. The latter has reserved its reply until the Foreign Minister, M. Alexandris, who is now abroad, returns to Athens.

In its reply, King Alexander's Government states that it cannot see its way to make any concessions, but insists that Greece should carry out the terms laid down in the convention. The Yugoslav Minister in Athens, M. Baloudgchitch, complained bitterly to your correspondent of the unreasonable attitude adopted by Greece in the matter, and added that, although Yugoslavia had done her very best to support the Greek claims during the recent conference at Lausanne, Greece now refuses to assist her in a matter which is of vital importance to the Yugoslav nation. His Excellency added that an area of over 80,000 square miles inhabited by nearly 5,000,000 people depended entirely on Salonika for its commerce.

The Greek papers say that on his way back to Athens M. Alexandris will stay for a day or two in Belgrade for the express purpose of discussing the question with the Yugoslav Government. As the Greek Foreign Minister has, it is understood, talked things over with M. Venizelos in Paris, it is quite likely that he will be in a position to give a definite and, it is hoped, a favourable reply to the Yugoslavs.

The Foreign Missions.

Continuing its policy of strict economy, the Greek Government has decided to dispense with the services of the various foreign missions in Greece, granting them six months' pay in lieu of notice. Thus the British Naval, the French Military, and the Italian Gendarmerie Missions are leaving this country at the end of April. Several members of the British Naval Mission have already returned to England. The only mission which will now remain in Greece is the British Police Mission, under Sir Frederic Halliday, which is reorganising the Greek City Police on the lines of the London City Police. Sir Frederic and the two officers assisting him have been working extremely hard during the last four years. The ignorant and brutal city gendarme of five years ago has disappeared completely, and Athenians are to-day proud of their polite and highly efficient "Robert."

By dispensing with the services of the three foreign missions the Government estimates that over 40,000,000 drachmæ will be saved annually. The expenditure for the British Mission alone amounted to about £40,000 per annum.

Deported Bulgarians.

To the Bulgarian representative, who protested to the Greek Government against the deportations to the interior of Greece and to the island of Crète of a number of Bulgarians from Thrace, the Prime Minister, Colonel Gonatas, pointed out that these deportations had not been ordered by the Government, but by the Commander-in-Chief of the army in Thrace. The Greek High Command possessed proofs that those deported had been co-operating with the komitajis in blowing up railways and bridges. These activities, however, had ceased entirely now. The Premier assured the Bulgarian representatives that all the deported will be allowed to return to their homes when peace is signed and the army demobilised.

Miscellaneous News.

Greek Independence Day was celebrated as usual on March 25. A service was held at the Cathedral in the presence of the King, the Queen, the members of the Cabinet, and the Diplomatic Corps.

The centenary of Ernest Renan was celebrated on the Acropolis in the presence of thousands of people. King George and the French Minister were also present. The Minister of Education, Dr. Siotis, gave a short address on Renan's "La prière sur l'Acropole," which poem was subsequently recited by Madame Koula Zervou, who was draped in ancient Greek costume. At the end of the ceremony Dr. Siotis offered to the French Minister a branch of the sacred olive-tree to be laid on Renan's tomb. This olive-tree, which is on the Acropolis, is supposed to be the very tree which over 2,000 years ago supplied the olive-branches presented to the victors of the Olympic Games.

The officers of the British Naval Mission have contributed 30,000 drachmæ towards the fund raised for the families of the victims of the recent naval disaster.

The American Red Cross will discontinue its work in Greece after June 30. The American Near East Relief Organisation will, however, carry on.

Constantinople, April 17.

Long-Drawn Suspense.

There has been a feeling in the air during the past week that the political situation has taken a turn for the worse. Whether this is due to the split in the Nationalists' ranks and a certain anxiety as to the outcome of the forthcoming elections, to the atmosphere of indefiniteness and uncertainty attaching to the next Lausanne Conference, or to the fact that the protracted suspense in regard to the general situation, as to whether, after all, we are destined to have peace or further trouble in the Near East, has accentuated the commercial dry rot and brought many a business house and private merchant one step nearer to bankruptcy, it is difficult to say. One thing is certain—that the combination of these factors has tended to depress business yet further, and to make one rather pessimistic as to the immediate future. Hotel and restaurant keepers, cinema proprietors, and even club managers are asking the question: "Where is everybody; why is the place so empty?" and are receiving the same answer: "Nobody has any money."

If such is the state of affairs in the great town and trading port of Constantinople on the eve of the second Peace Conference, it requires but little mental calculation to foretell what will be the position, should the Turkish delegates return from Lausanne for the second time without having signed the Treaty of Peace, or if, for one reason or another (to use the phrase especially associated with Constantinople in connection with her threatened upheavals), nothing happens. That nothing will happen for a considerable time; that one is yet a long way off from the ratification of peace; and that the Allies, or, at least, one of the Allies will have to remain in peaceful occupation for some time yet in order to save Turkey from her friends has for long been the conviction of many; and certainly recent happenings in Angora have not been such as to cause those who hold this view to change their opinions.

Teaching the Young Idea.

The personality of Mustapha Kemal Pasha has yet a great hold on the Turkish rank and file. All public patriotic demonstrations and propaganda here centre round the name of the Nationalist leader. Even as Kemal Pasha dons the kalpak (or plain black astrachan fez), so all patriotic Turks, as well as those who desire to be classed as such, are now adopting this form of headgear in place of the red fez with the black silk tassel. Much importance, moreover, is attached to-day to the training of the young idea in the paths of nationalism and hero-worship. Smart bodies of Turkish Boy Scouts are frequently to be seen marching through the streets of Pera, preceded by a band, with the leaders of each platoon carrying a Turkish flag—well-dressed and well-groomed, and stepping it out proudly to the time of the bugle and the kettledrum.

To-day, on a visit up the Bosphorus, I was the interested spectator, through the railings of a Turkish school playground, of the physical training by a male instructor of some fifty or sixty small Turks, boys and girls, whose ages ranged from about 6 to 12. These juvenile Nationalists were being put through many of the physical "jerks" in vogue in the British Army to-day. Not the least interesting item was the march past in different formations to the accompaniment of a National song sung by the performers. If one did not sing lustily enough, he or she was taken out and reprimanded. It was a simple sing-song tune, embodying the frequent repetition of the words "Musta-pha-Kem-al-Pash-a." Judging from the faces of the youngsters as they marched round, this was the most popular of the day's exercises.

Of the Making of Laws.

The gradual publication in the Official Journal for the town of Constantinople of the text of the various laws passed by the National Assembly calls attention to the activities of this body in the matter of legislation. Up to the end of January fifty-six laws had been published, representing the legislation of a period of seven months only, from April 24 to November 27, 1920. A feature of all the laws is their brevity, coupled with the absence of legal phraseology. Turkey is no exception to the rule that no laws are perfect, and much of the feverish output issuing from Angora will, it is to be hoped, prove subject to amendment to meet changing conditions or to conform with the promptings of fuller knowledge. Turkey is essentially in a transition state; there are a number of earnest and enlightened Turks working for their country's regeneration against ignorance, reaction, and social revolution, and a number of new laws and amendments to old laws are reasonable and sound so far as intentions go. But the majority bear evidence of hasty construction—drafted to meet emergencies as they have arisen—and of having been passed by a Parliament whose members have made no attempt to acquaint themselves with the probable effects of the laws or to understand thoroughly the problem for which they are legislating. Consequently, in the case of Constantinople, we have had a series of laws made applicable to the city, and then their actual application has been postponed and the law has been referred back to Angora for modification. The two most notable instances have been the Temettu Law (earned income-tax) and the Prohibition Law. In regard to the latter, the Public Debt Administration has been obliged to point out that, as the large revenues derived from the duties on alcoholic liquors form part of the revenue of the Administration ear-marked for the repayment of the Debt, no action should be taken until the whole question of Turkey's financial position and responsibilities has been decided upon by the Peace Conference.

According to the latest news received from Persia, states the Daily Telegraph, the entire Press of that country is now controlled by agents of the Moscow Soviet. There is not a single independent organ left, and the tone of all the newspapers is violently anti-British.

Turkey According to Talaat.

The April number of Blackwood's Magazine has an interesting article on Talaat Pasha by the Hon. Aubrey Herbert, M.P. Colonel Herbert met Talaat Pasha by arrangement in February, 1921, at Hamm. On the principle that in such a town the two together were as conspicuous as a monument, they adjourned to Düsseldorf, and in this article Colonel Herbert summarises a number of conversations which he had with the ex-Grand Vizier. What Talaat proposed amounted to an Anglo-Turkish alliance. Though he was not in power at the moment, he declared that his proposals would be acceptable to those who were, and their acceptance would bring peace both to Great Britain and to Turkey. If Turkey was to be saved, he maintained, she must be joined to civilisation. Talaat continued:—

Before the war I was anxious that England should be her teacher; you will remember that, and my proposals about Lord Milner. Well, England refused, and the war came; then, quite frankly, I looked to Germany in victory to do what we had once hoped for from England. For I believed that Germany would win the war. In that belief we signed a treaty with Germany one month before war was declared. Germany has not won; we have all been defeated. The house that we had has been burnt to the ground, but that house was badly built: it was full of draughts, and it was not sanitary. We still possess the site upon which it stood. Our geography is a fortress to us—a very strong fortress. Our mountains are the strongest of our forces. You cannot pursue us into the mountains of Asia; and stretching back into Central Asia are six republics, composed of men of our blood—cousins, if not brothers, and united now by the bond of misfortune.

The urgent need of Turkey was to be helped, and for this help he and his friends looked eagerly to Great Britain. But the Turks would not accept help at the price of financial or military servitude. He did not wish to exaggerate the strength of Turkey, but he thought that England ought not to under-rate it. Of Turkish propaganda in the East, he said that Turkey was pursuing a policy of enlisting as many people as she could against Great Britain, and undertaking all possible reprisals open to her. The trouble in India would cease automatically when Britain entered into friendly relations with Turkey. He was even prepared to go to India to this end himself. He added, laughing, "It is very unlikely that your Government would trust me. But if they did, I would guarantee to do my best."

Talaat discussed Bolshevism with acute dislike. There were many of his countrymen who hoped that Bolshevism would boil over the Russian border and go foaming into Europe, foreseeing salvation to Asia in a general European catastrophe. He was not one of those. He did not want a safety that came from ruins. He preferred to see an ordered Europe and a peaceful Turkey helped by Great Britain. But he would refuse to join an anti-Bolshevist alliance at the present moment when his country was at war. An alliance with the Bolsheviks was purely a matter of expediency, and Talaat went on to speak of the natural antagonism between the principles of Bolshevism and Islam. He maintained that Islam, though it was preached in the desert, was still compatible with civilisation, and could be adapted to modern needs. But, in common with all other religions, it could swiftly become intolerant in the hearts of fanatics. By their actions the Young Turks had shown that they did not intend to use pan-Islam as a weapon. He saw no future in the lifetime of the present generation for Turanianism, although Asiatics were drawing closer to each other. After references to Greece and the position in Europe generally, Talaat Pasha went on to say, "We are ready to make great concessions to achieve our object, which is peace and friendship with England. . . . If the British Government desire it, peace can be obtained immediately, and with it the development of Asia Minor. You can never achieve the partition of Turkey. England and Turkey are not industrial rivals, but customers who depend upon each other, and surely it is better for customers to be friends."

Colonel Herbert returned to London, where Bekir Samy Bey was negotiating with the British Government; Talaat returned to Berlin, where he was immediately murdered by a Persian Armenian. Colonel Herbert concludes his article as follows:—

Our interests lie together, and, whatever the reason may be, it is a fact that the Turk and the Englishman, in nine cases out of ten, get on with each other and like each other. We have been left the heirs of the incompetency of Mr. Lloyd George and his Government, and the Turks have inherited the legacy of hatred that recent years have bequeathed to them. But the Turks have a proverb, which those Englishmen who were sent out between the lines on the various occasions when an armistice was proclaimed during the war often heard. It became familiar to them between mounds of Turkish and British dead—"Eski dost Dushman olmaz" (an old friend cannot be an enemy). If we can convince the Turks that we have a similar sentiment here, the memory of recent quarrels may be forgotten in the recollection of a more ancient understanding.

The Position of Greece.

Under the title of "The Peril of Greece," Mr. Harold Spender tells in the Contemporary Review the story of his visit to Greece last autumn. He explains how the disaster of last September overtook Greece, and how consequently the Revolutionary Government came into being. This Government, he says, has no intention of restoring Parliamentary rule until peace and order are restored in the Near East. "If peace is restored, Greece agrees to revise its Constitution, but not till then, and they quote our own action in refusing to hold a General Election during the Great War." He then turns to the problem of the refugees, and suggests that "this deluge of afflicted humanity may yet draw Greece down into the gulf of ruin." Finally he turns to the relationship between Great Britain and Greece. He asks: "Has not the time almost come when Greece should be taken out of the cell of punishment into which Great Britain has thrown her? Or is this punishment to last for ever? May it not occur to some of us that the refrigeration of Greece has also a chilling effect upon the policy of England? That her isolation in the East spells isolation for us also? Or is it our object, both in the East and the West, all over the world, to seek after the making of enemies rather than the making of friends?"

The Westminster Gazette of March 28 contains an interview between Colonel Plastiras and Winthrop D. Lane. The leader of the Greek Revolution told the interviewer that the aim of the Revolution was to eliminate personal politics from Greek life. For this purpose the "Associations of National Salvation" had been organised throughout Greece. On the objects of these "Associations" Mr. Lane says:—

Vague though these objects are, one feels that here is a movement for the education of a people that is politically not very far advanced, a movement which, if successful, will mean much for peace in the Balkans. On the other hand, I have heard these "Associations of National Salvation" spoken of as being merely the basis of a new political machine, which is intended to re-elect the Revolutionary leaders when—and if—the elections are held. Colonel Plastiras further said that there was no evidence of a counter-revolutionary movement, and showed his faith in the Allies by declaring that Greece would do nothing without their co-operation.

THE CASPIAN NAVAL EXPEDITION.

Under the auspices of the Central Asian Society, on April 12, at the Royal United Service Institution, Captain David Norris, C.B., C.M.G., R.N., delivered a lecture upon "The British Navy in the Caspian, 1918-19," Sir Charles Monro being in the chair. Captain Norris, whose lecture was plentifully illustrated with lantern slides, explained in detail the conception of the Caspian expedition and its wonderful development. Fly-boats were taken from the Tigris overland to Enzeli—a process which, owing to the lack of petrol for the lorries, was extraordinarily difficult, and was carried through largely by camels—and in July, 1918, a party of two officers and twenty-two men found themselves at Enzeli, with the duty of guarding the gap between Baku and Krasnovodsk. Captain Norris's task, where it was a definite task, was to work in conjunction with the Dunsterville Force, which reached Baku in August. Meanwhile, the men, ships, and guns under the lecturer's command were steadily growing, until in the end he had about twelve hundred men and such a fleet as was able completely to frustrate Bolshevik activity in the Caspian. From Baku, where food was scarce and the caviare, though excellent, was disliked by the men, who called it "this 'ere ruddy fish jam," the Army and Navy had, partly owing to their own insufficient forces and partly owing to the fainéance of the local Armenians, in three weeks to retire. The Navy then set in earnest to build up a fleet, and the way in which Russian boats, merchant ships, tankers, and so on, were transformed, gunned, and made habitable, was vividly described. After the Armistice with Turkey, Baku was reoccupied, and a picture of the town as it was under General Thomson was humorously drawn.

Thereafter the Navy, aided by splendid assistance from the Air Force (which, the lecturer emphasised, was commanded by an officer who was both a seaman and an airman) and from the Army, appeared thoroughly to enjoy itself. With an advance base at Petrosk, they made inroads upon the Bolshevik base at Astrakhan, receiving for this purpose invaluable help from a Soviet official at Alexandrovsk. In a word, they completely bottled up the Bolsheviks in the mouth of the Volga. Captain Norris, who concluded with a testimony to the work of individual officers—Naval, Air, Army, and Medical—and to the cheeriness of all hands, said that this expedition was a striking demonstration of the harmonious way in which our three Services might be made to combine.

Subsequent to the lecture, which Sir Charles Monro described as portraying a wonderful achievement, almost like a fairy tale, Mr. F. H. Skrine, who knows the Caspian well, asked what was the whole point of the expedition, and how it was hoped from this distant sea, which was hundreds of miles away from our base in the Persian Gulf, to affect the main situation. This question was partly answered by General Sir Webb Gillman, who spoke next. He recounted some of the difficulties under which Captain Norris had to labour, paid very high tribute to his skill and to that of his successor (after the Commodore had met with an accident), and discounted the value of the help which G.H.Q. at Baghdad had been able to give. The scheme for blocking the gap from Baku to Krasnovodsk was apparently given from home, where people were in the habit of using very small-scale maps. Mr. Donald Mellor later suggested that the expedition saved the position in Persia, India, and Afghanistan.

EGYPT'S NEW CONSTITUTION.

The promulgation of the new Constitution is an important landmark in Egypt's history. A year ago the formal declaration of independence was of necessity hedged about with certain reservations, and a Constitution of the Egyptians' own devising was the essential preliminary to the making of that independence real and complete. The delay that has taken place—the draft Constitution left the Commission's hands over six months ago—has been almost exclusively Egypt's own affair. It is true that there has been a difference of opinion between Egypt and Great Britain over the status of the Sudan, but as a stumbling-block to the promulgation of the Constitution, it has played a minor part compared with the antagonism that manifested itself between the Crown and the people's representatives on far more fundamental points of the country's Charter. Two Ministries have fallen in the attempt to discover a compromise, and for a time it seemed as though Egypt, in the absence of Zaghloul Pasha, would have to confess herself so entirely bankrupt in statesmanship that there could be no alternative to a continuation of British supervision. The situation, however, has been saved by the present Prime Minister, Yehia Pasha, to whom considerable credit is due for having succeeded where others had been compelled to admit failure. At the same time we may hope that the acceptance by the Court party of the people's point of view implies genuine conversion from an untenable attitude. It would have been the acme of irony if Egypt had exchanged the benevolent and enlightened rule of Great Britain for a reversion to the type of despotism which had been the sole cause for British interference in Egyptian affairs forty years ago. The belief that the people are not ready for the full application of democratic principles does no discredit to the intelligence of those who hold it; but it is too late in the day to seek to give effect to this view in favour either of an oligarchy or an autocracy.

The issue between King Fuad and the politicians was the one familiar to the constitutional history of all countries—whether the King should control Parliament or Parliament the King. A further and distinctive feature of the conflict in Egypt turned on the King's relationship to the country's religious affairs. The basis of the compromise would seem to be that a little more latitude has been allowed to the Crown in regard to the latter than in the political sphere. In the matter of the Wakfs (religious institutions) and the nomination of ecclesiastical authorities, the King will exercise his powers in accordance with the law in existence at the time action is taken; in order words, the status quo remains in force unless specifically altered. The King is to be the sole fount of honour, but all his powers are exercised through his Ministers. He will nominate and dismiss diplomatic representatives, but only on the recommendation of the Minister for Foreign Affairs. Ministers are responsible to the Chamber of Deputies, which alone of the two Houses can be dissolved by the King. The attempt to give the Senate a nominated majority has failed; the King nominates the President and two-fifths of the members, the remaining three-fifths being elected for a period of ten years. One half of the Senate is to be renewed every five years. The Throne is hereditary in the family of Mehemet Ali, and King Fuad is no doubt well satisfied that the law regulating the liquidation of the estates of the ex-Khedive and restricting his rights should be confirmed in the Constitution with the proviso that it cannot be altered. The reference to the Sudan is non-committal. The present Constitution, it is declared, is applicable to the kingdom of Egypt without prejudice to the rights which Egypt has in the Sudan, and the title which the King of Egypt is to bear will be established after duly accredited negotiators have fixed definitely the status of the Sudan. In a covering letter addressed to King Fuad the Prime Minister points out that the clauses referring to the Sudan have been inserted in their present form as the result of the firm assurance given by the High Commissioner that the British Government has no desire to bring into discussion the rights which Egypt possesses in the Sudan or over the Nile waters.

Egypt's future is now in her own hands, to make or to mar, according to the measure of her own wisdom and ability or of her foolishness and inexperience. If any attempt is made to saddle Great Britain with responsibility for this or that state of her affairs, it will be on a par with the effort to represent the delay in the promulgation of the Constitution as being due to the British attitude on the subject of the Sudan; it will be, in other words, merely a device to distract attention from internal differences. None of the reserved points affects Egypt's capacity to look after herself and to work out her own salvation. Already, in expectation of wiser counsels in regard to the Constitution, a number of grievances have been removed. The military governorship of Cairo has been abolished; Zaghloul Pasha has been released from Gibraltar, and the arrested members of his party have been liberated. There is abundant evidence that the British Government desires nothing more eagerly than that all outstanding questions between it and the Egyptians should be adjusted amicably and quickly, in order that Egypt may settle down under the best possible auspices to the business that it has in hand. Yehia Pasha has expressed his conviction that Egypt "will again astonish the world by its rapid and complete adaptation of a Parliamentary régime." Nowhere will the hope that this view will prove correct be entertained more sincerely than in Great Britain; and if it is to be confirmed by the event, the Egyptians will need to concentrate all their powers on matters of practical statecraft and not dissipate the national unity of purpose by following the will-o'-the-wisp of foreign intrigue.

RAILWAYS IN IRAK.

(FROM OUR BAGHDAD CORRESPONDENT.)

In THE NEAR EAST of April 12 we published an article on the Irak Railways indicating both what had already been done by the Administration, and what remained to be done in the matter of suitable extensions in order to place the system on a commercial footing in contradistinction to its origin as a purely military railway. In the following article our Baghdad Correspondent gives the history of the Irak Railways, and shows how provision for the future is linked up with the question of the development of the country.

Before the War the only railway existing in Irak was the section of the German Baghdad Railway between Samarra and Baghdad, a short section of standard gauge completed just before the outbreak of hostilities. This line, with its rolling stock, fell into British hands shortly after the occupation of Baghdad in the spring of 1917.

In the earliest stages of the campaign in Irak the need for railways did not arise. The British force was small, and it had advanced only to Kurnah, where it could easily be supplied by river by means of the river steamers already in existence in the country. When, however, with the advance up the Tigris to and beyond Amarah and up the Euphrates to Nasiriyah, the size of the force increased very considerably, and the lines of communication became longer and more difficult, the need for railway communication to supplement the river craft became increasingly urgent. River communication was at the best of times difficult; between Ezra's Tomb and Amarah, on the Tigris, are the Narrows, very narrow and very shallow stretches, where boats cannot pass unless one banks in, and where the draft of vessels in low water season must not exceed 3 ft.; on the Euphrates, between Kurnah and Nasiriyah, is the Hammar Lake, where the Euphrates widens out into a shallow lake, the depth of which in low water season is as little as 1 ft. These natural difficulties were rendered more serious by the omission of the responsible authorities to supply the extra river steamers which the requirements of the larger forces demanded. Railway material was, therefore, demanded, and a beginning was made in the summer of 1916 with the construction of a railway from Basrah to Nasiriyah, which presented but few difficulties. After the first few miles from Basrah, where the line, running as it did across low-lying land liable to floods at high water season, had to be laid on a high embankment, the rails were laid for the most part on open desert, well above high flood level and necessitating little or no banking or cutting.

This line was quickly followed by the construction of a line along the Tigris, and in the spring of 1917 a metre gauge line was opened between Kurnah and Amarah, and was later, after the construction of the Euphrates bridge at Kurnah, extended southwards first to the new port at Nahr Umr and subsequently to Basrah, the lower branch of the Euphrates at Kurmat Ali being crossed on a pontoon bridge, which could be used by the railway only at certain states of the tide. The construction of the line from Kurnah to Amarah and to a smaller extent from Kurnah to Nahr Umr was by no means an easy undertaking. At the best there is but a narrow strip of land between the river and the marsh, and in many places even that narrow strip disappears. The line then passed for a considerable distance through the marsh, and throughout its entire length had to be raised up on a high embankment strongly riveted to prevent erosion, while the numerous streams connecting marsh and river made necessary the construction of a large number of bridges.

Immediately after the occupation of Baghdad a line was laid from Kut to Baghdad to avoid the long and difficult section of the Tigris between those places, while shortly afterwards the necessity of providing for the transport of the heavy stocks of grain in the Middle Euphrates area resulted in the prolongation of the Samarra-Baghdad standard gauge line to Hillah. Railway development then proceeded apace as the requirements of the forces expanded, and lines were constructed from Baghdad to Fallujah, on the Euphrates, and from Baghdad to the Persian frontier near Khani-kin, while the Baghdad-Samarra line was extended to Shergat in the direction of Mosul. Finally, it was decided to join Basrah and Baghdad by rail along the Euphrates route by linking up the two ends of the existing lines at Nasiriyah and Hillah and by converting to metre gauge the standard gauge section between Baghdad and Hillah. This was done, and trains began running in the spring of 1920. The service was not long maintained, however, as during the rising in the summer and autumn of 1920 a large portion of the line between Hillah and Nasiriyah was destroyed, and through running was suspended for several months. In order to find the material necessary for the completion of the Basrah-Baghdad line, the Basrah-Amarah line was dismantled, while at later dates the Baghdad-Fallujah and the Baghdad-Kut lines have been removed and branch lines have been built from the Baghdad-Persia line to Kifri in the direction of Kirkuk, and from the Baghdad-Hillah line to Hindiyah Barrage. This branch is now being extended across the Barrage to Kerbela.

The situation to-day is, then, that there exists a metre gauge line from Basrah to Baghdad, with branches from Ur Junction to Nasiriyah and from Mufrag to Hindiyah Barrage, and shortly to Kerbela; a metre gauge line from Baghdad to Khanikin, near the Persian frontier, with a branch from Karaghan to Kifri; and a standard gauge line from Baghdad to Shergat. Communication between the two metre gauge lines is maintained by means of a wagon ferry at Baghdad. The country is, therefore, well equipped with a skeleton railway system, from which extensions can be made whenever and wherever irrigation or other forms of development render such extensions profitable. As has been shown already, the railways were built during the War to meet military requirements, and, like most work undertaken by Government departments during wartime, little or no regard was paid to the question of expense. In many places the work was performed by organised labour corps recruited in India or Persia, the personnel of which was paid a high cash wage and received, in addition, free quarters, rations, and in some cases clothing. The technical and traffic staff was almost entirely British or Indian, and was much bigger than could possibly be employed if the lines were to be run on a commercial basis. It was largely the excess of this expensive imported staff which has produced the heavy deficits that have hitherto resulted from each year's working.

At the same time, however, it must be remembered that the lines were originally laid with old rails, obtained by taking up other lines in India, while the rolling stock was all second-hand. This meant that maintenance expenses and the cost of renewals have been very much heavier than would be the case under normal conditions. Some of the rolling stock has now been replaced, and in particular there have recently arrived in the country new first-class passenger coaches for use on the Basrah-Baghdad mail train, which are said to be as good as any coaches on any railway in the East. Much of it remains indifferent or bad, however, and until it is replaced by newer stock maintenance expenses must remain high. The rails on the main lines are, as a rule, good at present, as most of the old second-hand rails have been replaced by new ones.

Great efforts have been made by the Railway authorities during the past year to place the railways on a sound paying basis. Expenditure has been reduced by big reductions in staff and by economies in the use of stores, while at the same time an effort has been made to increase the receipts by overhauling the freight rates and by increases in the passenger fares. The result is that some sections, notably the Basrah-Baghdad section, are now paying their way. The heaviest losses are now being made on the standard gauge section between Baghdad and Shergat. This section of the line is of little or no commercial value, as it runs along the Tigris through an area which is almost entirely uncultivated. It serves to transport goods going upwards to Mosul, but goods coming downwards from Mosul can be carried more cheaply and with less handling by river. At the same time maintenance expenses on the Samarra-Shergat section are very heavy. This line was originally built only as a temporary measure for purely military reasons, and it was the intention of the Railway authorities to abandon it some time ago. For military reasons, however, and also in part in response to the representations of the people of Mosul, it was decided to continue to use the line; but its condition is such that the maintenance expenses are considerably higher than the receipts, and it is improbable that this section of the line can ever be made to pay. The most paying route for a railway to Mosul is through Kirkuk and Arbil by continuing the existing branch from the Baghdad-Persia line to Kifri. This route lies through fertile and well-cultivated country, and would serve to carry the timber and other products of the Kurdish hills. The construction of the line would, however, be expensive owing to the number of bridges which would be required.

Railway development in Irak can only be undertaken side by side with irrigation works. The trade of the country is at present at a very low ebb, and must remain so until the exports can in some way or other be increased. Agricultural development offers the most promising outlook, but is much hampered both by lack of funds for irrigation works, without which agriculture in Irak is very speculative, and by lack of population. The many people who refer optimistically to Irak as a land ripe for development, and speak of it as being likely to produce enormous crops, if only the money can be found for development works, are apt to forget or to overlook the fact that, even though development works could be put in hand at once, the population of the country is not nearly sufficient to take advantage of them, while the temper of the Government is such that it would oppose by every means in its power any suggestion that labour should be imported from abroad to assist the development of the country. The question of lack of population is one of the greatest problems which Irak has to face at the present time, and is a point which must be borne in mind by all who refer to any kind of development work here.

The immediate future of the railway system in Irak is anything but rosy. The railways are caught in a vicious circle. They cannot be made to pay unless trade improves considerably; trade cannot show much sign of improvement unless production and consequently exports increase, and production cannot increase without more population and without big expenditure on development work. At the same time it is uncertain what will happen to the railways. The British Government is unwilling to spend more money on them: the Irak Government is obviously unable to run them at a loss or to find the capital necessary for development work, and British companies are unwilling to take them over, unless interest is guaranteed by the British Government. This the latter will not do. The result is that the railways are in danger of being left to carry on as best they can, merely as far as their own resources will allow, only such sections being operated as will pay their running expenses. This would mean a retrograde step in the communications of the country.

Thirteen thousand employees in the Gouripur and Nuddea jute mills, at Naihati, near Calcutta, have gone on strike.

It is announced by the All-British Appeal that the difficulties raised by the Turkish authorities in regard to the payment of duty on the food supplies imported by the Near East Relief Association have not caused the cessation, but only a diminution, of their feeding plans. Further donations for the work are urgently solicited. They should be sent to General Buildings, Aldwych, London, W.C.2.

EGYPT UNDER THE FATIMID KHALIFS.

"A SHORT HISTORY OF THE FATIMID KHALIFATE." By Dr. Lacy O'Leary, D.D. (London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner and Co., Ltd. 10s. 6d. net.)

Dr. O'Leary's researches in ancient Arabic and Persian records serve to explain much that was obscure and enigmatic in the early Mohammedan conquests. At the dawn of the seventh century of our era Arabia was peopled by nomad tribes, to whom its deserts afforded scanty means of subsistence. An outlet for their surplus numbers was given by the simultaneous collapse of Rome and Persia, which had hitherto checked their expansion. These barriers once removed, it was an easy task for fierce warriors inspired by greed and religious zeal to found an empire on the ruins of their decadent neighbours. But conquest is one thing and assimilation quite another. The rude Arabs were profoundly influenced by their Persian subjects, who had drunk deeply from the wells of Greek philosophy. Arabic became a lingua franca throughout the realms of Islam; but the latter's spirit underwent a complete transformation. Sects arose without number, whose followers wandered far from the creed preached by Mohammed. The difference between their tenets was mainly concerned with succession to the Khalifate. Arabs held fast to the old tribal custom which enjoined that religious and temporal power should pass to a supreme chieftain chosen by an assembly of elders. Persians, on the other hand, were hypnotised by the age-long doctrine of metempsychosis. They believed, on insufficient grounds, that the daughter of the last Sassanian King had married Hussein, the son of Khalif 'Ali, who had espoused the Prophet's daughter Fatima. On this theory their descendants united the claims of Islam and the deified Kings of Persia. Seventh in descent from the Khalif 'Ali was Isma'il, from whom the Fatimid rulers of Egypt and Syria deduced their pedigree. Such was the bedrock dogma of the Shias of Fatimid Egypt and modern Persia; they hold 'Ali to have been the first Successor to the Prophet. Their bitter foes, the Sunnis, who were established in Ancient Baghdad, and now predominate throughout Islam, recognise three previous Khalifs in Abu-Bekr, Omar, and Othman. It seems passing strange that Islam should be rent with disputes regarding a matter of academic interest; but we must remember that Christians without number have fought and died for dogmas of equal importance.

From the welter of theological hatred the Isma'ilite sect emerged triumphant. It was ably organised by a leader named 'Abdullah Ben Maymun, who loathed the uncouth Arabs, and had a freethinker's contempt for Islam. He founded a vast secret society, which, by playing on human weaknesses and human passions, united the malcontents of every land against existing régimes. To this powerful sect the Fatimid pretenders were affiliated; and by its help they were able to found a Khalifate embracing Egypt, Syria, and Northern Africa, which lasted from 876 until 1168 A.D. Its annals reveal a succession of despots. A few of them were able rulers; but extravagance, caprice, intolerance and megalomania were salient characteristics of the dynasty. Of the sixth Fatimid Khalif, Al-hakim (996-1021 A.D.), Dr. O'Leary writes:—

One day Hakim was passing the Golden Baths, and heard a great deal of noise within. On making inquiry he found that there were women inside. He ordered the doors and windows to be walled up, and left the inmates to perish of hunger. The pretext given for these new regulations was the libertinage of Egyptian women.

Egyptians are apt to forget that their country's economic life hung on the vagaries of the Nile until the capricious river was tamed by British engineers. In 1081 A.D. a terrible famine was caused by the incidence of a cycle of "bad" Niles. Six years afterwards the ruin of the Delta was consummated by an irruption of Berber rebels, who destroyed its canals and embankments. In the city of Cairo a house could be bought for 20 lb. of flour, and even dogs commanded high prices. At length—

The people of Cairo were reduced to feeding on human flesh, which was even sold publicly in the streets. Wayfarers were waylaid in the lonelier streets, or caught by hooks let down from the windows, and devoured. As an inevitable result of this protracted famine plague broke out, whole districts were absolutely denuded of population, and house after house lay empty.

In the twelfth century of our era the Fatimid Khalifs were menaced by the advance of the Seljuk Turks, who, as fanatical Sunnis, were pledged to uproot Shia heresy; and by the advent of the first Crusaders. Ground by an upper and a nether millstone, they vanished from the page of history. Longer lived was the Isma'ilian sect which had installed them in power. Among its offshoots were the terrible "Assassins," who wrought such havoc in Islam, and a remnant survives in India in the Khojas, whose leaders have moulded Isma'ilian tenets to suit Hindu prejudice.

Dr. O'Leary's book is a faithful record of the results which flowed from unbridled despotism. If the Nationalists of our day were privileged to study it in their vernacular they could hardly fail to contrast the peace and plenty which they enjoy with the appalling misery which their forebears endured under Fatimid rule. "A CELLARFUL OF MEMORIES."

"BELOW THE SNOW LINE." By Douglas W. Freshfield. (London Constable. 18s. net.)

Speaking of the younger generation of mountain climbers, who like "to scramble rather than to ramble," Mr. Freshfield says "It is surely more prudent to lay down a cellarful of memories than a single bin." In this volume he draws upon his choice and varied memories, and invites us to join him. And with what exquisite memories he refreshes us—memories of some of those scrambles, climbs, and peeps into the Beyond, which were the gentler recreation of a conqueror of mountain giants. What is to be found in the book is best told in the words of the Preface. "The following selections from old records of travel . . . include some sub-Alpine wanderings under the shadow of Mont Blanc and the Bernina and two raids into the remote wilds of Japan and Uganda. But for the most part they are a bundle of memories of walks and climbs among the lesser ranges of the Old World, among the mountains of the Riviera, Corsica, Italy, Greece, Bosnia, and Algeria." He adds that, "with one exception, they have appeared, though considerably altered in form, in past volumes of the 'Alpine Journal.'" There is very little clue as to the dates when they were written.

To have had the inclination and the power to make these upward pilgrimages and to have appreciated keenly and intensely the final goal of beautiful sights and every smallest beauty passed upon the way, is to have possessed gifts to throw a radiance over life. But to have been able to store away and to share with others these beauties is something so much more as to leave us wondering and grateful before the flow of his clear and gracious prose.

What strikes us most in Mr. Freshfield's writing is the sense of balance and proportion that it conveys—it is as though everything were drawn exactly to scale, a panorama of Alps, a distant rocky coast, the detail of the hues of the different wild flowers. This perfect proportion, Mr. Freshfield's spirit of happy enthusiasm, and a knack of scholarly allusion and quotation combine to set before us pictures which are unforgettable in their vividness. It is not only landscapes which he can recreate, fresh in colour and detail, he can make us feel an atmosphere, so that for a moment we are fanned by a breath of the "dry pungent air" of Corsica, and presently we are pushing through the rain-soaked tangle of an African forest. The romance of Italy and of Greece distilled through the centuries steals out in fragrance from his pages.

Mr. Freshfield's attitude to life seems to have been that of the fairy tale hero who "sets out to look for adventures," an attitude which seems to us from our earliest childhood to be so eminently natural and right. This is the reason that he gives for a journey of exploration to the Kabyle Highlands: "But how came an old Alpine Clubman and his guide to have deserted the familiar playground, to be ending where the hero of Tarascon began? In the summer of 1885 I had chanced in a Normandy manor on the two charming volumes, 'Une Année dans le Sahel' and 'Un Été dans le Sahara,' by the French painter, Fromentin. They had renewed in me the longing for primitive life, bright colours, and large horizons." These chapters, telling as they do of their author's dealings with mountain peaks, with wooded valleys, and with flowery stretches, do not contain much of human company. But what there is is worth keeping—from the priest of San Nicolo, who was "le plus pauvre curé" that François Dévonassond, the guide, had ever met with, and who was so charming in his kindly courtesy, to the Kaid of Tiflit with his hospitality and his Homeric greeting. Mr. Freshfield writes as one who has enjoyed to the full and with a light heart both the beauty that can be sought for and found in the grandest aspects of Nature and that which has been stored from the minds of men in books. We recommend this book to those who are familiar with the parts of which Mr. Freshfield writes, to those who will be helped by his descriptions and advice to become familiar with them, and to those who, unable to stray from more prosaic spots, will be, in a measure, transported to them by the magic of his words.

CONDITIONS IN GREECE.

A correspondent, writing from Athens at the end of March, says:—

There are so many people in England who take a personal interest in Greece and Greek affairs that it may be worth while to try to bring home to them by means of personal details an idea of what conditions in this country now are.

A labourer's wage is 50 dr. a day, an artisan earns from 60 to 70 dr.; but for one reason or another a workman averages hardly more than three working days a week. Now for prices, in drachmæ per oke, i.e., 2½ lb.: Brown bread 4, white bread 7, meat 36-40, fish 25 (of an eatable quality 36-40), vegetables 3.80, oil 28, sugar 28, beans, lentils 12-14, cooking butter 84, tinned milk 16, tea 180, coffee 88. The cheapest boots for a labourer cost 250 dr.; his drill suit will cost 150 dr., a cheap "Sunday" suit 800 dr. It will be seen what life means for the less fortunate.

Speculation in exchange would seem to be the main "industry" at the present time, all the streets in the neighbourhood of the Stock Exchange being thronged continuously.

Disease is rife, consumption having made appalling inroads upon the people. It is a sign of the times that the general attitude towards this state of affairs should be that it will be correspondingly better for the survivors. In my own particular branch of work, which is concerned with disabled soldiers, 80 per cent. of the men are found to be consumptive. I have tried to obtain official statistics for the country as a whole, but everyone is working under such pressure and in such chaotic conditions that statistics are not being kept, or at least they never reach the central authorities. Sanatoria and sanitary legislation are imperatively needed to deal with the situation.

NOTES AND NEWS.

London, Tuesday Morning.

Lausanne and After.

We have been disappointed so often over the peace negotiations with Turkey that the reopening of the Lausanne Conference is not likely to call forth any undue optimism, especially in view of the fact that the position has been complicated by the Chester Concession. So far as can be gathered, Great Britain is not likely to be vitally affected by this development, but there is no question as to the effect on France's relations with Turkey, and much will depend on what the Turks are willing to offer our Ally in exchange for the concession of which she has been deprived. It is possible to draw a hopeful conclusion as to the prospect of a satisfactory compromise from an interview given to the Matin by Ismet Pasha, in the course of which he stated that Turkey was a large place, and wanted everyone's assistance, and that there would be no difficulty in finding plenty of other concessions for those in a position to take them up. If that indicates the considered policy of the Angora authorities, the outlook is distinctly more promising, but it is necessary to point out that, if Turkey really desires foreign assistance there will have to be an entire reversal of the methods that have been pursued. The decision of so many British insurance companies to leave Constantinople is only one indication of the results of the policy so far pursued by Angora.

Foreign Samples.

The announcement by Colonel Buckley, the new Minister in charge of the Department of Overseas Trade, that it has been decided, with a view to economy, to remove the Foreign Samples Exhibition from 9-11, Old Bailey, to Old Queen Street, will probably surprise quite a number of people who were not aware that the Samples Exhibition was still being held in Old Bailey. Of the utility of the exhibition there is not a vestige of doubt, but without the requisite publicity an enterprise of this kind cannot achieve the desired results, and beyond a line in the official weekly journal giving the address of the exhibition, it would not appear that much, if anything, has been done in recent months to persuade the London business man to visit it. With its removal to the headquarters of the Department it is to be hoped that steps will be taken to remedy this.

Egyptian Hotels Amalgamation.

Much interest has been aroused by the news of the coming amalgamation of the two chief hotel companies in Egypt—the Egyptian Hotels and the Grand Hotels of Egypt. The managing director of the Egyptian Hotels, Mr. Charles Baehler, has recently visited this country to arrange the details of the amalgamation, which has for its objects the effecting of economies and the reduction of charges to tourists. The new company, which, it is understood, will be entitled the Grand Hotels of Egypt, Limited, will control twelve hotels.

Cotton Growing in the Empire.

In a report on cotton-growing in India, Mr. W. H. Himbury points out that India has problems as regards cotton growing peculiarly its own. It is the American type of cotton that is required by Lancashire, but this is not in favour with the growers because of the length of time it takes to mature, and Desi and other Indian cottons of a short staple are more popular. The real question, Mr. Himbury states, "is primarily: Can cotton of a type equal to American be grown in large quantities economically, and, if so, what parts are the most suitable for its cultivation?" In the latter connection Mr. Himbury was very favourably impressed by the possibilities presented in the Punjab and Sind, and he points out that a type or types of cotton have been evolved which may be considered quite satisfactory for a start. There is, however, the competition of Desi to be overcome, but Mr. Himbury remarks that everything is not in favour of Desi, for when that type gets a set-back in the early stages, the crop is permanently affected, but this is not so with the American type. In Mr. Himbury's view, India can, and will, produce a good quantity of cotton 1 1-16 in. to 1 1/8 in., and his hopeful conclusion is that "if the business is properly tackled, in five years India should produce six million bales of cotton, two million of which should have a staple of 1 1-16 in. against the present production of five million bales, not quite half a million of which come under the higher class."

Cigarette Making in Persia.

While cigarette making is an industry of no little importance in the Teheran district, it is so far carried on entirely by hand, though the number of cigarettes turned out is in the neighbourhood of two million per week. Here, if anywhere, there should be a promising opening for cigarette machinery, but the fact that there is at present no machinery is not due to lack of enterprise on the part of manufacturers, but to the fact that the machines that have been submitted have been too complicated for the Persian work-people. Royal Exchange Assurance Results.

A very satisfactory report is forthcoming from the Royal Exchange Assurance for the past year. In the case of the three principal profit-earning departments, fire, accident, and marine, the transfers to profits are much in advance of those of the previous year, the respective figures being £202,021, £121,380, and £75,000, as compared with £80,776, £75,341, and £60,000. The total profits from the fire, marine, accident, and trustee and executor departments amounted to £401,058, and of this total, income-tax, corporation profits tax, and excess profits duty absorbed £157,653. After transferring £50,000 to the fire fund, £50,000 to the accident fund, strengthening the staff pension fund by £20,000, and making a grant of £10,000 to the widows' and orphans' (staff) fund, the balance of the account is £1,015,413. The total assets are now £11,371,322. The directors recommend a final dividend of 11 per cent., which will make 18 per cent. for the year, as compared with 16 per cent. for 1921.

Cotton at the Exhibition.

Without a comprehensive cotton exhibit the British Empire Exhibition could not be regarded as complete, and it is satisfactory to know that an exhibit showing samples of the different types of cotton produced in the Empire is to be organised by the Federation of British Industries in conjunction with the British Cotton Growing Association and the Liverpool and Manchester Cotton Associations. As the Sudan and other cotton growing centres will also be well represented, cotton will play its full part in the Exhibition.

In 1922 some 300 kilogrammes of gold were obtained from Czecho-Slovakia's mines, 200 from those at Roudny, and 100 from those at Stavnica, in Slovakia, which are in the possession of the State. The average price of gold during the past year was Kc.22,000 per kilogramme. The silver mines at Pribram produced 25,000 kilogrammes of silver, and those of Stavnica and Kremnice upwards of 3,000. The price of silver was about Kc.800 per kilogramme. The output of lead was 2,000 tons at Pribram and 200 tons at Stavnica and Kremnice.

COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY.

GREECE.

Athens, April 14.

The Country's Position.

Speaking at the Commercial Congress recently held at Rome on the present and future commercial and financial situation in Greece, M. P. Vourloumis, the Greek representative, stated that Greece looked with full confidence to the future. He said:—

Despite a war that lasted ten years, the economic condition of Greece is not as bad as many people imagine. The imports, which in 1915 amounted to 347 million drachmæ for Old Greece, in 1919 reached 2,334 million drachmæ, and 3,827 million drachmæ during the first ten months of 1921. The difference between the imports and the exports, which was 1,467 million drachmæ in 1920, was reduced to 778 millions in 1921 and to 267 millions during the first ten months of 1922. Deposits in the National Bank of Greece, which only amounted to 167 millions in 1910, attained 828 millions in 1918 and 2,098 millions in 1922. Remittances from the Greeks of America amounted to 65,000,000 from 1919-1921.

As regards the Greek merchant fleet, this before the war was represented by 965,000 tons. Although 550,000 tons were lost during the war, the losses then sustained have now been made good, and the total tonnage of Greek shipping to-day has exceeded the pre-war figures, practically reaching 1,000,000 tons. The importation of coal has been reduced considerably during the last ten years. Whereas in 1914 447,000 tons of coal were imported from abroad, the quantity imported in 1918 only amounted to 14,000 tons. This enormous decrease is principally due to the increase in the production of Greek lignite, which in 1914 amounted to 22,000 tons, reaching 213,000 tons in 1918.

Referring to the depreciation of the drachma, M. Vourloumis said that was due to psychological factors, such as the reverse in Asia Minor, the evacuation of Eastern Thrace, and the prevailing uncertainty with regard to the future. Large sums amounting to about 1,000,000,000 golden francs have been exported from the country and deposited in foreign banks. As soon as the situation became more settled all that money, he was certain, would come back to Greece.

Miscellaneous.

During March 496 steamers entered the port of Piræus, of which 354 were Greek, 51 British, 40 Italian, 11 French, 9 German, 8 Dutch, 5 Roumanian, 4 American, 4, Norwegian, 3 Swedish, 3 Russian, 2 Bulgarian, 1 Japanese, and 1 Georgian.

The receipts of the Piræus Customs House during March amounted to 47,927,104 drachmæ, as compared with 13,807,779.40 during March, 1922. The increase is largely due to the augmented taxes and the depreciation of the drachma.

PERSIAN MARKET FOR TYRES.

Throughout the whole of Persia there are no more than 812 automobiles of all descriptions (says an American Consular report). About half the passenger cars use metric clincher tyres. Dunlop tyres lead in popularity, the Spencer-Moulton, Avon, French Michelin, the Australian Barnett-Glass, and four American makes are also on sale. Car owners buy on an average of four and one-half tyres per each year. No particular preference is indicated for cord tyres, but red inner tubes are preferred. The few motor trucks used have solid tyres. Motor-cycle tyres of European origin only are sold, the sizes being 26 by 2½ and 28 by 3.

COTTON GROWING IN INDIA.

A REPORT BY MR. W. H. HIMBURY

(General Manager of the British Cotton Growing Association).

We give below the concluding portion of the report of Mr. W. H. Himbury, general manager of the British Cotton-Growing Association, on the position with regard to cotton-growing in India, in which he embodies the results of his investigations during his recent tour.

To sum up the position generally, India being already a large cotton-producing country, the real question to be decided is, primarily, can cotton of a type equal to American be grown in large quantities economically, and if so, what parts are the most suitable for its cultivation? This question cannot be dealt with straight off, evidence for and against having to be carefully weighed. The real trouble in India is that there is a short growing season which is largely against those types which are of longer growth in maturing. When Indian cotton is being produced nine months out of twelve in India there is always some trouble. As, for example, in rain-grown areas the rains are not well distributed; in others, after a few months, serious insect pests appear; and in the irrigated areas north there are frosts, so that generally the season is a short one, and this is the main reason Desi and other Indian cottons of a short staple are more certain and more popular with the cultivator. In view of this fact, one has to choose the district likely to prove the most favourable, and naturally one turns one's attention to the irrigated areas of the Punjab and Sind, the only real trouble being the advent of frost; but by very careful selection and breeding the Agricultural Departments have evolved a type or types which may be considered quite satisfactory for a start. The first is known as 4F, and the others 285F and 289F. The last two arrived after the 4F, and are an improvement.

Having decided upon the type, there are still a few other difficulties to be got over. We have a competitor in Desi, which gives a large yield per acre, from 25 per cent. to 30 per cent. more Kapas, and a higher ginning percentage plus a shorter growing period, which even in the Punjab is important, because the farmers, instead of using the last watering for their cotton, can use it for sowing the early winter wheat, and this is not possible with the American type. Everything, however, is not always in favour of Desi, because should the type get a set-back in the early stages the crop is permanently affected, but with American this is not so; owing to its later flowering and fruiting, it has been known to give a good second or third picking, whilst the native early type has failed, so that here you have a point distinctly in favour of American. Another factor against the American is the difficulty the grower has to get any improvement in the price paid for his seed cotton, and yet again very little of the improved cotton actually reaches the spinner unadulterated, so that he is quite unacquainted with the type which can be grown, otherwise he might be inclined to pay a higher price for it. Again, you meet with people, sometimes merchants or spinners, who do not want improved cottons; they use the present short types, and are afraid of their supplies. One might find a similar feeling amongst certain sections of the trade in England if a campaign was started to grow all long-stapled cotton of the Egyptian variety, so that this criticism has to be listened to and answered. Nevertheless, after a very careful survey of the whole question, and judging from what I have seen myself and heard from reliable authorities, I believe India can and will produce a good quantity of cotton of 1 1-16 in. to 1 1/2 in., and that the most suitable areas will be the Punjab and Sind. Of course, the Central Provinces or Madras Presidency will do a good deal, but the Punjab is larger and more certain. Here you already have ten million acres of land under canal irrigation, one of the largest areas in the world, and this is being added to immediately, the work being in progress, so that shortly a further million acres will be available for cotton, wheat, etc. Irrigation in the Punjab is giving the Government a good profit, in spite of a low water rate, which could stand, if necessary, an increase. In addition, you have an area in Sind which, if provided with water by barrage, would give a further half-million acres of cotton land suitable for growing the best type of American.

What is required in India to produce a large and increasing supply of the better staple is (1) continued experiments by experts to produce still more prolific and earlier maturing cotton; (2) the seed of the present types to be kept pure until such time as something better can take its place; (3) the grower should receive a price more in accord with the real value of his product; (4) something must be done to prevent the mixing of the American seed cotton with the Desi at the ginnery or whilst in the merchants' hands. Mixing is openly done; no secret is made of it, but the effect is harmful in the extreme. The formation of the Indian Central Cotton Committee is most opportune. I feel sure it will do good work. It is composed of able and representative men. I hope, however, they will not mind a suggestion, and that is: always to keep in mind the very great necessity for augmenting the staff of the Agricultural Departments by adding to it men with first-class knowledge who can devote their time to cotton, as with the economy axe at work and the Indianisation of the Services this is more necessary than ever. They should also pay attention to the marketing, so that the grower gets his money for the better article, and some real effort must be made to stop the scandal of mixing with inferior cottons.

Finally, the problems, whilst difficult, are not incapable of solution, and I am optimistic enough to say that if the business is properly tackled in five years India should produce six million bales of cotton, two million of which should have a staple of 1 1-16 in., against the present production of five million bales, not quite half a million of which come under the higher class.

THE SKIN TRADE OF ADEN.

The trade in skins through Aden during the year 1922 showed a considerable increase as compared with the previous year (says an American Consular report). The increase in imports alone amounted to over 540,000 skins. This trade was particularly active towards the end of the year, when prices reached a point unheard of in the history of Aden. Among the chief contributors to the large imports are the Red Sea ports, which sent in 1,875,600 skins; Jibuti, which sent 1,248,740 skins; and Somaliland, which accounted for 815,780 skins. At the present time trade in skins is steady, and, although prices have somewhat decreased, they are still higher than they were in the boom year 1919. Purchases are being made whenever skins are available, and it seems that the return to normal prices is not yet in sight.

— TONE VERY FIRM. —

Influence of Budget.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

It has been an excellent week in the markets generally, with gilt-edged, as usual, a particularly firm spot. Indeed, the conditions that have been prevailing suggest almost undiluted optimism as to the outlook. The Budget is, of course, largely responsible, but there is also a feeling that we are not merely over the worst of the depression, but are nearing the time when trade will be possible on a satisfactory basis.

Gilt-Edged Strong.

Gilt-edged, as I have indicated, have again been the feature of the week. Consols are unchanged at 59½, War Loan Fives are ¼ up at 103½, the Conversion Loan at 79 15-16 has gained ½, while Fundings are 15-16 up at 92. Indian stocks have been fairly strong. The 3 per Cent. Loan is unchanged at 60, the 5½ per Cent. Loan at 103½ is ½ lower, while the 7 per Cent. Loan is ¼ down at 119¾.

The market in Foreign Government securities has been steadier than was the case last week. French stocks have improved, War Loan Fives being ¼ up at 30¼, while the Four per Cents. at 24¼ have gained ½. German Three per Cents. at 15s. show a decline of 3-16, while Italian Rentes are unchanged round 22½. In Near Eastern securities Turkish Unified have firmed up to 27¼, a gain of ¾, while Greek Monopolies have risen to 40½.

Industrials Buoyant.

The strength of Industrials during the past week has been very remarkable. The market firmed up as soon as the Budget proposals became known, and the tone has continued very strong throughout the week, the activity in certain directions being very noticeable.

Tobaccos have again been a fairly strong spot. Bats have gained 6d. at 24s. 6d., while Imperial Tobaccos are 9d. lower at 86s. 3d. Textiles have been very firm. Coats at 69s. 6d. are 2s. 9d. up, while Courtaulds at 72s. 6d. are 3s. 6d. up. In Iron and Steel shares Armstrongs are 18s. 6d. xd., Vickers have gained 9d. at 15s. 9d., while Guest Keens at 46s. 3d. have gained 3s. 9d. Shipping securities have been steady. P. and O. Deferred are unchanged at 315, Cunards are 9d. down at 23s. 6d., while Furness Withys are 34s. 6d. xd. Bank shares have been firm. Chartered have gained ½ at 20, National of India at 48 are 1¼ up, Imperial of Persia are 7 1-16, while Westminster's at 18½ are ½ up.

Oils Quiet.

The Oil market has been rather quiet during the week, and yesterday the general tone was rather dull. Anglo-Persian Ord. at 4 3-16 are 3-16 up, while Burmahs at 5 9-16 have gained 1-16. Among Egyptians, Anglo-Egyptian B have improved to 1 11-16, a gain of ½. In the Roumanian group Phoenix are 1½, at which they are 3-32 lower, Dacia Romanos at 1 1-16 are 1-16 lower, Steaua Romanas are 8s. 9d., while Hamilton's Concessions are 2s. 6d.

— THE BROKER IN ADEN BUSINESS. —

One of the interesting features of business life in Aden is the local broker (says the American Consul at Aden, Mr. Raymond Davis, in a recent report). There is no way of transacting local business without him. A broker is either employed by the month by the more important firms and paid a monthly salary, or he is allowed a percentage of the particular business transaction. If employed by the month, it is generally understood that while occupied with the affairs of his employer he is entitled only to his salary as remuneration. He may, however, receive a brokerage fee from the second party. During his spare time and when not required by his employer, he is also permitted to work for other firms or individuals. When he is working for himself he is entitled to retain brokerage fees from both the purchaser and the seller. He keeps in constant touch with the various markets, and makes a record of prices of many of the more important articles, such as skins, hides, coffee, gums, shells, civet, etc. Each morning he visits the firms interested and reports any changes in conditions which have taken place during the day. In many cases a broker is given the authority to close or refuse a deal in behalf of the firm he represents.

— GOOD BUSINESS AT PRAGUE FAIR. —

At the recent Prague Fair buyers were present from all European countries as well as from Egypt, India, and elsewhere. An official report states that good business was done in building materials, orders from Yugoslavia being remarkably large. Textiles and wearing apparel were not in as good request as at previous fairs, though considerable orders were received for the home market, Yugoslavia, and Turkey.

— FOREIGN EXCHANGES. —

Except for the renewed fluctuations in the German exchange, rates have ruled rather quiet this week. In the Near Eastern exchanges Greek drachmæ are weaker at 454, while Turkish piastres are also slightly weaker.

LONDON PRODUCE REPORT.

Sugar Still Rising.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

Sugar.—Home refined has continued in fair demand. Tate's cubes have been done at 70s. 9d., an advance of 1s. 6d.; Lyle's granulated at 65s. 3d. shows a rise of 1s. 6d.; while London granulated is also 1s. 6d. up at 65s. Foreign descriptions have been exceptionally firm. West Indian crystallised is 2s. 3d. up at 58s. 9d.; white Mauritius at 61s. 6d. has risen 2s. 9d.; while white Java has come to business at 62s. 9d. Futures are: August, 35s. 6d.; December, 28s.

Coffee.—The market has been steady. East Indian is unchanged at 112s., Costa Rica is unaltered at 108s., Nairobi remains at 92s., while Santos is the same at 74s.

Rice.—The position has undergone little change during the week. The market position is very strong, and it is very clear that higher prices are to be anticipated.

Green Fruit.—The position indicated last week as regards oranges has become more pronounced, and supplies are now much below requirements. Prices are tending to move upwards, and it is very clear that whatever might have been the case earlier in the season, growers are not likely to have any reason to complain by the time it is over. Quotations are:—Jaffas, 19s. box (144's); Denias and Valencias, 25s. to 50s. box (240's to 360's). There is no shortage as regards lemons, and the market is distinctly weak. Quotations are: 10s. to 16s. box (300's); 18s. 6d. to 35s. case (300's). Apples are plentiful, and are moving off freely. Egyptian onions continue in fair request.

Dried Fruit.—Good business is reported in regard to practically every variety of dried fruit. Currants have been in strong request, and all grades are harder. Sultanias are in marked request, and the scanty supplies have resulted in higher rates. Plums have again been a good spot. Supplies of figs are small, and prices have again tended to harden.

Oilseeds.—Linseed has been rather weak, Indian closing at 21s. 10½d., a decline of 3d., while La Plata is also 3d. down at 20s. 6d. Rapeseed has been variable. Toria is unchanged at 18s. 1½d., while real bold Ferozepore is 7½d. lower at 16s. 9d. Cottonseed has also been variable. Indian has been done at 10s., a gain of 6d., Egyptian black is 6d. down at 12s., while Sakellaridis is unchanged at 11s. 7½d.

Oils.—Linseed has been dull, closing at 51s. 6d., a decline of 1s. 6d. Rape oil has been firm. Crude is 1s. up at 45s.

Oil Cakes.—After a decline which has been almost continuous from the third week in February the market has at length become firm. Linseed cake is unchanged at 240s., cottonmeal cake is unaltered at 230s., coconut cake remains at 160s., while cottonseed cake is the same at 130s.

BULGARIAN BEET SUGAR PRODUCTION

The Secretary-in-Charge of Commercial Affairs, British Legation, Sofia, states that the production of beet in 1922 amounted to 100,000 tons, which gave 15,000 tons of sugar. This amount is not sufficient to meet local requirements, which are estimated at between 35,000 and 45,000 tons annually. The balance of sugar required is imported from Czecho-Slovakia, Germany, and the United States. In order to enable the sugar factories to work at their full capacity, it is estimated that a minimum of 250,000 hectares should be given to beet cultivation. The area under cultivation in 1922 amounted to 90,000 hectares as against 120,000 hectares in 1921.

SUDAN PRODUCE.

The February report of the Central Economic Board of the Sudan Government gives the following particulars:—

Gum.

Kordofan Produce.—The amount of gum sold in El Obeid market during February was 14,223 kantars, as against 12,883 kantars during the same month last year, the average price was £E1.243 per kantar of 100 rotls (45 kilos). Arrivals from Nahud were 6,423 kantars, as against 8,608 last year. 8,381 kantars were sold in Nahud market at an average price of £E1.100, as against 8,801 kantars last year. 6,441 kantars were sold at Rahad during the month at prices ranging between £E1.450 and £E1.100, as against 2,191 kantars in February, 1922. At Um Ruaba 7,024 kantars were sold at an average price of £E1.270, as against 3,890 kantars in the same month last year.

Kassala Province.—2,249 kantars of hashab gum were exported from Gedaref and 4,811 kantars from Mefaza in January, and 4,417 and 4,912 kantars respectively were exported in February.

Cotton.

Kassala Province.—The Inspector of Agriculture reports picking has now started and about 2,000 kantars of 100 rotls (unginned) are ready for market. The cotton market will be opened first week in March, and the bulk will come from Wad Sharifai, followed by Rabakassa, Shugada, Gammam, and Mekali. Most of the areas are late. The crop is excellent both for quantity and quality.

Dongola Province.—Nuri Pumping Station: Cotton has yielded 3 kantars per feddan up to the end of the month. It is nearly finished now.

Berber Province.—Kitiab Pumping Station: The end of the cotton picking is now in sight. The quantity picked daily is very small, being about 2 kantars of 315 rotls (unginned). 93 kantars were delivered to store during the month, making a total of 1,025 kantars. Mikeilab Pumping Station: The cotton crop promises well. 811 kantars of 315 rotls (unginned) have been received into store up to February, and cotton continues to be brought in. Gendettu Pumping Station: Cotton delivered to store amounts to 1,424 kantars. 212 kantars were delivered during the month.

Red Sea Province.—Tokar: The cotton crop is proving more satisfactory than was anticipated. Considerable interest is being taken in it by buyers from Alexandria and elsewhere.

Maize.

Berber Province.—Kitiab Pumping Station: On new land and on the better of the old land, maize is a fairly good crop. On much of the previously cropped land, especially in Kitia, it is poor. Gendettu Pumping Station: The maize crop is promising. Mikeilab Pumping Station: Maize is being harvested and should produce a satisfactory crop.

COMPANY NOTES AND REPORTS.

Cyprus Asbestos.

The report of the Cyprus Asbestos Company for the period ended December 31 states that possession of the properties was given by the vendors at the beginning of January, 1922. At that time it was found that the installations the vendors had agreed to hand over ready for use were very far from complete. The directors decided, therefore, that it would be best to carry out this work themselves. They accepted as compensation from the vendors £5,600. The balance of profit and loss is £23,122, plus accrued interest received from the Middle East Development Corporation, £2,317, making £25,439, out of which the directors propose to pay a preference dividend of 10 per cent. on 245,600 preferred shares of £1 each, 15s. paid, for the year 1922, which will absorb £18,420, leaving a balance to be carried forward of £7,019.

Egyptian Salt and Soda.

The report of the Egyptian Salt and Soda Company for the year ended August 31, 1922, shows gross profits ££110,147, and net profit of ££101,254, plus ££54,026 brought in. The directors have set aside for depreciation ££11,535, provision for replacement and renewal of plant, etc., ££5,000, provision for eventualities ££5,000, and propose a dividend representing 17½ per cent. on share capital (3s. 6d. per share), carrying forward ££48,808.

Indo-European Telegraph.

The report for 1922 states that the directors recommend a final dividend of £1 2s. 6d. per share, free of tax, making 7 per cent. for the year. Owing to causes beyond their control the directors will not be able to present to the meeting the accounts for 1922, which, however, will be issued to shareholders probably within three months' time. In preparing the above accounts the directors will consider it necessary to make provision for items now standing as Russian freeholds and investments and sums due from the former Russian Government. The accounts for 1921, issued to shareholders in August, 1922, will be submitted for confirmation at the meeting. They contain no items requiring explanation. During 1922 the company's line in Poland and in South Russia has been rebuilt entirely in places and repaired in other places. This has involved a very heavy amount of work, attended by a certain amount of delay due to unexpected causes. The expenditure to the end of 1922 under this heading is £155,000. As a result, with the co-operation of the Russian and Polish Governments, the company has had since November, 1922, a through wire, in good working order, between Warsaw and Teheran, a distance of nearly 3,000 miles. This has been, and is, carrying a satisfactory amount of international traffic. By the early summer it is anticipated that the line will, between the German frontier and Teheran, be completely restored on the pre-war scale and equal to all traffic demands. Although the company has an efficient wire between Warsaw and Teheran, the directors are still unable to reopen the route from the United Kingdom. All arrangements with the General Post Office for the provision of the necessary land line and cable facilities up to the German coast have for some time been completed, but the concession from the German Government, long agreed in principle, still remains unsigned. This is due to the intervention of questions affecting a number of telegraph administrations outside the company, and it is necessary, therefore, that the shareholders should for the present be satisfied with the assurance of the directors that the delay is entirely beyond their control.

ORANGE SEASON ENDING WELL.

Messrs. J. C. Houghton and Co., of Liverpool, report as follows under date April 18:—

Valencia.—A very unsatisfactory season is giving promise of a fairly good ending. The range of prices is more remunerative than at any previous period, and there is no cause for complaint as regards the general condition of arrivals. Jaffa.—Remaining portion of Siptah has not done so well as the first part, but firm action and careful regulation of quantities marketed by the largest holders has made it possible to maintain quotations at a quite satisfactory level.

Valencia, half-case, 300, I. 18s. 6d. 20s.; II., 17s., 19s.; III., 15s. 3d., 16s. 6d. 360, I., 18s., 20s.; II., 16s. 6d., 18s.; III., 15s., 16s. 6d.; 504, I., 18s., 20s.; II., 16s. 9d., 19s. 3d.; III., 15s., 16s. 6d. THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Demand Very Moderate.

The Commercial Company of Egypt, in their report for the week ended April 13, state:—

Since our last report the futures market has been fairly active. The great firmness displayed this week may be attributed principally to the steady reduction in the Alexandria stock figures and to the continued large sales of Egyptians on the Liverpool spot market. Speculation has been very active and has committed itself heavily on the bull side. The feature of the week has been the renewed strength of Ashmouni. The demand from abroad has been of late very moderate. This is explained to some extent by the fact that the Liverpool market being well supplied with cotton and considerably cheaper than ours, spinners naturally avail themselves of the opportunity and fill their requirements in that market. The early realisation of last year's cotton crop has provided the country with large sums of money, which explains the activity prevalent during the last few weeks in the local stock and share market. Arrivals from up-country have fallen off considerably, and amount this week to only 49,000 krs., as against exports of 167,000 krs.; the stock now stands at 1,811,000 krs., against 2,265,000 krs. a year ago.

Spot.—Total sales amount this week to about B/s 9,800, of which we estimate B/s 6,600 Sakellaridis and B/s 3,200 Uppers. Our market was closed on Monday last in celebration of the native festival of Cham el Nessim.

Sakellaridis.—The volume of business shows a great improvement on the previous two weeks, but with daily diminishing stocks holders are not too keen to part with their cotton and insist on full prices. All grades have been dealt in. Fair to Good Fair have been in good demand, but good style cotton in these grades is difficult to find. Rather less interest has been shown in the better grades, but there are always a few buyers. The price of spot as compared with futures remains about unchanged.

Uppers.—In this variety also there has been a somewhat better turnover. The demand has concentrated chiefly on F.G.F. to Good and Good, with a consequent hardening in the premiums. Some business has also been done in Good Fair to Fully Good Fair. The price of spot in relation to futures has somewhat stiffened up all round.

Crop 1923.—Climatic conditions have again been unfavourable, and have slightly checked the germination of the seed and the growth of the young plant. Complaints of failure of germination are more or less general in both Upper and Lower Egypt, and in many cases are imputed to the faulty fumigation of the seed. The last report of the Government on the state of the river reads as follows:—"On the whole there is a small improvement on last year, owing partly to the slight improvement of the White Nile at Malakal, and more especially to the increase of the Blue Nile at Roseires."

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Improved Business in Finer Cotton

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended April 18:—

The good inquiry for Egyptian cotton which latterly has been so noticeable here continues steadily, and although during the past week a heavy decline took place in "futures" and immediately reacted on spot prices, the trade, far from being frightened out of the market, seemed to regard the opportunity a good one for coming in and buying, with the result that, as we write, the sales have already exceeded last week's large total of 6,000 bales.

One feature of the week has been the improved business done in the finer cotton, a change which has been eagerly welcomed owing to the large stocks of this cotton on hand in our market. Another interesting fact which has appeared is that, owing to the relatively cheap basis on which cotton can be bought in our market, as compared with Alexandria, a certain amount of buying has taken place here against c.i.f. contracts.

Owing to the big break in American contracts (in which most Upper cotton is hedged) some cheap lots of Upper Egyptian have been offered, and eagerly snapped up, at about 150 on May American. There is now little Upper on offer here under 17.00d., at which price it is hard to effect sales. Sakellaridis has been in good request from 16½d. upwards to about 22.50d. per lb., the majority changing hands at between 17.00d. and 18.00d. Very little saleable sakel now remains at below 17.00d., quite a "run" having taken place recently on this cotton. Only a very small business has been done this week in Sudan cotton, and the other growths, such as white, pillion, etc., have also been comparatively neglected.

C.i.f. business remains quiet. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending 13th inst. are returned as 5,654 bales. Total sales, 6,300 bales (includes 50 Sudan). Quotations of Sakellaridis are reduced 40 points, whilst those of brown and Upper are 30 points lower. Fully good fair sakel to-day fetched 17.35d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Business Still Restricted.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended April 21 states:—

There has been no improvement in the state of affairs prevailing during the past week. Business remains on a very small scale, and it is doubted whether even the greatly reduced output is being cleared.

Spinners and manufacturers maintain prices fairly firmly, proportionate to the cost of the raw material, and the decision taken last month not to sell yarn below cost of production seems now to be generally carried out.

Raw cotton prices have broken again, and the week ends on a very dull note. The action taken by the authorities in America regarding speculative dealings in sugar "futures" is having a very sobering effect on speculators in cotton, who fear that something of the same nature might possibly be applied to this commodity.

Yarn.—No change can be reported. Purchases are practically of a retail character. As usual spinners of the American staple are the worst sufferers. Such offers as are coming from the Far East are said to be of an unacceptable nature nine times out of ten, and no improvement can be noted for other markets.

Cloth.—There is said to have been a moderate overseas enquiry for certain special lines, but for standard qualities the demand remains disappointing. Considering these conditions, it is a surprise to many that prices have held so firmly. The Near East continues the modest operations reported last week, and South American has done a little more than recently. Home trade buying continues to be of a somewhat hand-to-mouth character.

Raw Cotton.—This has already been referred to above. Purchases in Liverpool have been on a moderate scale, although the demand for cotton for immediate use remains very small. It is reported that the acreage in America will show an increase of about 12 per cent. over last year. Closing prices are as follows: American Fully Middling, 15.28d.; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 17.15d.

The quantity of gold extracted from the mines in India during January amounted to 35,478 oz., valued at Rs. 21,15,583.

Gemsah Oil Reefs.—The following cablegram has been received from the field manager at Gemsah:—"Present depth of well 1,330 ft.; gas is very strong."

The export of clover seed and yellow mustard seed from Roumania is permitted under authorisation from the Ministry of Industry and Commerce, and on payment of the legal export taxes. In the case of yellow mustard seed the export tax is payable in sound foreign currency, and amounts to 30,000 lei per wagon.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS

The following extracts are taken from recent reports received by the Imperial Ottoman Bank :—

Palestine, March.

Good prices continue to be realised for Jaffa oranges in England and Egypt.

The import of building materials shows a marked decrease as compared with previous months. This is largely due to bad weather.

The excellent prospects indicated earlier for winter crops in the Northern sector are confirmed. The situation in the South has been retrieved by the timely arrival of rain during the first fortnight of the month. Very good crops are anticipated over a large proportion of the country, if damage from pests can be limited. The export of cereals showed a decline, largely due to exhaustion of stocks.

The acute competition of French and Italian wines has forced down the prices of local products, leaving little or no margin of profit. The export of wine during the year 1922 was 2,704,651 litres, as compared with 1,947,975 litres in 1921. The principal markets are Egypt, other parts of the former Turkish Empire, and neighbouring Eastern Mediterranean countries. Small quantities are exported to England and the Continent. Some sacramental wine is exported to the United States and other countries.

The number of motor-cars imported into Palestine during the year ending December 31, 1922, was 385, of which 95 per cent. were from America.

Aintab, March.

March has been a more clement month than February, and communications with Aleppo, which have been interrupted for two months, have been re-established. Taking advantage of this, our importers have obtained necessary commodities for local consumption, of which there has been a great shortage. Also the exporters have sent off consignments of tanned leathers to Alexandria and Tunisia via Aleppo. Pistachio nuts are not much sought after at the present time, so there has been a fall in the price of this commodity.

Homs, April 7.

The cereals, which have benefited from the time of sowing by favourable climatic conditions, promise a good harvest. Although the prices of cereals are not remunerative, the harvest will come at a time when it will distribute a certain amount of wealth, especially if it takes place in good conditions. For that it is necessary for the railway company to lower its rates so as to permit the cereals of the country to compete successfully against the arrivals of wheat and other foreign cereals.

The progress report of "Orion" Societate Anonima de Petrol for March shows that the crude oil production for the month was 3,700 tons. The throughput of the refinery was 3,857 tons; converted into lubricating oils, 221 tons.

The progress report of Phoenix Oil and Transport Company and allied companies (including Roumanian Consolidated Oil-fields) for March shows that the crude oil production for the month was 5,179 tons. The throughput of the refinery was 2,930 tons. Well No. 8 Moreni-Stavropoleos, depth 2,959 ft., made two strong flows of sand and oil, in each case sanding up after producing for about five hours. Arrangements have been made to ensure the quick cleaning of this well.

NEW BRITISH INDIA MOTOR SHIP.

The British India Company's new motor ship Dumana, which is now on her first voyage to Bombay, is a sister ship to the s.s. Domala, and is of 8,600 tons gross, with a cargo capacity of 11,000 tons. She has been built by Messrs. Barclay, Curle, and Co., and engined by the North British Diesel Engine Works. The vessel, which has been specially equipped for the Indian passenger service, has accommodation for 158 saloon passengers, and all the passenger accommodation is placed amidships.

ANCHOR LINE ENTERPRISE.

Marked success has attended the latest development of the enterprising policy for which the Anchor Line is noted. Some time ago the company installed on two of its steamers, the Circassia and the Castilia, a new oil fuel burner—Hutchison's Turbinia Gravity Oil Fuel Burner. The utilisation of the new burner has resulted, it is stated, in a saving of at least 20 per cent. in fuel, and at the same time the speed of the vessels has been increased. The company has, therefore, decided to extend the use of the burner by its vessels, and the s.s. Elysia, which recently arrived at Birkenhead, is to remain there to be fitted with an installation of the burners, while the s.s. Massilia is to undergo the same process at Glasgow, and the s.s. Columbia is also to have the installation.

A NEW TEXTILE PRODUCT.

It is announced that a British resident in Brazil is about to throw upon the market a new textile product named "fibraso," a plant discovered in that country some years ago, and a company is to be formed for the sale of the article (says the Economic Review). Although the name of the plant will be revealed, the special process of the treatment of the fibre will be kept secret. The fibres are very fine, 6 ft. long, and seven or eight times stronger than cotton. They can be dyed any colour, which they preserve; the waste in preparation is only 10 per cent., and the product is capable of being sold cheap and put on the market at the rate of 100,000 tons a year. "Fibraso" resists the action of salt water, and its extreme strength enables it to be used in the manufacture of indestructible fabrics, such as sails, canvas, and belts, and in the preparation of pneumatic tyres.

The traffic receipts of the Egyptian Delta Light Railways for the eleven days ended March 31 amounted to ££8,386.

Anglo-Egyptian Land Allotment Company.—Coupon No. 14 of the ordinary shares is now payable at piastres tariff 10 at the rate of exchange of 97½ per £ sterling, less income-tax at 5s. in the £. Coupons should be lodged at the Anglo-Egyptian Bank, Ltd., 37-39, King William Street, E.C.4.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Lausanne Negotiations.

The proceedings at Lausanne during the first week of the resumed Conference have followed the course rendered familiar by the earlier negotiations. In the different committees points come up for discussion seriatim; Turkish objections or requests in regard to some are brushed aside, as in the case of the demand for the cession of Castellarizzo by Italy; others are reserved for further consideration. Even when the Turkish delegation is silenced, there is little opportunity for judging whether it has also been convinced. All that can be said at this stage is that the deliberations are proceeding amicably, thus confirming the belief very widely held that the Turks are really set upon peace. The Chester Concession provides the skeleton in the cupboard. Attempts have been made to warn it, as well as the Soviet representative, away from the Conference; but the latter has arrived at Lausanne, and it remains to be seen whether the former will also have to be accommodated with a seat at the Conference table.

French Uneasiness.

As if to leave no room for doubt as to the completeness of the rift in the Franco-Turkish lute, rumour is busy over the danger of an actual conflict on the frontier between Anatolia and Syria. Although it would be rash to rule Turkish aggression entirely out of the question in view of the composition of the National Assembly, it is difficult to see what purpose the Turks would hope to serve by attacking the French. That French nerves in that part of the world are on edge is an established fact, and the appointment of General Weygand to succeed General Gouraud is an indication that the French Government is inclined to take no risks. The situation is in every way a regrettable one, from the point of view of French, Turks, and Syrians. It is conceivable that, if free expression were allowed to Arab opinion in France's mandated territory, French public opinion would realise that the policy on which the Government is embarked is not going to be worth the candle, in the light of France's financial position and her commitments elsewhere. Sooner or later the system of make-believe must break down. It is obvious that France can find a better way of consolidating her commercial interests in Syria than by antagonising the Syrians and exposing herself to aggression, ostensibly on their behalf, from the Turks.

The Chester Concession.

It would be better for all concerned if the Chester Concession could be eliminated from the Lausanne Conference and made the subject of separate negotiations. In the first place, it is by no means certain that the Concession will receive the necessary financial support in the United States. If it does not, it would be unfortunate for France to find herself committed to a considerable expenditure for the purpose of killing something that is still-born. Another advantage of allowing nothing to delay the signature of the Lausanne Treaty will be that the general relief created by the peace settlement will tend to create a better atmosphere all round. Greece will be able to demobilise her army, and the Turks for all their Press boastings will be more than satisfied to be rid of the menace on the Maritza. Great Britain, who had no reason to admire France in her Franklin-Bouillon mood when the Allies were still nominally at war with Turkey, has less reason to approve when on the eve of peace France again puts on blinkers and sees only a single path leading to war.

The Bulgarian Elections.

One of the results of the recent elections in Bulgaria will be that not for the first time covetous eyes will be directed towards Sofia from neighbouring States. The veteran M. Pashitch has every reason to be jealous of the political tyro who can win 212 seats out of 245; and although the discomfited Opposition talk of M. Stambolisky's terrorism, there would seem to be less meaning in the phrase as applied to the Bulgarian elections than in the case of the Roumanian elections, in which M. Bratianu had to incur much greater odium for results far less satisfactory from his point of view. The chief interest for the outside world in M. Stambolisky's sweeping victory lies in the fact that his Government will be free to continue the foreign policy that has already won strong commendation throughout Europe. The Bulgarian Prime Minister has set himself resolutely to pursue a policy of loyal observance of the Treaty of Neuilly, of friendly relations with neighbouring States, and of seeking close political and commercial ties with the Allied States. If less success has attended his home policy, the reason may be sought in the lack of experience rather than of good intentions. Now that his political position is assured, M. Stambolisky can afford to make some personal sacrifices for Bulgarian unity and for the reputation of his Agrarian party. The elections were fought with most of, if not all, the leaders of the Opposition in prison. Even if they had been more guilty than is likely to be established, it would be a graceful act, and conducive to the country's welfare, to declare a political amnesty. If for no other reason, a united country is required to deal with the Macedonian problem, which has reached an acute stage.

The Fiume Problem.

One of the results of the crisis in Yugoslavia is that there is little chance of the Abbazia Conference, which was adjourned over Easter, being renewed until the political situation in Yugoslavia has been cleared up. When Signor Mussolini undertook last February to ratify the Treaty of Santa Margherita, he made reservations in regard to Porto Baross and the Delta, which, although the key to Fiume, were assigned to the Yugoslavs by the Treaty of Rapallo. Italy has proposed that the administration of the debatable territory should be in the hands of a consortium, consisting of Italians, Yugoslavs, and Fiumans; but, as this arrangement would perpetuate Italian control by a majority of votes, the Yugoslavs do not see their way to accept it. In the meantime Fiume suffers. The only hope for the Abbazia Conference lies in the fact that Italian policy aims at the establishment of satisfactory relations with its Balkan neighbour, and, given sufficient good will on both sides, a working compromise ought to be evolved. In no circumstances, however, can Fiume hope for a return of the prosperous days when its welfare was the official concern of the Dual Monarchy.

Peace in Palestine.

Politically, Palestine is marking time; but it is worthy of note that quite a long spell of quiet has characterised the process. The elections have been officially boycotted at the instigation of the Moslem-Christian Association, and it has been necessary to extend the period over which they are to take place, in the hope that the Arab population may reconsider its decision on this subject. If, in the end, the elections are stultified by Arab abstention, there would seem to be no feasible alternative to maintaining the existing status. The period of quiet is having the advantage of enabling Palestinians to realise that a number, at least, of their fears are unfounded, and that even with the Balfour Declaration unrepealed, it is possible to "carry on" fairly comfortably in the country. The Easter and Nebi Musa festivals have passed without more serious incidents than shouts of "Long live Mustapha Kemal Pasha" and "Long live Zaghloul Pasha," which at least testified to the absence of any very burning grievance at home. In the meantime, Mr. Rutenberg has registered under the Palestine Companies Ordinance the Palestine Electric Corporation, Limited, with a capital of one million pounds. The Jaffa electrical power-station is said to be practically completed, and should be at work before the end of June. The Arabs, as was clearly shown by the proceedings of the last agricultural congress, are not slow to avail themselves of all the improvements introduced under the present régime, and it should not be too much to hope for that they will gradually come to appreciate the advantages of a system which enables them to qualify for a larger measure of political power without at once drying up the only source from which they can expect to obtain funds for the material advancement of the country. The principle of noblesse oblige should prompt the Jews no less than the Mandatory Power to meet Arab susceptibilities half-way.

Sir Percy Cox.

A well-deserved tribute was paid to Sir Percy Cox, High Commissioner for Irak, on the occasion of a farewell banquet given in his honour at Baghdad on April 26. Sir Henry Dobbs, who succeeds him as High Commissioner, stated that during the fifteen years that Sir Percy Cox had spent in the Persian Gulf he had been a great rock for British interests, and the foundation of the kingdom of Irak out of chaos had been one of his greatest achievements. In the words of the Prime Minister of Irak, every tribesman would claim "Cokkus" a son, and his name would live for ever in the hearts of the people. Everyone who has had opportunity to gauge the feelings of the Arabs towards Sir Percy Cox will know that the eulogies passed upon his work in Irak are genuine and entirely merited. In his reply Sir Percy Cox said that no doubt the British would stay in Irak for many years, until the country could stand alone with ultimate independence, but he added that perhaps in four years' time British responsibility would end.

Parliament and India.

A further step towards defining the relations between Parliament and the new India was taken last week in the House of Lords, which framed terms of reference for the Joint Standing Committee, a body which has hitherto been free to do practically whatever it might choose. As we read the resolution proposed by Viscount Peel, and accepted by the House, the Committee loses the power of initiating investigations, and will in future deal only with such questions as may be referred to it either by Parliament or by the Secretary of State. The change is in our judgment timely. Indians are very much addicted to the habit of appealing against any decision they may dislike, and they have of late been coming to regard the Standing Committee as an appellate tribunal, which could be moved to reconsider the administrative decisions of the India Office or the Government at Delhi. The establishment of that doctrine would be nearly fatal to the existing constitution, under which the business of the country must be transacted more and more within its borders, and it is a wise decision to make it plain, before any mischief has been done, that the Committee's functions do not extend to the examination of individual grievances on demand.

The Indian Political Situation.

Perhaps the most significant item in last week's news from India was the failure of the extremist party to secure control of any of the rural councils in the United Provinces. The recent capture of the cities was, as we have explained, a fact which could be interpreted in more ways than one, but if the country had followed the lead of the towns, there would have been good reasons for anxiety regarding the immediate future in Northern India taken as a whole. As matters now stand, it is safe to conclude that the urban voting cannot be taken as indicating a wave of extremist enthusiasm spreading over the whole country, and possibly it means nothing more than that an astute campaign caught the Moderates napping, a habit to which Moderates are addicted in India as elsewhere. The bearing of local elections on the prospects of the next legislature is a question for the decision of which no Indian data exist, and it would be absurd to base an optimistic forecast on the apparent steadiness of the rural population, but the fact may fairly be accepted as a warning against premature pessimism.

Communal Differences.

Any forecast of Indian politics just now must be based less on the distinction between Extremists and Moderates than on the recrudescence in an acute form of those local and communal animosities which ardent politicians have been tempted to ignore. A recent message says that the country is too distracted by these causes to pay attention to the agitation over the salt tax, and the facts seem to justify that view. Moslems are, of course, united, but Shias were shooting Sunnis only last week. Hindus and Moslems are brethren, but Englishmen have hard work to keep them from breaking each other's heads. The Sikhs are so rampant that collisions with men of other faiths are becoming highly probable, and, speaking generally, present conditions appear to support the position taken by a writer in the current Edinburgh Review that the tendency towards national unification has been checked for the time by the recent constitutional changes. One would like to see the electors lining up on a clear issue, but, as matters now stand, it is perhaps equally probable that the autumn elections may degenerate into a series of dog-fights.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

The Royal Wedding.

London was invaded twice last week—once by women, who came from suburb and country to try to see the Royal Wedding, and again by men, who came from North and South to try to see the Cup Final at Wembley. On Thursday the Duke of York was married in Westminster Abbey to Lady Elizabeth Bowes-Lyon, and the occasion was one of extraordinary interest. The ordinary man was quietly loyal about it all, but the women for weeks before and days after the event simply could talk about nothing else; it was their day in town, and it must be said that they managed things very nicely. How the wedding itself was perfectly carried through, with even the April weather behaving itself, all the world now knows; what with the films and the illustrated papers no one could have even a superior excuse for ignorance. But, apart from all the journalistic flapdoodle about the concern for social welfare of the Duke, the beauty of the Duchess, and so on, there was evidence everywhere of genuine good will towards the pair, at the sight of whose love the simple and decent spectators restirred or kindled their own.

The Cup Final.

The wedding crowd, which is said to have been even more enormous than that at Princess Mary's wedding, was, as I have said, composed of decent people; but of the vandals who on Saturday broke into the Stadium at Wembley, or, disappointed, overflowed into the capital, this can scarcely be said. These people, who are called "football enthusiasts"—which merely means that they were able by some obscure method to discriminate between the respective merits of Bolton Wanderers and of West Ham—got quite out of hand; they overcame the police, commandeered seats, and generally made themselves such a nuisance that the actual play was carried on under extremely difficult conditions. It is said by those who were able to use their tickets and see the game that Bolton deserved their win of two clear goals; but frankly, it was not possible to take the slightest interest in the result. By some people this lack of interest in professional football is accounted a sign of snobbery, but one imagines that even they, if they saw anything of Saturday's proceedings, will have to revise their opinion of this "sport of the people." After the game supporters of the two teams roved noisily all over London, took full advantage of the recent reduction in the price of beer, and then travelled sleepily home—mostly, it seemed, to the North.

One cannot be serious over these Cup Finals; one can only deplore the disastrous partisan spirit which they arouse, and meanwhile thank Heaven that the cricket season has begun. In the South, at any rate, cricket means the restoration, in all but a few places, such as the Oval and Leyton, of peaceful and consoling sport.

Another Invasion.

There was last week another invasion—I mean the visit to this country of the American team of golfers, which includes eight champions. They have started very well by drawing at Rye with a strong Oxford and Cambridge University team, and apparently their incredibly efficient putting is going to take holes from our players. It is well known that American golfers specialise in putting, and, though it is hateful to have to admit it, we shall probably have, in this as in other sports, to follow their policy of concentration. Take tennis, for example, in which the Americans are producing champions and we are not. During the last three years America has not lost one Davis Cup single, and something really should be done about it. To adopt the attitude, "Let them do it if it amuses them" is not good enough, for continual beatings do, however we may try to disguise the fact, arouse resentment. How to prevent such organisation and specialisation as will ensure an improvement in our standard from affecting the spirit of the play is a problem that becomes more and more urgent every year. But it must somehow be solved.

The Government.

It is stated that Mr. Bonar Law has been ordered to take a sea voyage, and that he has chosen to visit the North African coast—a region which we have come to associate with failure. Either as prologue or epilogue to non-success, Algeria seems to call politicians with irresistible fascination. This is where Mr. Austen Chamberlain and his colleagues formulated their price for re-entry into the Government—a price of which, incidentally, there is every prospect of payment; this is where Sir Alfred Mond visited Mr. Lloyd George to be coached in the intricacies of Capitalism and the Housing Question. And now that Mr. Bonar Law is going there we may really feel that it is the beginning of his end.

Some say that the reputation of the Government was never higher than it is at the moment; others insist that it has no platform-power in the country. From the Press one can learn nothing of the real state of affairs, for every newspaper has either an axe to grind or else must adopt an officially determined attitude, which necessarily omits certain factors in the situation. Even the Morning Post, which is the most "independent" of them all, is not to be trusted in its appreciation of the present Government. And so we just let things slide on, and vaguely hope that everything will turn out all right at Lausanne, in the Ruhr, and in Ireland.

The Moves of Liberalism.

Liberalism is in the unhappiest position just now, because, though aware of its enormous potential strength, it does not know how to organise it. Recently, for example, Mr. Lloyd George, who, by curiously individual reasoning, appears still to call himself a Liberal, explained Liberalism as being fairplay for the under-dog—the most unhelpful suggestion, as though fairplay were not in theory the goal of all English political parties. But the ex-Premier is really a back-number now; and his bankruptcy of ideas not only denotes his own moribund condition, but it seriously retards the cause of Liberalism.

Again, the Nation and Athenaeum, which, when it was edited by Mr. Massingham, one had, however violently and inevitably one might disagree with it, to consider, has now passed to a wholly academic group, of whom the most influential seem to be the two Cambridge high-brows, Messrs. H. D. Henderson and Keynes. This alteration certainly will do no good to the cause of Liberalism. It is, indeed, lamentable that Liberals cannot find a via media between the entirely out-of-date doctrinaire attitude, which holds up holy hands in terror at the bare mention of Protection, and the selfish and unscrupulous compromises of the party led by Mr. Lloyd George. Dogma in politics is as undesirable as it is desirable in religion; this generation, at any rate, will have none of it. Yet our Liberals are still blind to the fact.

The Conservative Party.

There is considerable significance in the recent election of Lord Younger to be chairman of committee of the Carlton Club, for it means that the Conservative headquarters are officially supporting the Die-Hard section, and that the more moderate and, if less scrupulous, more intelligent, element in the Conservative Party is to be left out in the cold. Whether it is possible thus to shut them out may well be doubted, though Lord Younger has no fears on the subject. He is quite satisfied that his moves and those of the Die-Hards have saved his party from the fate of the Liberals, and he makes the rather extravagant claim that, apart from a few lost leaders, his party remains undivided and loyal. But, then, he also thinks, or says he thinks, that the present Government is to enjoy many years of office, and to be returned at the end of the period. Confidence is certainly a great asset, but the Die-Hards should really beware lest it become their sole possession.

The Opera Season.

London does not easily support opera, though those two perfect productions, "The Beggar's Opera" and "Polly," are still running merrily. While these two things endure—and there is no prospect of their dying yet—the capital can still hold up its head. But "The Immortal Hour," the music-drama of genius by Rutland Boughton, which the Birmingham Repertory Company really made popular in London, left us on Saturday night, though with every appearance of public regret; and we must now be patient until the National Opera Company begin their season at Covent Garden. There are interesting things in their programme; they are, for instance, going to produce on the first night Gustav Holst's "The Perfect Fool"—which will certainly excite the musical. And for the other sort of spectator (and also for the box office) there is the reappearance of Melba. It is possible that if the season is a great financial success we shall be able to get back from foreign lands our best opera singers, like Miss Sheridan or Mr. Hyslop, who at present are simply driven abroad for financial reasons. But too many hopes have been raised and crushed over opera for one really to believe in the possibility of the great desideratum—opera all the year round.

The Stoning of a Judge.

An almost unprecedented incident occurred last week in the Law Courts, when Mr. Justice Romer, in the Chancery Division, was made the target of a handful of pebbles and gravel by a disappointed litigant. The assailant, who was promptly enough removed to Brixton Prison, no doubt to meditate, like any pacifist, on the ultimate futility of force, must have felt extraordinarily malevolent towards the Bench. No doubt, bitterness in a court of law must at times be all-pervading; but one would have thought that the very aspect of the building itself, with all its appurtenances for establishing control and order, would have kept down this man's right arm. We are used now to the display of temper in inferior institutions, such as the House of Commons, but it is rather alarming when the cold imperturbability of our Law Courts is thus hotly assailed.

The Struggle Round the Constitution.

Matters political are at the present moment in an exceedingly fluid state. During the whole of the past week conversations with regard to the Constitution have been going on between the Palace and the Cabinet, which has daily held long sittings. On more than one occasion the promulgation of the Constitution was expected to take place the following day, but these forecasts always proved too sanguine, and up to this evening no agreement has been reached between King Fuad and his Ministers. There have been several points on which dispute arose, but as far as can be gathered only two questions now remain to be settled: the bestowal of grades and decorations and the control of the religious institutions and Wakfs. In both these cases the King maintains that full control belongs to him as head of the State, but the body of the Intelligenza contends that under a democratic régime, which the Constitution is intended to introduce, all such powers should be controlled by Parliament. Very active efforts have been made to find formulæ satisfactory to both parties, but so far without success, owing to the obduracy of the King.

The situation, though by no means alarming, as the local correspondents of some London newspapers are trying to make out, is sufficiently serious. The Constitutionals are losing patience and are going as near attacking the King as the existing Press law will allow, making it perfectly clear who is the real object of their bitter criticism. On the other hand, we find the King moving heaven and earth to get the Ulama to issue a declaration in his favour, and beginning to resort to the same Press tactics as he did against the Sarwat Cabinet, when he used the extremist Opposition and Press.

Whether the Constitution as framed by the Commission of "Thirty" is too liberal or not for the people does not affect the question. The King is plainly trying to circumscribe its democratic nature purely for his own ends, and in his attitude is showing extraordinary shortsightedness, for even supposing that he gained his point to-day it is as certain as that the sparks fly upwards that very soon after it has assembled Parliament will demand a revision on these points, and thus at once produce a conflict between the Throne and the people, with all its serious consequences.

There is no doubt that King Fuad would do well to submit to the inevitable without further delay, and thus give practical effect to the intentions he has so often professed of renouncing his autocratic prerogatives and becoming a constitutional King.

The Tutankhamen Tomb.

Lady Carnarvon, accompanied by Dr. Marcus Johnson, an old family friend who arrived here a few hours after Lord Carnarvon's death, left Egypt on Monday last for England. They are travelling by the same boat as the embalmed remains of the late Lord Carnarvon. Mr. Howard Carter is now back in Luxor, where he is hard at it trying to get the objects from the ante-chamber of the Tutankhamen tomb packed up before the hot weather sets in. Until Lord Carnarvon's illness it was expected that the work in the Valley would be finished by May 15, but owing to the delay that has since taken place it seems extremely improbable that it will be possible to shut down until the beginning of June.

The Cairo Museum.

Plans are being made for the erection of an annexe to the Cairo Museum. This addition has been rendered necessary by the discovery of the tomb of King Tutankhamen, the objects from which cannot possibly be accommodated in the existing Museum, which is already overcrowded. The Ministry of Finance has been asked for a special credit to cover the expense, which is expected to amount to about £E35,000, and the work will be put in hand without delay. This does not mean that the objects from the tomb will be on exhibition at an early date, for there are so many of them, and so much requires still to be done in the Valley of the Kings that it will be quite impossible for some considerable time for the extra staff to prepare them for final treatment. The early undertaking and completion of the annexe, however, will, it is hoped, permit of the new building being absolutely dry before these precious objects are placed in it.

The Water Supply Question.

For some little time the irrigation authorities have been much preoccupied with regard to the supply of summer water. The levels in the main Nile have been so low, and the reports from the upper White Nile have been so bad, that there was reason to fear a very critical period, and rice cultivation had been totally prohibited. This past week, however, a sudden and complete change for the better has intervened. Reports from the upper Blue Nile and the Sobat River show such an extraordinarily great rise in levels due to heavy rains in North-Western Abyssinia that all fears for the summer water supply of Egypt are now at an end, and very shortly permission will be given for the cultivation of rice on an area of about 150,000 acres in the north, which is more than has been grown during the past two or three years.

The Crown Princess, who is a very devoted Christian, was present in Jerusalem during the Holy Week of the Eastern Church, and on the occasion of the Easter celebrations presented the Abyssinian Patriarch with some magnificent jewellery. Her Royal Highness was met on arrival by representatives of the Palace and the Residency, and is the guest of Yussuf Pasha Suliman, a prominent Copt who has served in two Cabinets and was a member of the Official Egyptian Delegation which visited London in the summer of 1921. Her Royal Highness has had audiences of King Fuad and the Queen, she has visited the Pyramids and the Museums (Egyptian as well as Coptic), and the night before last was entertained at dinner at the Residency by Lord and Lady Allenby. The Crown Princess, who is visiting Egypt for the first time, is now up at Luxor, where she proposes to spend a few days before returning to Abyssinia.

BULGARIA.

Sofia, April 23.

General Elections.

Elections for the Sobranje were held all over Bulgaria yesterday. Although at the moment of writing only approximately 80 per cent. of the results are known, figures so far received show that the Agrarians have obtained an overwhelming victory. Two hundred and forty-five Deputies will compose the next Sobranje, and the Government were anxious to obtain a two-thirds majority in order to enable them to reform the Constitution. It seems that they will obtain a three-fourths majority. Their supporters can themselves hardly believe that their majority is so great. Neither the Bourgeois Bloc nor the Liberals appear to have obtained any success at all, and the Communists are the only party who have put up any kind of opposition. In the last Sobranje they had forty-seven Deputies, but in this one they are not likely to have more than twenty-five.

The above result constitutes a signal victory for M. Stambolisky. Once more he has given a proof of what personal popularity backed up by keen electioneering can accomplish. During a ten days' tour throughout the country he received ovation after ovation, and it would indeed seem that he has the country wholeheartedly behind him. The Opposition parties will no doubt largely explain away their defeat by saying that a reign of terror was introduced into the elections. There is no doubt that a good deal of terrorism took place, but even this cannot explain the almost total victory of the Agrarians. (The only bright spot from the Bloc point of view is the re-election at Sofia of MM. Malinoff and Daneff, two former Ministers now imprisoned at Shumen.) There is no doubt that one of the principal factors contributing to the Agrarian victory was the settlement of the Reparation question. This settlement, which, incidentally, has still to be ratified by the Reparation Commission in Paris, has been brought before the notice of the peasants, as the way in which the Agrarian Government have lightened the financial burden cast on Bulgaria by the Treaty of Neuilly. Another factor largely responsible for the rout of the Bourgeois Bloc is that all their leaders were in prison, and the party machinery was consequently disorganised.

It is probable that the Sobranje will be convoked towards the middle of May.

Anti-Communist Legislation.

In an election speech delivered at Sofia M. Stambolisky has declared his intention of bringing before the next Sobranje a law providing for the confiscation of the property of Communists. In every village where there are more than ten Communists this law will become operative. If the present Government pass this law and see that it is properly carried out, there seems good ground for thinking that the Communist menace will quickly diminish. The measure is perhaps a little crude, but in dealing with Balkan people, and especially with Communists, there is no good in having recourse to half-measures.

According to reports received from reliable sources, there seems very little doubt that the Communist party are still receiving large sums of money from Russia, and that their propaganda is apt to increase rather than decrease. In view of this, the policy decided on by M. Stambolisky is all the more to be welcomed, and it will be interesting to see the results that are achieved.

A Macedonian Manifestation.

On Sunday, April 15, the Macedonians in Bulgaria, to the number of 40,000, held a meeting at Sofia to protest against Serbian methods in Macedonia. The meeting was perfectly orderly, and contented itself with promenading the streets and listening to several fiery speeches. Many banners with the well-known inscription "Macedonia for Macedonians" were to be seen, whilst pictures portraying various massacres were carried. After the procession a special delegation presented a note to the Legations of England, France, Italy, and America, and to M. Stambolisky. This note requested the Great Powers to hold an international inquiry into the state of affairs in Macedonia, and referred specially to the closing of all churches and schools.

Western Thrace.

It is announced that the League of Nations have refused to consider Bulgaria's protest concerning Greek persecution of Bulgarian minorities in Western Thrace. The League based their refusal on the ground that Western Thrace does not form part of Greece, but is under the protection of the Great Powers. The League have, therefore, referred Bulgaria's protest to the Council of Ambassadors. To judge by past examples, it is not probable that the Council will take any effective action, and the situation will remain unchanged. Many Bulgarians of both sexes have recently been deported from Thrace and sent to the Greek islands. Their goods have been seized, and in some cases their houses have been burned. Bulgarians living in and around the towns of Demotika and Dedeagatch have borne the brunt of these persecutions, and it is no exaggeration to say that many have died. In all these circumstances the refusal of the League to intervene in this matter is very much to be regretted.

Sofia Streets.

Whatever improvements the future Sobranye may decide to carry out, it is important that provision be made for road-mending in the capital. During the last four years the roads here have been growing steadily worse. Only in one or two isolated instances have repairs been carried out, and even these have been so badly done that to-day these streets are in the same condition as formerly. The excuse given by the local authorities is always the same—viz., lack of money. Everyone knows that Bulgaria is suffering from a financial crisis, but it would seem that the welfare of the capital is the last thing considered. Besides the bad surface of the streets, they are exceedingly dirty, undrained, and generally disreputable. Apart altogether from the inconveniences resulting to Sofiotes, foreigners who visit or revisit the town never fail to be struck by the condition of the streets. It is high time that energetic action was taken by the proper authorities.

Reparations.

Last week the Reparation Commission in Paris discussed for the first time the settlement arrived at between the Inter-Allied Commission in Sofia and the Bulgarian Government. Nothing is yet known regarding their deliberations, but the Inter-Allied Commission here expect that towards the middle or the end of May a definite decision will be reached. To an ordinary observer it does not seem possible that the Reparation Commission in Paris will fail to ratify the arrangement entered into by their Sub-Commission in Sofia. If they fail to do so, the only result will be a reopening of negotiations unlikely to result in any practical good.

April 23, 1923.

Constantinople, April 24.

What a variety of political anniversaries has been crowded into this day of the calendar—April 23! Britons here try to remember it as St. George's Day, an event which appears to the average Englishman abroad to be conspicuous in the calendar of the old country by its non-observance. It is the anniversary of the Zeebrugge landing—a day, moreover, which doubtless will be remembered in Belgium in connection with the reburial of her sons who died on English soil during the War. In Turkey the day is being kept in the most demonstrative manner as the fourth anniversary of the opening of the Grand National Assembly, on which the hopes and aspirations of the new Nationalist Turkey so largely hang, and which, there is little reason to doubt, will continue to be celebrated by all patriotic Turks, so long, at any rate, as the Assembly exists in its present form. That April 23 is also the day on which the deliberations of the Second Peace Conference should begin at Lausanne is a circumstance relegated to the background, interest in the Conference having been entirely overshadowed. Yet to the historian, be the outcome of it what it may, this raising of the curtain at Lausanne for the second time in this political drama of the Near East should add yet another anniversary to be chronicled for this eventful day.

National Assembly Day.

Turkey was aglow yesterday with the red flag with its white Star and Crescent, and in Constantinople the national emblem fluttered from every public building, most commercial houses and shops, the trams, Turkish shipping, even the street vendors' baskets, as well as from a great number of private houses and flats. In the evening all the minarets of the mosques and many public buildings and private commercial houses were illuminated; there were also fireworks, accompanied by the usual pistol firing. It was a public holiday, and, as such, more generally observed by all nationalities than any national day of recent times.

There was an elaborate official programme for the day, including processions by day and night, in which all sections of local national activity participated—Boy Scouts, the Gendarmerie, the University, and sundry other educational institutions, sporting associations, Mussulman Red Cross, the Turkish Press, and certain commercial and workers' unions. Various sections in the procession were headed by their bands. Allied troops were confined to their camps and barracks during the evening, and the Greek population to a great extent took the wise precaution to remain indoors after dark. So far as one has heard at the time of writing, everything went off in an orderly manner, and without any untoward incidents.

Enforcement of New Laws.

The Angora Government's insistence in applying all old and new laws that have been passed by the National Assembly to the areas in occupation by Allied troops before the terms of peace have been agreed upon has brought about an anomalous state of affairs in commercial circles. The uncertainty that exists as to the real intention or correct interpretation of some of the laws, the date when they really will come into operation, and whether one would or would not be justified as an Allied subject or an Allied company in conforming to them at this juncture, has been genuinely felt and variously acted upon, producing a condition of things which might be amusing, if it were not for the inconvenience it is causing to the business community. It must also have proved to be the cause of no little embarrassment to the Government Departments concerned, which have repeatedly been appealed to for instructions and elucidation on questions in dispute, and in some cases have been obliged to adjourn the application of a law while such points are under further consideration.

Position of Foreign Companies.

There is the law in regard to the registration of foreign companies, which were given until March 18 to register, after which time unregistered companies were to be liable to fines in addition to having to quit the country. It is said that there are about 100 important companies which have not applied for registration, and the Ikdam during the past week has published a list of some of the principal defaulting companies. Amongst other names on this list are the Eastern Telegraph Company, American Steamship Company, General Motor Export Company, and the Ocean Salvage, Limited. This question has been under consideration by the British Chamber of Commerce, and the British High Commission has been appealed to for advice in the matter. British companies were ultimately recommended to apply for registration subject to a reservation. This reservation is to the effect that while deferring to the Government's request in the matter of registration, the company in question has no intention of renouncing the guarantees which may be stipulated for by the future Treaty of Peace in respect of the status of foreigners resident in Turkey. Some companies have latterly applied for registration, subject to this stipulation; others still persist in doing nothing until the Peace Treaty is an accomplished fact.

"Say When!"

Prohibition, or the Dry Law, would appear to be suffering from a sort of dry rot. The threat of the application of this law has now been hanging over Constantinople—like the sword of Damocles—since December 6 last, when importations were stopped. After being given till March 1 in which to consume, destroy, or re-export all stocks on hand, this date has gradually been extended, until it was announced that the last and dreaded day had been finally fixed for Saturday last, the 21st instant, by which date, and under severe penalties in case of default, lists of all stocks on hand were to be sent in to the authorities. But no, the apostle of temperance, who is as much opposed to the intemperance of taking too much as to that of pouring good wine down drain-pipes, found himself on Saturday morning with a cheerful little twinkle in his eye that had been absent for months past. On the Friday it was stated in the Press: "It is this evening when the delay accorded by the Government to the vendors of alcoholic liquors for declaring their stocks of liquor on hand expires. Up to this morning only fifty-five vendors have sent in the lists asked for, and these do not include any of the more important holders." On Saturday it was announced that a further adjournment till May 15 had been agreed upon. "Here's luck," said the temperance man referred to, following up his original remark, uttered sotto voce on reading the official announcement, with "Say when!"

PERSIA.

Teheran, March 16.

The Government's Programme.

The chief item of political interest during the past fortnight has been the debate on the new Government's programme, which, after prolonged discussion and opposition on the part of the minority in the Mejliss, was finally approved by a majority of 62 votes to 26. Mustaufi el-Mumalik's Cabinet, therefore, enters upon its labours with a substantial vote of confidence.

Exceptional interest was taken in the debate during the few days that it occupied the attention of the House, and the diplomatic and other galleries were unusually full. The discussions were at times very lively, and feeling ran high between the partisans and opponents of the Government. More than once fist-cuffs were resorted to in the lobbies during the recesses, and the police had to be called in to prevent disorders.

The Ministers of Posts and Telegraphs and of Public Works have not yet been appointed.

Negotiations with Russia.

Owing to the conciliatory attitude of the Russian Government in taking off the prohibitive Customs tariff which has been the cause of an almost total cessation of trade between the two countries, and the cultivation of friendly relations with all foreign Powers, and more especially Russia, which is one of the chief items in the new Cabinet's programme, the interrupted negotiations with regard to a commercial convention have been resumed at Moscow, and great hopes are entertained that they will terminate successfully. Some sanguine newspapers, in fact, predicted that the Treaty would be signed during the course of the last few days, but this has so far not materialised. It is, however, a consummation devoutly to be wished, and would undoubtedly result in a great revival of trade, which is already beginning to be felt in anticipation. Owing to increased demand, the price of goods exported from Northern Persia has already risen a great deal.

The American Advisers.

The American financial advisers continue to be active. By a law passed on February 24 last the post of Treasurer-General, which was abolished during the short-lived régime of Seyed Zia ed-Din in 1921, has been revived, and Mr. McCaskey, who, it will be remembered, was Mr. Morgan Shuster's right-hand man in the days of the latter's Treasurer-Generalship twelve years ago, has been appointed to the post.

The number of American advisers has been further increased by the arrival last week of Dr. Ryan, a municipal expert, and two engineers, who have already taken over the affairs of the Town Council. Extensive improvements are now hoped for in municipal affairs.

Ten thousand people are reported to have visited a two-day industrial exhibition organised by the Armenian Refugees' (Lord Mayor's) Fund at Erivan, the Armenian capital.

"STOP PRESS" ARCHÆOLOGY.

"THE GLORY OF THE PHARAOHS." By Arthur Weigall. (London: Thornton Butterworth, Limited. 15s. net.)

For a brief space the reader is prompted to suspect the application of wizardry or wireless to book production on finding in his hands a volume by Mr. Arthur Weigall with flattering references to Lord Carnarvon and Tutankhamen. It seems hardly a day—at most a week—ago since someone of the same name as our author was in Luxor endeavouring to make our hair stand on end, with the help of headlines, by denouncing in a popular newspaper Lord Carnarvon, whose sad death has since had to be recorded, for a crime which, if our memory serves us aright, was described as the commercialising of archæology. As the public never takes any interest in Press quarrels, it was left with an imperfect knowledge of what was implied by the commercialising of archæology; but it will be relieved to find from "The Glory of the Pharaohs" that it was not the rushing into print of a semi-archæological book in order to take advantage of a wave of popular interest in the subject of archæology. The most plausible explanation of the simultaneous appearance of these different forms of writing is that there are two, three, or possibly half a dozen Mr. Arthur Weigalls. At the head of the list is the author of "The Life and Times of Akhnaton" and of other Egyptological works, who proved himself to be an artist and scholar with a wonderful gift of sympathetic interpretation. At the other end of the list must be placed the journalist with "stunt" proclivities—to use the technical phraseology of the medium that he affects. If we had not the assurance of the publisher to the contrary, in four pages of a Foreword devoted to the author's identity, it would have been suspected that two or more of the Mr. Weigalls had collaborated in producing "The Glory of the Pharaohs."

It was not only the excavators at Ur of the Chaldees who asked themselves why they should hide their light under a bushel when Lord Carnarvon and Mr. Howard Carter had so successfully set theirs on the highest point of the hills commanding the Valley of the Kings. Accordingly, the columns of the daily Press rescue in March from undeserved obscurity the Mesopotamian excavators that had achieved their finds in the previous December, and Mr. Arthur Weigall very rightly decides in 1923 to recall the discovery in 1907 and 1908 of the tombs of Tiy and Horemheb and of other archæological incidents in Egypt quorum pars magna fuit. Those who are familiar with any of his previous works will not need to be reminded how well he can tell his story, with what a happy touch he brings his heroes to life again. To the descriptions of his Pharaohs and their queens or generals he legitimately adds admirable translations or paraphrases of two papyri—both very human documents. A chapter on "The Morality of Excavation" is also apposite; but it cannot be said that the first two chapters, as well as others towards the end of the book, throw much light on the glory of the Pharaohs. All, however, are readable, and preference between Mr. Arthur Weigall, Egyptologist, and Mr. Arthur Weigall, journalist, may be, after all, a matter of taste.

MR. CHURCHILL'S APOLOGIA.

"THE WORLD CRISIS, 1911-1914." By the Right Hon. Winston S. Churchill, C.H., First Lord of the Admiralty, 1911-1915. (London: Thornton Butterworth. 30s. net.)

To students of Near Eastern history it is probable that the importance of Mr. Winston Churchill will repose mainly in what he did as Colonial Secretary subsequent to the Great War, but there can be little doubt that to students of universal history his main importance will be found in his work at the Admiralty prior to and in the first months of the War. This book, therefore, which describes Mr. Churchill's work, its setting and its effects, down to the end of 1914, falls for the most part outside the scope of THE NEAR EAST. It is true that a final chapter is devoted to Turkey and the Balkans, but the story of Gallipoli and other Eastern matters is reserved for another volume.

Beyond cavil "The World Crisis" is an extremely able production. Not only in style, in presentation, and in proportion is it distinguished from other books of its kind, but one feels all through the personality of its author. It is stimulating, compelling, provoking; it is lucid, alluring, dazzling. But through its very brilliance is seen an over-riding keenness, wherein lies that political dangerousness of which there are few observers but accuse him. If energy and vision could make dispensable soberness and reflection, Mr. Churchill would be one of the world's statesmen. And this he unmistakably is not.

It is perhaps possible through this book to understand how Mr. Churchill has missed greatness. Certainly it is not that he does not see events in their proper proportion—his sketch of pre-War Europe, which is a masterpiece both in perception and execution, is sufficient proof of that; or that he lacks originality and driving force and ruling skill; or that his courage and tenacity do not equal the daring and difficulties of his plans. It is, we must suppose, that Mr. Churchill in a very individual and probably unanalysable way lacks ballast and what we must admittedly, for want of a better word, call taste. By this we by no means wish to depreciate his mental alertness or his culture—one need but study his naval minutes and his quotations, which range from Herodotus to Housman, to be profoundly impressed with the exactness and richness of his intelligence; but there are in this book lapses in the written word which imply lapses in political action, impetuosities which are more remarkable because more sincerely and intensely indulged than the indiscretions of lesser men.

As already indicated, we can here make no detailed survey of this volume. But, as being typical in its shrewdness and in the vividness of its telling, the chapter on "Turkey and the Balkans" may be briefly reviewed. Before the War Mr. Churchill had rightly gauged that the Turks were turning to the Germans, and, after the outbreak of the War, he, in this belief, welcomed the idea of a Balkan confederation of Serbia, Greece, Bulgaria, and Roumania. He was convinced that Turkey would attack us sooner or later, and did his best to secure Balkan unity against Turkey. On subsequent diplomatic events no blame can be put on Mr.

We await with the keenest expectation the publication of the next volume, which will take in matters more nearly pertaining to our sphere. If it maintains the level of this book it will read as the finest account of Near Eastern War History yet written, for there is no War book that equals this in vigour, colour, and sustained interest.

"THROUGH ROMANTIC INDIA."

Under the auspices of the English-Speaking Union, Mr. Lowell Thomas, who is well known to English audiences from his "With Allenby in Palestine," has followed up his success of 1919-20 with an "illustrated travelogue" entitled "Through Romantic India." From start to finish he holds his audience entranced with his pictures—photographic and cinematographic—illustrating a tour from Cape Comorin right up through India to Quetta and Kabul, to Kashmir and to Nepal. Mr. Lowell Thomas, who is an American, sets himself to bring home to his hearers an appreciation of the task, with its complexity and its difficulties, that Great Britain has undertaken in India, and of the extent to which she has already reached achievement. There is no suspicion of propaganda, although the lecturer shows himself a generous admirer of things British in his comments. His powers of description are as happy as the unerring instinct which has led him to select the salient factors in Indian life. Those who have first-hand knowledge of India come away from the entertainment conscious that, quite apart from the charm and delight of it all, they have been helped to see the wood in spite of the trees; those who do not know India have learnt something about it that they would probably never have gleaned from a whole library of books. If some pictures have to be specially mentioned, the palm must go to the several views of the Taj Mahal—all exquisitely beautiful—and to those of the Garden of Shalimar. Some of the cinematograph scenes are in natural colours, taken by a new process which bids fair to open up a new chapter in the history of cinematography.

THE "SALUKI."

A new breed of dog hitherto virtually unknown in this country, says the Manchester Guardian, was on view recently at the championship dog show at Holland Park Rink, London. This animal is the Saluki, or "gazelle hound," known to many as the "greyhound of the East." The home of the Saluki hound is among the nomadic tribes of the Arabian deserts. He is also well known in Egypt, Syria, and Mesopotamia, where he is used chiefly for gazelle hunting and for other quarry, such as jackals, foxes, and hares. In ordinary conformation the Saluki resembles the English greyhound, although he is a much fleetier animal and can travel at great speed over rough country as well as in deep sand. About a dozen specimens of the Saluki were exhibited. Brigadier-General Lance, who is perhaps the largest breeder in the country, imported his first pair of dogs a couple of years ago. These were presented to him by an Arab sheikh in Mesopotamia.

THE ARAB HORSE SOCIETY

A Council Meeting was held on April 10 at the Grosvenor Hotel, London. Lieut.-Colonel P. D. Stewart, D.S.O. (President) was in the chair.

Entries were accepted for Vol. III. of the Stud Book.

The statement of account of the London Show and Prize Fund was presented, and considered very satisfactory.

The Council had under consideration the resolution that had been passed by the Endurance Test Committee, namely, "That the Endurance Test be dropped, provided that one or more races can be arranged for this season." The report was unanimously adopted by the Council, and it was decided that races for Arabs and Arab-breds be forthwith arranged.

The following new members were elected: Lieut.-Col. E. C. Bayley, C.I.E., O.B.E., Captain J. L. K. Cockburn, Major H. R. P. Dickson, and MM. José Evaristo Uriburu, K.B.E., and Manuel Ysita y Rubio. Governor, Captain the Hon. G. Savile.

The next meeting was fixed for Wednesday, May 30, to be held at the Grosvenor Hotel, London.

A Lucknow message states that the results of the recent elections to the District Boards in the United Provinces show that the Non-Co-operators failed to secure a majority in any district.

THE MOSLEM RELIGION.

Dr. D. M. Kay's fifth lecture at Edinburgh University, in the series of six lectures which he is giving upon "The Semitic Religions," was entitled "The Moslem Religion," and delivered in St. Giles's Cathedral, Edinburgh, on March 23. We append a summary of it: The "golden-aired" Arabia requires from man intelligence and obedience as a condition for a precarious livelihood. The Semites differ from the rest of men, not because three sons are ascribed to Noah, but because the cradle of the whole family—Assyrians, Aramæans, Hebrews, Phenicians, Ethiopians—lay in the peculiar peninsula. There the sisterhood got their first lessons in language; in their separate homes they made little change on the roots with triple consonants, the skeleton of their verbs, their pronouns, and numerals. From before Hammurabi in Babylon Arabia's exports have included conquerors and religions.

Arabia is the birthplace and Mecca, the metropolis of the latest version of Semitic monotheism. When Mohammed began to preach (610 A.D.) Arabia had perhaps three or four million inhabitants, divided into scores of tribes who fought each other eight months per annum, resting for the fairs and the contests for prize poems. Ancestral star-worship with 360 idols at Mecca, legends told about the Jews who had settled on trade routes, a vague Jacobite Christianity known to few served for religion. At the death of Mohammed, 632 A.D., all the Arabs had been fused into unity by religious fervour, with no minorities left, and no relapse into idolatry.

This reformation is due to the personal experience of Mohammed; and by the same criteria on which Amos and Isaiah are accepted as prophets and St. Peter and St. Paul as apostles, Mohammed's sincerity, his reverence, his insistence on monotheism and the certainty of Divine Judgment entitle him to be called the Prophet of Arabia. His later practice and legislation, as ruler of Medina, have local and temporary elements less applicable to a universal religion.

The vitality of Islam may be measured by its success in persuading its adherents to abstain from the use of wine. Despite a climate which makes thirst irresistible, the Prophet formed a society of Total Abstinents, which is numbered by scores of millions and has lasted more than a thousand years. Each man must learn to govern his own appetites, desires, and instincts; no outside coercion can bestow on self the governance of what is proper to the self. Reason often fails in the task, though it foresees the disastrous results of indulgence. In a land where starvation is always imminent, the Prophet called the people to strenuous exercises with the pangs of hunger.

The growth and persistence, the loyalty of its adherents, and the intellectual revival that followed its first conquests sufficiently refute the common error that Islam owes its success to the sword. The real inference from early victories is that an Army which seriously practises religion marvelously increases its power.

Nine years' contact with the Turks, in peace and in war, constrains the lecturer to testify that Islam in action is potent for good, tolerant to other forms of religion, sober, honest, industrious. Any Government dealing with sedition powerfully abetted from abroad finds it difficult to maintain law and order. Foreign encouragement, with the best of intentions, has misled local factions to break the bonds of civic unity; and exaggerated reports, shamefully distorted for political ends, have embittered and disappointed all the races in Turkey. The religious all desire conciliation—Patriarchs, Grand Rabbi, Sheikh-ul-Islam know too well the dangers of civil tumult. The worst results are due to men who disregarded religion, and who in the name of Union and Progress tried to impose a democratic uniformity in education, language, and military training. Moslems suffered in common with other Turkish citizens from these decisions, and the Moslem religion has no responsibility for such effects.

Islam includes one-eighth of the human race, and seventy millions of these are in our British commonwealth of nations. British Christians owe to Islam the duty of honest study; condemnation based on ignorance is false to our own faith. The respect of Moslems and of ourselves for the virtues of Abraham was illustrated equally at the entry into Jerusalem of the Khalif Omar and of General Allenby.

THE YUGOSLAV DEADLOCK.

For once in a way the political situation in Yugoslavia appears to have defeated even the resourcefulness of M. Pashitch. The outside world has become accustomed to his frequent resignations, to be followed, as they almost invariably are, by a further summons from the King to resume the Premiership. It mattered little, therefore, whether his resignation of a few days ago was a formal step, in keeping with constitutional practice after a general election, or a tactical measure to strengthen the position of the Radicals. According to plan, M. Pashitch was again called upon to form a Cabinet, and it was supposed that, thanks to the political adroitness of which he is a past-master, he would contrive to remain in office in spite of the apparent hopelessness of the Parliamentary situation. The unexpected, however, has happened. M. Pashitch has declared himself unable to form a Ministry. Inasmuch as the indeterminate results of the last elections point to the necessity of a fresh appeal to the electorate, and as it is a considerable advantage in a Balkan State for a party to be in power when a general election is held, the failure of the veteran politician to accept office at this juncture suggests that the deadlock in Yugoslavia has taken a serious turn. The composition of the new Parliament prevents any party from securing a majority of votes. The chief rivals are the Radical Party under M. Pashitch, with one hundred and eight seats, and the Croat Agrarians under M. Raditch, with seventy seats. With the help of the Democrats, his former Allies, who now number only fifty-two, and a few Serbian individualists, M. Pashitch can count on a majority against a revision of the new Constitution on the lines proposed by M. Raditch; but the Democrats are themselves divided on a number of questions, and the Radicals could not be sure of adequate support on any other point than a straightforward trial of strength with the Croatian group. At the moment of writing it is anticipated that when M. Davidovitch, the Democrat leader, has also declared his inability to form a Government, a temporary solution of the deadlock will be sought in the appointment of a Cabinet of officials, to pass such laws as are urgently needed and then to hold another general election.

The point at issue between Serbians and Croats is whether the new Yugoslav kingdom shall be a highly centralised State—in effect a Greater Serbia—or a federation of autonomous States. M. Raditch himself is a Republican; at one time he was represented as being irreconcilably anti-Monarchist, and no doubt this is the opinion held of him by the majority of the Serbian electorate. According to his more recent declarations, however, while he is adamant on the necessity of Croatia being a Republic, he is prepared to see the Yugoslav federation under a Monarch, with two or three Federal Departments of State. When the Croatian leader found that M. Pashitch could not be prevented from carrying his centralised Constitution through the last Parliament, he withdrew all his followers from the sessions of the Assembly; but the futility of these tactics came to be recognised in Croatia, and, when his accredited representatives were recently sent to Belgrade to enter into conversations with M. Pashitch, it was hoped in many quarters that it might prove possible for Serbia and Croatia to devise a modus operandi which would be more favourable to the well-being of Yugoslavia than the existing state of affairs. While it has to be inferred that nothing will come of these negotiations, M. Raditch's own account of them is of special interest. Speaking at a congress of his Agrarian party held near Zagreb, M. Raditch is reported to have declared that he had informed the Serbians that in future neither the King nor the Royal Government would rule directly in Zagreb. The King could be the symbol of the union, but only if Serbians and Croats first came to an agreement. He went on to say that if Europe would not have anything to do with an independent Croatian people, the Croats could rely on two great friends, Germany and Russia. Croats and Russians would always be friends, and Croats would always be with the Germans, an industrious and enlightened people, provided that there was not an imperialist or militarist Government in Germany. When these two countries had become members of the League of Nations they would be able to make their voices heard on behalf of Croatia. An entente with Belgrade, he added, was very difficult, but not impossible. The Croats demanded their own national sovereignty, and wished to negotiate with the sovereign Serbian people, not with the King. In future the entire control of the administration must rest entirely with the peasants, and not with the "messieurs"; they would willingly put at the head of the different branches of the Administration competent people without reference to their political colour, but control would be reserved for the peasant.

It is this speech that has given rise in Serbia to demands for cutting the painter or for a declaration of war à outrance against the Croats, as enemies alike of the Serbians and of the Allies, and henchmen of the Germans and Bolsheviks. If M. Raditch's words have been correctly reported, a more dispassionate view would be that the situation was far from being hopeless. With feeling between Serbians and Croats running as high as it seems to be, it would surely be better for the interests of the Southern Slavs as a whole to allow Croatia to have her experience of Home Rule under a peasant Administration within the framework of a Yugoslav State, than that the country should remain indefinitely disabled by a political deadlock. It has to be remembered that at the recent elections practically the whole of Croatia sided with M. Raditch. Yugoslavia as a unified State can be a success only with the goodwill of its component parts. Regrettable as the attitude of Croatia may seem to the Serbians, they cannot overlook the fact that it was just this indomitable spirit of independence which kept alive the national feeling of the Southern Slavs in their dark days. That they should try to-day to take up the rôle of the Austro-Hungarian empire towards men of their own race is unthinkable and, unless they wish to place themselves in a false position, they must be able to show conclusively that federal autonomy for Yugoslavia is a greater evil than civil war. The argument that centralisation is essential to military efficiency carries no weight, as the military efficiency implied is unattainable with a hostile Croatia. Better a united and prosperous Yugoslavia, placing its defence in the hands of the League of Nations, than a Yugoslavia priding itself on its ability to rattle the sabre in the Balkans at the price of the unity of its people.

GREAT BRITAIN AND PERSIA.*

By COLONEL C. B. STOKES, C.I.E.

Anglo-Persian relations are the cause of some anxiety to Englishmen interested in Persia, and it is worth while to consider what is the present state of those relations, and to investigate the causes that have led up to it.

For a century or more before 1906 the Persian people were subject to two main forms of pressure, the one external (the aggression of Russia), the other internal (the oppression of a tribal autocracy). Against both forms of pressure Persians looked to Great Britain for assistance. Great Britain's abstinence during that century both from aggression against Persia and from undue interference in her internal affairs confirmed them in these views. The fact that in 1906 Persia, with British assistance, obtained her first Constitution, convinced them that they had judged Great Britain rightly and inspired in them the belief that, as by British help Persia had maintained her independence against Russian aggression and had obtained constitutional government, she would certainly receive the moral support of Great Britain in her endeavours to establish firmly a democratic form of government. Hardly, however, had Persians had time to taste the sweets of their new-found liberty when, in August, 1907, they learnt of the signature of the Anglo-Russian Agreement, and a few months later their Parliament was shelled by a force commanded by Russian officers. The effect produced on the minds of Persians by the publication of an agreement which partitioned their country and, by the first-fruits of that agreement, the destruction of their liberty, may, I think, be left to the imagination. After the bombardment of the Persian Parliament, the Persian Court, which for almost a century had secretly obeyed Russian orders, shed its mask. It now openly became the obedient servant of the Russian Government and its representatives in Persia.

In 1909 the Constitutionalists succeeded in taking Teheran, the Shañ abdicated, and the Persian Parliament again assembled. In whatever direction Persians sought to improve their administration, they found themselves confronted with difficulties created for them by Russia. The Russian Legation in Teheran and the Russian Consulates in Persia became the centres of a reactionary conspiracy against the Constitutional Government. In the provinces certain tribal leaders in Russian pay provoked disorders.

Despite all these difficulties, the Persians did not despair, and decided to engage the services of foreign advisers in order to reform their administration. Their choice fell on Americans, for either Russia or Great Britain or both vetoed the nations of almost all European countries. Mr. Morgan Shuster, with a small number of American advisers, arrived at Teheran in May, 1911, to endeavour to reform the financial administration of Persia. Among his plans for improving the financial administration was the formation of a small force sufficient to compel the payment of taxes to the Government. The post of Commander was offered to me, and with the consent of the Foreign Office,

I accepted it. The Persian Parliament approved; but the Russian Government strongly opposed my appointment, and the British Government, changing its mind, supported them. I accordingly came away. Mr. Shuster persevered in his reforms and obtained considerable success. This was intolerable to Russia, who now adopted other methods with the intention not only of driving Mr. Shuster out, but also of putting an end once for all to the efforts of the Persian Constitutionalists. To this end she organised expeditions under the deposed Shah and others against Persia. When these prove unsuccessful, she made a pretext of the demand by the Persian Government of payment of taxes due from a Persian Prince under Russian protection, and in December, 1911, presented an ultimatum to the Persian Government, demanding among other things the dismissal of Mr. Shuster and an undertaking that no foreign advisers should be engaged without the approval of Russia and Great Britain. Russian troops had already been in occupation of Kazvin for some time, and, failing acceptance of the ultimatum, were conveniently placed to advance on and occupy Teheran. The Persian Parliament, in its extremity, appealed to the British Government to mediate between it and Russia—Sir Edward Grey advised the Persian Government to accept the ultimatum. The Persian Government, aware that the Persian Parliament would never accept the ultimatum, with the moral support of Russia and the approval of Great Britain, dissolved the Parliament and accepted the ultimatum. Its next step was to expel from Teheran—in some cases from Persia—all the leaders of the Constitutional movement, whether democrats or moderates or whatever their party. Among them were practically all the best-known Anglophiles. The spectacle of the British Government's silent acquiescence in the expulsion, at Russian instigation, of its own best friends among Persians convinced Persians that it was a very dangerous thing to be Anglophil.

From this time forth Persians ceased to consider the friendship of Great Britain of any value for the maintenance of their independence, for the retention of their Constitution, as a support in their efforts to reform the administration of their country or even to secure their personal liberty against the brutality of Russian aggression.

It has been argued in defence of British policy at this time that it had to consider greater and more important interests, which compelled it to turn a blind eye to Russian brutality in Persia and to sacrifice that unhappy country on the altar of Russian friendship. To some people this policy may appear justifiable, but to Persians it could hardly be expected to appear in this light.

From the acceptance of the Russian ultimatum in December, 1911, until the outbreak of war in 1914 all Persian Cabinets were formed in accordance with lists furnished by the Russian and British Legations. In the face of this state of affairs, Persians who wished to preserve the independence and liberty of their country were unable to do anything. The more fanatical among them looked for the coming of the Twelfth Imam; the more moderate hoped for some upheaval in the world which should give Persia a chance of regaining her freedom. In this picture of gloom it is pleasant to come across a single ray of sunshine. The British Government, concerned at the disorderly condition of Southern Persia, saw its way to assist Persia to raise and maintain a Gendarmerie under Swedish officers. This force proved generally efficacious in the preservation of order, and enjoyed considerable popularity, in deep contrast to the hatred of the Cossack Brigade under Russian officers.

* Summary of an Address delivered before the Persia Society on April 25.

Then came the World War. Persians naturally hoped that in the outcome they might find an opportunity to free their country from the stranglehold of Russia. At the same time, they had no desire or intention to embark on any policy of adventure. The result was that Sir Walter Townley, the British Minister, without any difficulty obtained from the Persian Government a declaration of its neutrality. Unfortunately, despite this declaration, events occurred in Persia which led to Persia becoming an arena of the belligerents. Russia increased her forces in Azerbaijan, and moved them forward against the Turks. The Turks sent forces into Persia from Kurdistan and Mesopotamia. The British Government withdrew its support of the Gendarmerie, which was then left without pay. German agents, well provided with funds, arrived in Persia and commenced an active and effective propaganda in all parts of the country against Russia and Great Britain; and, finally, the British Government ceased to afford support, either material or moral, to the Persian Government, and occupied Bushire.

Some of the actions of the British Government mentioned here were undoubtedly the result of the arrival of German agents and the assistance given to them by Persians themselves in some parts of Persia; but it must be remembered that Great Britain and Russia had by their own policy of hostility to Persia prepared the ground all too well for Germany. The British Government now decided to raise a force of its own in Southern Persia under British officers. The South Persia Rifles came into being, and this force and the Indian troops which supported it undoubtedly served both British and Persian interests by maintaining order in the Southern provinces.

From 1915 onwards the Russian and British Legations again became the Cabinet makers of Persia, but they did not stop at Cabinets. Even minor appointments in the Administration were made at their bidding. Their creatures in the Cabinets were entirely subservient so long as they were permitted to fill their own pockets. At the same time, the two Legations obtained from the Persian Government its adhesion to the Anglo-Russian agreement of 1907, an adhesion which had not before been given.

Besides giving her adhesion to this Agreement, Persia further accepted a Commission of Control for Finance, consisting of two Persians, one Belgian, one Russian, and one British representative. These representatives drew for a considerable period from an almost bankrupt Government a very handsome salary, despite the fact that they succeeded in doing little or no work. Again, it was arranged that Persia should have one single force—in the north 11,000 men under Russian officers, in the south a similar number under British officers. This plan was in the process of being put into execution when the first revolution occurred in Russia, in March, 1917. The result in Persia was the fall of the Cabinet appointed by the Russian and British Legations, its place being taken by a Cabinet of Moderate Constitutionalists. Elections for the Parliament were announced. Persians were naturally delighted at their deliverance from the claws of Russia. But their pleasure was sadly marred when they realised, as they quickly did, that the aim of British policy now was to keep alive Russian influence and safeguard Russian interests in Persia.

A few months later came the advent to power of the Bolsheviks in Russia. Lenin and Trotsky announced to the Persian people that they denounced the Treaty of Turkomanchai, and the Anglo-Russian Agreement of 1907. They cancelled the stipulations of the Russian ultimatum of 1911.

they abolished the capitulations, and handed over to Persia the roads Russia had made and the port of Enzeli, the island of Ashurada, the Russia bank and its assets, cancelled all Persian debts to Russia, and restored all concessions obtained by Russia during the Tzarist régime. Russian troops were now ordered to evacuate Persia. Now, even admitting, which I personally do not, that British support of Russian aggression in Persia was justified by the desire to ensure Russian co-operation with France in the War, here was an opportunity for Great Britain to reconsider her attitude towards Persia, to study British rather than Russian interests, and to hold out the hand of friendship to Persia. But the British Government clung obstinately to its former policy, and remained blind to British interests. It appointed itself the guardian of Russian interests in Persia, and decided to use force where a little friendship and sympathy would have rapidly restored its own former influence. As the Russian troops retired, British troops advanced into Persia. Shortly before the Armistice British troops were in occupation of various points covering most of Persia. A Cabinet was formed under British pressure which, while not anti-British, in reality only served to make Persia anti-British. The Cabinet, and the Government nominated by it to the Provinces, occupied themselves with filling their pockets, and as it was notorious that they had come into power under British influence, it was inferred that they acted thus with British approval.

Then came the Armistice. A few months later the Cabinet I have described signed the new Anglo-Persian Agreement. Of the good intentions of the British Foreign Minister or the British Minister to Persia responsible for this Agreement I personally have not the slightest doubt. It appeared to be at the time the sole road to the salvation of the Persians. And I think that a certain number of Persian Constitutionalists, who are fully aware of the misfortunes of their country, are probably also of my opinion. But, unfortunately, several factors combined to prevent Persians generally believing in the good intentions of the British Government. These were:—(1) British policy towards Persia since 1907. (2) British support of notoriously corrupt Persian Ministers and Governors. (3) French and American propaganda, very vigorous propaganda, too, against the Anglo-Persian Agreement. (4) The free gifts to Persia by the Bolsheviks, as given in Lenin and Trotsky's declaration, and the Bolshevik condemnation of the Anglo-Persian Agreement. (5) The form of the Agreement itself which (a) fixed no period; (b) made no mention of ratification by the Persian Parliament; (c) apparently established a British monopoly in Persia, and yet gave no guarantee to defend Persia against any future aggression.

The Persian Government which cancelled the Agreement did so with the aim of improving Anglo-Persian relations and removing all misunderstandings. It decided at the same time to ask for the help of British, American, and other advisers with a view to a thorough reform of the Administration. Although this Government was strongly Anglophil, it found no support from Great Britain, and fell in three months. The result was to bring British influence in Persia to, perhaps, the lowest level it has ever reached. The interests of Persia suffered in proportion to the decline of British influence.

I do not for a moment pretend that during the course of all the events I have attempted to describe all Persian Governments always displayed the highest wisdom and judgment. They undoubtedly made mistakes and acted unwisely; but those mistakes, be they ever so numerous and ever so grave, afford no justification for the mistakes of British policy.

Our interests in Persia, moral and material, political and strategical, are of a very high order, and our best means of safeguarding them all will be to give our cordial sympathy and support to the aspirations of Persian democracy. What we have to prove to the Persian people is that our friendship is of real value to them. In order to secure and maintain British-Persian friendship:—

(1) We must make it quite clear that never again will we be a party to an Agreement such as that of 1907, partitioning Persia.

(2) We must carefully avoid supporting in any way the reactionary elements in Persia.

(3) If Persia asks for our assistance, for example, for advisers or officers for her forces, we should be prepared to help her.

I have dwelt at some length on what I consider should be British policy towards Persia, but so far have said nothing of what must be expected from Persia if she is to be started on the path of prosperity and progress. Persia has got to straighten out her internal difficulties herself. That she is capable of doing this, if not interfered with from outside, I am convinced. There exists among Persians a strong element which is desirous of putting an end to the many abuses which exist and forbid progress of any kind. That element is serious and determined, and, despite the many setbacks it has experienced, it will, undoubtedly, in the end succeed. Movements of this character cannot be repressed for ever.

COMMUNISM FOR COMMUNISTS.

While legislation of the "freak" variety is familiar from the records of numerous State legislatures in the United States of America, it is to be left apparently to Bulgaria to introduce the strictly humorous into the Statute Book. For some time Communism has been a thorn in the flesh of the Prime Minister, M. Stamboulisky; its ranks have been swollen on the one side by anarchists out-and-out, and on the other by a number of people who, in view of the fact that the Communists were for the moment the most formidable opponents of the Agrarian party, regarded it as a shrewd political move to support them in order to undermine M. Stamboulisky's position. As the elections that have just taken place promised to be the acid test of the Agrarian hold on the country, the Prime Minister conceived the ingenious idea of sifting the genuine from the spurious Communists. The anarchists were first dealt with, more Balkanico, in a way reminiscent of the measures by which Bulgaria forty years ago stamped out the brigand nuisance. They were rounded up by gendarmerie and soldiers, and the majority seem to have been executed immediately after being captured.

To deal with the less virulent type of Communist the Bulgarian Prime Minister announced that a law would be brought before the new Sobranie providing for the confiscation of the property of Communists in villages where the number of Communists exceeds ten, the confiscated property to be given to the communes. Now M. Stamboulisky is sufficiently well known as a man of his word to leave little doubt in the mind of the temporary Communist that such a law might be regarded as good as passed. It was to be inferred, therefore, that those who had previously voted Communist merely as the most effective way of showing themselves anti-Agrarian would think twice before exposing themselves to the risk of being treated as a genuine Communist. The collapse of the Communist party at the elections—they have now seventeen seats instead of fifty—suggests that M. Stamboulisky was not far wrong in his diagnosis of the situation.

To give point to the Bulgarian Government's threat, an authoritative draft of the proposed law was published, of which the following is a summary:—

Art. 1.—In every Bulgarian village where there are more than ten Communist electors a commune will be formed, and all the real property, goods and chattels of the partisans of Communistic theories will be confiscated for the benefit of the public.

Art. 2.—The present local Village Committees for the distribution of landed property will carry out the confiscation of cattle, houses, lands and all the utensils and household necessities.

Art. 3.—The communes will be administered by the commune authorities, composed of one representative of the Municipal Council of the village, of one representative of the Government, and of three men elected by the Communists, provided that no difference will be made between men, women, and children.

Art. 4.—It is the property of the Communists only that will be confiscated. The families whose property will be confiscated and all those who are adherents of Communism will constitute the future commune. If there are only some brothers or sons amongst the members of a family who are Communists, then only that part of the property of the family will be confiscated which must later belong to the aforesaid brothers or sons according to the Law of Estates.

Art. 5.—All the members of the said commune will have to live in commune houses and on equal terms—i.e., as will be settled by the local authorities of the commune. They will have to work during fixed hours, in groups, under the control of a superintendent, and they will have to obtain their goods and clothing only by means of coupons and only from the shop belonging to the said commune. Anybody who misappropriates the property of the commune or starts to live in a way different from that fixed for all members of the commune will be liable to execution in a public place.

Art. 6.—The present law will come into force together with a statute containing all the particulars about the said law, which will be in strict conformity with the principles and methods of Russian Communism. The application of this law will begin six months after it has been voted. Meanwhile, the lists of the names of the Communists and of their property must be drawn up.

Concessions in Turkey.

The Glasgow Herald of April 25 points out that as the early stages of the first Lausanne Conference were dominated by the idea of oil, so it seems the corresponding period of the second conference is to be dominated by that of concessions. For popularising these interpretations of the Conferences the Turk, it says, is mainly responsible. The dispute over Mosul was intended by the Turk to create bad blood between Britain and France and America; and again in the publicity given to the Chester Concession the object is to embroil France with the United States. But if straightforward and conciliatory methods are applied to the question of concessions, it sees no reason why a settlement should not be obtained. It disapproves strongly of the intervention of Governments over the concessions, "for the different Powers would inevitably be led to champion to the full the claims of their nationals, and commit themselves to positions from which they would afterwards find it difficult to retreat":—

On the other hand, if no official cognisance be taken meantime at Lausanne of the matter, its ultimate appearance on the agenda will be attended with much less danger, for the progress of the Constantinople negotiations must clear away the obscurity still remaining regarding the real extent of the Chester concession, and the manner in which the Turks propose to deal with the apparent conflict between it and the Périer (French) concession of 1914. If it becomes evident that the Turks are unwilling to consent to any compromise, but intend to flout the French claim, which seems to be well founded, then there will be time, before they are called on to take a definite stand, for the Allied Powers to consult among themselves and with the United States in order that a common concession policy, doing justice both to Admiral Chester and the Allied groups interested, may be evolved. In this, as in so many other matters, peace and safety are to be sought by co-operation, not by rivalry à outrance between nations. . . . Turkey is now in every way less favourably situated than she was five months ago: concessions disputes are her last hope of sowing dissension among the Powers and reaping her traditional benefit. Surely the intended victims will not be so foolish as to walk into a trap so patently set for them.

NOTES AND NEWS.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The Alliance Bank of Simla.

There will be general regret that Sir David Yule's heroic efforts to save the Alliance Bank of Simla have failed, and that an institution so long and honourably known in Northern India has had to close its doors. The event really marks the end of an epoch in Indian banking. At one time it seemed probable that most of the internal business of the country, other than that handled by the Presidency banks, would pass into the hands of banks established by Englishmen or Scotsmen in various up-country centres, but the crash of the 'nineties eliminated most of these, and eventually only two were left. One of these has now disappeared; the other, the Allahabad Bank, has changed its nature and strengthened its position by affiliating with the P. and O. Corporation and transferring its headquarters to Calcutta. The energy displayed by the Imperial Bank of India, the successor of the Presidency banks, in opening branches all over the country, makes it improbable that any new institutions of this type will be established to replace the old, while the future of banks under purely Indian management must still be regarded as uncertain. The requirements of the country's internal trade are, however, steadily growing, and, in spite of what has been accomplished, the need for extended banking facilities remains urgent.

Slow Progress at Lausanne.

The one fact that has emerged so far from the negotiations at Lausanne is that the Conference is not likely to be a short business. There are at present two conferences in progress—the one at Lausanne, the other an unofficial one in Turkey between representatives of the Allies and of Angora, in regard to certain matters over which the first conference came to grief. What happens at the unofficial pourparlers must have its effect on Lausanne, and until their issue is known it would be premature to speculate on the course things will take at the other Conference. One cannot help feeling, indeed, that it is to be regretted that the business interests concerned were not allowed to complete their part of the negotiations before Lausanne commenced.

The Roumanian Loan Success.

The outstanding success of the Roumanian Four per cent. Loan has been one of the most noteworthy features of the week. The loan was issued at 67, and the bonds are redeemable within a comparatively short period by drawings commencing this year, and thus, while the actual interest is not out of the ordinary, the investor has a very reasonable prospect of having an exceptional return on his holding. Even so, it was open to doubt whether an adequate response would be forthcoming in view of the rather speculative character of the issue. As it happened, the money required was readily subscribed, the lists being closed on the afternoon of the day they were opened. I shall probably not be very far wrong if I assume that very considerable support for the loan was forthcoming from the numerous oil companies interested in Roumania. Whether that be so or not, the result is most gratifying as showing that, despite the adverse conditions in the Near East, it is still possible for a Balkan country to raise a loan on the London market at a reasonable rate of interest.

Astra-Romana Profits.

As indicating the possibilities of the Roumanian oilfields, I would direct attention to the notable results obtained by the Astra-Romana Company for the past year. This concern made net profits of 435,952,000 lei, as compared with 228,000,000 lei for 1921, and it is proposed to pay a dividend of 30 per cent. and to double the capital, which now stands at no more than 225,000,000 lei, or little more than half the net profits!

No Palestine Loan Yet.

A statement made recently in Parliament gave rise to the belief in some quarters that the issue of the long-expected Palestine loan was imminent. There is, as a matter of fact, little prospect of the loan being issued until conditions in Palestine are more settled. It was anticipated that by now, as a result of the elections, the Legislative Assembly would be in a position to ratify the loan: but for the moment it is impossible to say when that body will come into being.

Indian Railway Tenders.

Not the least satisfactory feature of the British industrial position at the present time is the fact that our engineering firms are more than holding their own in regard to tenders for Indian railway supplies. As is well known, every effort is being made to develop industries in India, while our firms cannot look for any preference as against external competitors, the policy of India being to buy in the cheapest market, so that it is a question of outbidding rivals if the business is to come to this country. It is extremely satisfactory to know that that is what is happening. As an instance of this, I would cite the recent invitation of the Railway Board for tenders for several thousand wagons. Altogether, forty-four firms tendered, the Continental countries and America being represented, and the tenders of the British firms were easily the lowest, being, in respect of one class of wagon, 50 per cent. below the first Indian tender, after allowing for freight and Customs duty.

The Outlook for Shipping.

Referring to the outlook for shipping in his speech at the general meeting of the Cunard Steam Ship Company last week, Sir Thomas Royden, Bart., said that he could not say that the immediate prospect was cheerful. The political situation in Europe, and the restrictions on immigration, would continue to have a most adverse effect on earnings. Further, he pointed out, freight rates continued to be a diminishing factor, and it was fairly evident that shipping would continue to experience hard times until general conditions approached more nearly to the normal.

Competition in Orange Growing.

As I believe I pointed out in these columns not very long ago the Jaffa orange growers are no longer in a position to look to the world's markets with the same equanimity as before the war, for competition has increased, and South Africa in particular aims at being a serious rival as an orange-growing country. In this connection my readers will notice in this issue an advertisement of one of the companies now calling attention to the prospects of the South African orange industry.

Oil Notes and News.

THE OIL INDUSTRY OF BAKU.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

During the last few months the oil output in Baku has been keeping on the same level, namely, about 270,000 tons a month. The record output for the whole period of the existence of the nationalised industry was attained in January, showing 283,000 tons. In February the production was 266,000 tons, and in the first half of March 139,000 tons. The total output during these months is approximately 10 per cent. higher than that of last year for the same period. Notwithstanding this improvement, Baku is not able to satisfy the monthly requirements of 320,000 tons. The output in the record month constituted only 41 per cent. of the pre-revolutionary production. In 1916 Baku used to give a monthly average of 685,000 tons.

The improvement in the output is due exclusively to the increased number of wells under operation and the developments in the boring. The administration of the nationalised industry of Baku is straining all its efforts in this direction. However, the results are not very brilliant. There were 3,000 wells in exploitation before the revolution. In May, 1920, when the Bolsheviks seized Baku, 1,800 wells were working. During the first year of operation of the nationalised industry this figure fell to 1,200 and rose again to 1,450 by the beginning of the current year. It was the same with the boring works. Before the revolution about 4,500 sazhen* were bored every month. In January of the current year, when the boring attained the highest figures, only 1,577 were bored and only 80 per cent. of the proposed programme was executed. The development of the boring depends on a general reparation of the entire plant of the oil works, and particularly of the power stations. This requires, however, a certain amount of money which the Baku industry lacks completely.

At the present moment the financial question is the fundamental one for the Baku works, as it is for the entire Soviet industry. If the institutions managing this branch of industry succeed in obtaining credits, then it will be possible to increase the production; if not, the output will suffer a further reduction, as the old wells are becoming exhausted.

Whether an increase of production is advantageous is another question. Up to now the position of the nationalised oil industry of Baku was such that each ton of oil produced increased the losses of the entire industry. The industry has not shown a deficit up to now for the reason that the old stocks of oil were being sold, thus helping to cover the balance of the losses over the profits in the current production. From October, 1921, to October, 1922, besides the current production, which amounted to about 2.8 million tons, about 1.6 million tons of the old stocks were consumed. There are no more old stocks, the consumption of which threatens to create an oil famine in Russia. If hitherto the Soviet Government has at times experienced a shortage of oil, it has been owing to bad transport conditions. But at present the monthly output of oil, even in January (a record month), is 16 per cent. below the existing relatively modest demand for Baku oil. Another result of the using up of the old stocks will be the necessity for the Baku industry to find the requisite funds for the current production. The Economicheskaya Zhizn of April 6 contains a report on the situation of the Baku oil industry, showing that the cost price of oil at present as expressed in gold is at least twice as high as it was before the war, and that up to now Baku oil has been sold on the home market at a price which is by 20 to 30 per cent. below the cost price. The report explains this circumstance partly by deficient calculations, and partly by the low fixed prices at which the administration of the Baku industry is compelled to sell the oil to the State institutions which are its chief consumers.

Something must be done to cover the losses of such trading. Up to now that has been done, as I have shown, by the sale of the old stocks of oil. In the future, they will have to be covered by credits or simply by State subventions from the funds of the Soviet Treasury. For the current year loans to the amount of 22.8 million roubles have been assigned as a subsidy to the entire Soviet oil industry; out of these the principal part will fall to the share of Baku. Thus, not only the development, but also the continuation of the oil production in Baku depends on how long the Soviet Government will be able to finance this branch of industry, which, ever since its nationalisation, has been running at a loss.

CYPRUS OIL TRUST.

In a circular to the shareholders the directors of the Cyprus Oil Trust state that cable advices from Trinidad announce that the whole of the preliminary operations upon the company's No. 1 well (Fyzabad) are now completed. The well site has been cleared and derrick erected; the construction of the road and bridge to the well site have been completed; engines and boiler are now in position. Actual drilling commenced on April 25.

Cotton and Cotton Goods.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Business Very Restricted.

The Commercial Company of Egypt, in their report for the week ended April 20, state:—

Since our last report the futures market has once more been rather disappointing, and to the previous week's firmness has succeeded a series of inactive and weak sessions. The recent severe drop in the New York market and the almost complete absence of fresh business with spinners have affected our market unfavourably, and have induced last week's bull operators to liquidate their positions hurriedly. The large daily sales of Egyptian cotton in Liverpool have not affected our market as most of the cotton consigned to Liverpool this year has been hedged with Liverpool futures, and its sale has not consequently given any direct support to our market here. Stocks in Liverpool are much larger than a year ago, and in consequence prices in Liverpool are considerably cheaper than in Alexandria, and spinners are induced thereby to cover their requirements in that market. Ashmouni futures have again enjoyed a fair demand, and the difference in price with Sakellarides has narrowed a great deal. The main reason of this firmness is the fact that the April position is very strongly held. The arrivals from the interior have again this week been smaller than the exports, and the stock in Alexandria shows a further reduction, and stands now at 1,790,358 kantars, against 2,261,160 kantars a year ago.

Spot.—We have had a week of poor markets at Minet-el-Bassal. The amount of business done is only about half of last week's, and the demand from abroad has dropped off considerably. Arrivals are rather larger than last week, but this is to be expected as ginning ceases on 30th instant. Sales for the week amount to about 5,000 B/s., of which we estimate 3,600 B/s. Sakellarides, 1,300 B/s. Uppers, 50 B/s. Brown, and 50 B/s. White.

Sakellarides.—Most of the business has been in medium and low grades, though some sales of the better qualities have been effected. Prices of spot against futures are a little dearer.

Uppers have been rather neglected, but all styles have been dealt in to a limited extent. Prices of spot against contract show very little change.

White and Brown.—A retail business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts for Brown are unchanged, but for white are rather dearer than last week.

Crop.—The weather continues cold and is not favourable; the delay in the development of the plant is fairly serious, and the percentage of failures reported this year is on average larger than in any previous years. The improvement of the White Nile gauges continues, and this is very important in view of the fact that it is upon this tributary that the summer water supply mainly depends.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Egyptian in Good Demand.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended April 25:—

The demand in this department has continued good, and a steady business has again been reported. During the first few days the weakness of futures proved an unsettling influence on prices, but latterly these have hardened again, and, we might add, considerable resistance to the decline has been noticeable in spot prices throughout the week. No fresh feature of any importance has transpired, and inquiry has been, generally speaking, on the customary stereotyped lines. Sakellaridis, "pass price to 50 on contracts," has been freely bought, and certain firms who, earlier in the season, had the foresight to import this cotton on a profitable basis are now presumably reaping their reward. The available supply would appear to be ample for all reasonable requirements. The demand for the better styles of Sakellaridis has not been maintained. Uppers have been in considerable request, but supplies of reasonable cotton are very limited, and the basis more than holds its own. Most of it, as we have previously pointed out, is hedged in the American market, and as the market drops holders show a tendency to raise the basis on which they are offering, rather than allow buyers the full advantage of the drop. This tendency has rather checked business in this particular quarter. Fully good fair to good uppers are being offered here to-day at about 16½d. per lb., or about 200 points on May American. An improved business has been noted in Sudan cotton and low cottons, 7d.-9d., have also received more support. Brown, pilon, and white cotton have all witnessed a better inquiry, with occasional transactions resulting. Slightly more c.i.f. business has filtered through from Manchester, but this part of the trade is still proceeding at a very slow pace. Forwardings to spinners for the week ended 20th inst. were returned as 9,714 bales. Total sales, 5,100 bales (includes 300 Sudan). Quotations on balance are reduced 10 points. Fully good fair Sakellaridis to-day 17.25d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Improved Business in Cloth.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended April 28 states:—

There is said to have been inquiry of a rather more extensive nature during the past week than had been the case recently; but, as only too often before, much of it proves to have been at impracticable prices. Nevertheless, it is probable that the actual business placed on order books shows a slight improvement.

The outstanding event of the week has been the announcement of the suspension of a very old and large firm of shippers to the Far East. Whilst it has been known for some time past that they were in difficulties, it was hoped that the measures taken would have enabled them to carry on. It is to be feared that the uncovered liabilities will be heavy.

Yarn.—Though very little increase of business can be reported, inquiry is said to have been on a slightly bigger scale, particularly as regards Egyptian spinnings. Low-class yarn is meeting with poor demand. Some orders have been booked for the Levant in the special varieties which that market calls for. Shipments last month were 13,030,000 lb., against 10,881,600 lb. in February and 18,750,700 in March last year.

Cloth.—Some firms have been able to book rather better business, but this experience is by no means general. The Near East continues to take larger quantities, but China and India are still much below normal, whilst South America and the home trade continue to buy from hand to mouth. Shipments last month amounted to 337,411,500 sq. yds., against 342,558,500 sq. yds. in February and 303,857,500 sq. yds. in March last year.

Raw Cotton.—This section remains in an unsettled state, although fluctuations have not been so violent as in recent weeks. Sales in Liverpool have been on a small scale. Closing prices are as follows:—American Fully Middling, 15.56d.; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 17.15d.

THE NEW MONGOLIA.

Latest Addition to P. and O. Fleet.

The new Australian mail and passenger steamer Mongolia, the latest to be completed of the P. and O. Company's post-war ships, ran a series of trials on the measured mile off the Tyne on April 26, and afterwards left for a short cruise in the North Sea before proceeding to Tilbury.

Lord Inchcape, the chairman of the P. and O. and British India Companies, attended the trials, and was accompanied by Mr. G. F. Hotblack, the Hon. Kenneth Mackay, Mr. A. M. Monteath, and Sir Montagu C. Turner, directors; Mr. F. J. Abbott, secretary; Mr. C. G. Deane, naval architect; Mr. R. Leslie, O.B.E., superintendent engineer; Mr. W. Taylor, Mr. H. Hill, Mr. D. J. Muirhead, Mr. F. H. Grosvenor, Mr. F. A. Hook, Mr. A. Moore, and other officials of the P. and O. Company. The party included Sir Glyn West, chairman; Mr. John Noble and Mr. A. Cochrane, directors; Mr. H. G. Williams, general manager; and Mr. R. Hinchliffe, naval architect, of Messrs. Sir W. G. Armstrong, Whitworth and Co., the builders of the ship; Sir Archibald Ross and Mr. John T. Batey, of Messrs. Hawthorn, Leslie and Co.; Mr. C. Bush, Continental traffic manager, London and North-Eastern Railway; Mr. Presket and Mr. Austin, respectively naval architect and superintendent engineer of the Cunard Company; and representatives of the Board of Trade, Lloyd's, and the British Corporation.

The Mongolia bears the name of a P. and O. steamer well known in the Australian trade, which was lost in the war through contact with an enemy mine within a few hours' steaming of Bombay. The new Mongolia, like her sister ship the Moldavia, presents a variation from the type of previous ships designed for the P. and O. Company's Australian mail line. Of the same tonnage and length as the Naldera and Narkunda, she will carry a lesser number of passengers, her berthing plan providing for 214 first and 180 second class passengers, a total of 394, who will be accommodated on the promenade, shade, and shelter decks.

The first and second saloon promenade decks afford ample spaces for games, dancing, or other forms of exercise or entertainment. The cabins are generally on the Inchcape plan, each having access by its own porthole or portholes to outside light and air. On the promenade deck are the first-saloon music and smoking rooms, lying respectively fore and aft of a range of fourteen single or two-berth cabins with, amidships, baths, etc. The music-room is a handsome apartment, panelled in sycamore and surmounted by a stained-glass dome. The furniture, in french-polished mahogany, contrasts well with the soft tones of the mural woodwork. The first-saloon smoking-room is walled in oak of the earlier English period, with mouldings and small panels; the columns supporting the glass dome are encased in oak; the ceiling beams are enriched with ornaments and finished in flat white, and comfortably upholstered oaken furniture completes the room's equipment.

Opening out from the after-end of the music-room is a well-furnished verandah café. On the boat deck above are the cabins and bathrooms of the officers and engineers. Midway on the shade deck there are placed, port and starboard, ranges of cabins for one or more occupants, with an ample installation of bathrooms, etc. Here at the forward end are purser's cabin and offices and a spacious lounge or entrance hall; at the after end are the surgeon's cabin, the dispensary, and hospital cabins. There is, besides, an isolation hospital, fitted independently for male and female patients, at the extreme after-end of the promenade deck beneath the docking bridge. Farther aft on the shade deck are the broad second-saloon promenade and the second music and smoking-rooms. The interior of the smoking room is walled in oak in small square panels. The music saloon, furnished in french polished mahogany, is canopied by an encased ceiling in flat white decorated with enriched mouldings.

On the forward portion of the shelter deck, again, are first saloon single-berth and other cabins, with alleyways opening aft on to the main companion and the dining saloon. The latter extends through the width of the vessel, is lighted by twenty large windows, and offers seating for 228 diners at restaurant tables, arranged for two, four, eight, or ten persons. Further aft on the same deck is the second dining saloon, where 180 persons may dine at a sitting. The room is pleasingly decorated, and the furniture is of french polished mahogany, upholstered in moquette. Ample natural ventilation is provided throughout the ship, and is reinforced by a generous outfit of electrical ventilating fans in saloons, cabins, and bathrooms. The passenger accommodation generally is characterised by comfort and coolness, as befits a ship designed for travellers in the tropics; and in the public rooms by a restful scheme of interior decoration, which will gratify the restrained taste of Eastern voyagers.

Horizontal and vertical sliding watertight doors are fitted in the watertight bulkheads below the shelter deck, and these are so arranged that they may be worked by hand or from the bridge by the Stone-Lloyd hydraulic system. The Mongolia's holds are to a large extent insulated for the carriage of refrigerated Australian produce. She is capable of stowing a cargo of 13,500 tons deadweight, and possesses large cargo hatchways and an outfit of cargo lifting gear which includes twenty-three tubular steel derricks, one of which is capable of a lift of 30 tons. The vessel is propelled by twin-screws actuated by double reduction geared turbine machinery manufactured by the builders. The ship and her engines have been constructed from designs prepared in consultation with the P. and O. Company's naval architect, Mr. C. G. Deane, and their superintendent engineer, Mr. Robert Leslie, O.B.E. She is commanded by Captain Asbury, and will leave London on her maiden voyage to Australia on May 11.

ACTIVITY IN INDUSTRIALS.

The Roumanian Loan.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Monday Night.

To-day, possibly because of the Stock Exchange holiday to-morrow, which has the effect of breaking the week up inconveniently, a very uncertain tone has prevailed except in a few sections, and in some cases, indeed, there has been an almost general easing off in prices. On the whole, however, the week has not been unfavourable for the markets, and it has seen a very notable broadening out of the activity which has been so much in evidence for months in the gilt-edged group; this activity has now spread to the Industrials, and promises, if indications are anything to go by, to extend to other sections.

The week has been notable for the issue of the Roumanian Four per Cent. Loan, the success of which has come very much as a surprise to some who doubted whether a Balkan loan could be successfully floated here except at an impossible rate after the experiences of recent years. Admittedly the loan is not without its attractions, offering as it does a large return to those who are fortunate enough to have their bonds redeemed at an early date. The loan, by the way, now stands at a good premium, which suggests that the money might have been obtained on slightly less generous terms.

Gilt-Edged Higher.

Despite the dullness of the market to-day, gilt-edged made a very good showing on the week. Consols have risen to 59½, a gain of ¾, War Loan Fives are 101½ xd.; the Conversion Loan at 80 15-16 is a point up, while Fundings at 92½ have gained ¼. Indian stocks have been steady. The Three per Cent. Loan is ¼ up at 60½, the 5½ per Cent. Loan is unchanged at 103¾, while the Seven per Cent. Loan has gained ¼ at 120.

The market in Foreign Government securities has been rather inactive. French stocks have been markedly firm. War Loan Fives are a point up at 31½, while the Four per Cents. are ¼ up at 24½. German Three per Cents. are unchanged at 15s., while Italian Rentes remain at 22½. In Near Eastern securities Turkish Unified have weakened, and at 26½ are ¾ down. Greek Monopolies have been a firm spot, and at 41½ are a point up.

Industrials Cheerful.

The buoyancy in the Industrial group which developed last week has continued, and there has, indeed, been a general expansion of activity, which is to be attributed in the main to the fact that the rise in gilt-edged has rendered necessary new channels for investment. Tobaccos have again been a good spot, Bats being 95s., while Imperial Tobaccos are 2s. up at 88s. 3d. Textiles have been firm, with Courtaulds 9d. up at 73s. 3d., while Coats are 6d. down at 69s. In Iron and Steel shares Armstrongs have gained 6d. at 19s. ex div., Vickers are 6d. up at 16s. 3d., while Guest Keens at 44s. 9d. are 1s. 6d. down. Shipping securities have been firm. P. and O. Deferred at 340 are 25 up, Cunards are 1s. down at 22s. 6d., while Furness Withys at 35s. 3d. are 9d. up. In Bank shares Chartered at 20½ are ½ up, National of India at 47½ are ¼ down, Imperial of Persia at 7½ are 3-16 up, while Westminster at 18½ have gained ½.

Oils Dull.

The Oil market has been rather dull. Anglo-Persian Ord. at 4 1-16 are ½ down, while Burmahs at 5 17-32 are 1-32 lower. Among Egyptians Anglo-Egyptian B at 1½ have shed 1-16. In the Roumanian group Phoenix at 1 13-32 are 1-32 up, Dacia Romanos at 1 3-32 are also 1-32 up, while Steaua Romanas are unchanged at 8s. 9d.

FOREIGN EXCHANGES.

Movements of the exchanges during the past week have not been very notable. French francs are fractionally better at 68.60, while German marks are worse at 150,000. In Near Eastern exchanges Yugoslav dinars are slightly better at 440, Turkish piastres are 770 as against 737, while Bulgarian leva are now 625.

LONDON PRODUCE REPORT.

Further Advance in Sugar.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

Sugar.—Home refined has continued in good demand. Tate's cubes are 1s. up at 71s. 9d. Lyle's granulated has come to business at 66s. 4½d., a rise of 1s. 1½d.; while London granulated has been done at 66s. 4½d., at which it is 1s. 1½d. up. Foreign descriptions have been firm. West Indian crystallised is 1s. 9d. up at 60s. 6d.; white Mauritius has gained 1s. at 62s. 6d.; while white Java is 9d. up at 63s. 6d. Futures are:—August, 36s. 3d.; December, 28s. 7½d.

Coffee.—The market has been steady. East Indian is unchanged at 112s., Costa Rica remains at 108s., Nairobi is unaltered at 93s., while Santos is 1s. lower at 73s.

Rice.—A quiet tone has prevailed, and the position generally is much the same as in the previous week. Spanish Japan is slightly harder.

Green Fruit.—The demand for oranges has eased off considerably, and if supplies were up to the normal there would have been a sharp decline in prices. As it is, the market is fairly stable. Quotations are:—Jaffas, 19s. box (144's); Denias and Valencias, 22s. 6d. to 50s. box (240's to 504's). The position with regard to lemons remains much the same. Quotations are:—10s. to 16s. box (300's), 18s. 6d. to 35s. case (300's). Very large supplies of apples are now available, but the market remains quite firm. Egyptian onions continue in good demand.

Dried Fruit.—Business has again been brisk, particularly as regards currants, which have been in great demand, and the prices of which are consequently higher. Sultanias have been a good spot, and rates have advanced. Plums have continued to move off freely, while figs have been in improved request.

Oilseeds.—Linseed has been weak, Indian being 3d. lower at 21s. 7½d., while La Plata is unchanged at 20s. 6d. Rapeseed has been steady. Toria is unchanged at 18s. 1½d., while real bold Ferozepore is 3d. up at 17s. Cottonseed has been variable. Indian is 1½d. down at 9s. 10½d., Egyptian black is 6d. up at 12s. 6d., while Sakellarides is 1½d. up at 11s. 9d.

Oils.—Linseed has been very weak, closing at 49s. 6d., a decline of 2s. Rape oil has been steady, crude being 45s.; while technical refined is 48s. Cotton oil has been rather dull. Refined common edible is 47s., Egyptian crude is 43s., technical is 45s., while deodorised is 44s.

Oil Cakes.—There has been a further decline in oil cakes. Linseed cake has shed 20s. at 220s., cottonmeal cake is unchanged at 230s., but coconut cake is 10s. down at 150s., while cottonseed cake is also 10s. lower at 120s.

CROP CONDITIONS IN IRAK.

Large Demand for Cotton Seed.

The following extracts are taken from the Agricultural Bulletin of Irak for the month ended March 15:—

Favourable rains during the period under review have improved considerably the condition of standing crops of wheat and barley and also the desert vegetation. On the Lower Euphrates the condition of winter cereals is good. In the unirrigated tracts of Upper Irak the area under wheat and barley is approximately the same as last year, but the crop is backward. In the Amarah district, wheat and barley crops are reported to be backward, mainly due to late germination. Grazing is plentiful, and the condition of live stock is generally good. Silt clearance in canals has made good progress. In general, wheat and barley sowings are much more backward than last year, both in the irrigated and unirrigated tracts, but the success of the crop will largely depend on favourable rains and good floods during spring.

The collection of soil samples by the Assistant Chemist on the Saklawiyah irrigated area has been interfered with owing to the rains. The rapid accumulation of salt in this newly-canalised area is giving cause for much anxiety. Most of the time of the plant breeder was confined to the breeding of imported types of wheat. About 530 strains are under cultivation. Many of these strains are artificial crosses between Irak wheats and foreign wheats. The object of this work is to combine the characters of rust resistance, early maturity, heavy yield, and bread-making qualities. The work promises well, but, as with all work in the research section, it suffers from the inadequacy of the subordinate staff to meet the demands of the heavy statistical work involved.

Cultural operations for the current season's experimental cotton work at the Central Experimental Station, Rustam, are completed, and sowing has commenced. Interesting and valuable results are apparent from those data collected in 1922, which have as yet been analysed. Valuable information has been collected regarding the suitability or otherwise of a large number of foreign trees grown from seed imported the previous year. Over 10,000 tree seedlings have been disposed of, and the demand has been considerably in excess of this.

There has been a very marked increase in the demand for cotton seed compared with last year. The total demand is approximately 80 tons, which should suffice to grow about 6,000 acres, but this area will have to be reduced, owing to the demands of some cultivators being in excess of their available supply of water. A pleasing feature of the current season's work is the general desire among cultivators and landowners to cultivate the land properly, to sow the cotton in season, and, in general, to give the crop proper attention. Some of the more enterprising landowners who normally grow rice are now realising that greater profits can be expected from cotton owing to the higher duty of water for this crop. There is a notable increase in the demand from landowners to plough their cotton land on contract by tractors supplied by one of the commercial firms in Baghdad.

One hundred packets of silk worm eggs were imported from France and three hundred and one from Italy for the current season's work. All the French eggs arrived intact. Of the Italian eggs 48 per cent. had hatched en route. A charge of Rs.7 per packet of one ounce is being made to the cultivators to cover costs. The demand for the eggs is not as brisk as anticipated, owing to the fears expressed by cultivators that the revenue demand will prevent the work from being undertaken at a profit. This matter is being investigated, with the view to reducing the revenue demand until the industry is well established. The silk that was produced on an experimental scale last year has proved to be of high quality, and it is confidently believed that the industry will extend rapidly, provided it is given a reasonable amount of support by Government in its initial stage. Experiments are being conducted by the Entomological Section on the breeding of Eri silk worm, which feeds on the leaves of the castor plant. In India this is a profitable industry, which produces a silk commonly known as "tussore."

A rough survey of the locust-breeding areas in Mosul seems to indicate that the locust outbreak in the coming season will be severe. It is probable that, owing to the lateness of the cereal crop, large areas will be devastated. The locusts have already started hatching. An officer has been deputed to assist in destroying the swarms.

The prohibition of the importation of sugar and glucose into Egypt has been withdrawn as from May 10.

The directors of the Egyptian Markets recommend a final dividend of 5 per cent. for 1922 on the ordinary shares. The meeting will be held on May 30.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS

The following extracts are taken from recent reports received by the Imperial Ottoman Bank:—

Haifa, March 31.

The market in cereals, sesame, and dari remains firm, and the demand from abroad continues satisfactory at favourable prices.

Haifa, April 7.

The market in cereals, sesame, and dari remains firm, and business has again been active, but sellers have had to make considerable reductions on the higher prices ruling at the end of last week.

Zahlé, March 31.

On the whole the economic situation here has not improved. Business transactions, which were restricted during the months of January and February on account of the inclemency of the season, were more frequent at the beginning of the spring and towards Easter. Prices for cereals have undergone no appreciable changes. There have been some orders for cereals from the hill district, but the rates have not been affected because of the excellent forecasts for the next harvest. Little business has been transacted in cotton with Beyrout, that town being sufficiently stocked.

Business on the railway Maalak-Zahlé has been normal. Cereals, wine, and arack have been forwarded to Beyrout. The products from this town have consisted specially of cotton goods, petrol, benzine, rice, coffee, and building materials. The products of Aleppo, Hamah, Homs, and Damascus are represented chiefly by butter, onions, and cereals, and the shipments for these towns are wine and arack.

In spite of the diminution in the purchasing power of the Syrian pound, prices for food products have not increased. On the other hand, a new average increase of from 2 to 5 per cent. has been registered on articles imported into the country at a high rate of exchange.

The National Electric Light Co. has installed a motor giving four times the force of the old motor, thus providing the lighting of the whole of Maalak at the same time as Zahlé. The landed proprietors of the region are much interested in the study made by the Public Works Department for the irrigation of the Plain of Bekaa.

Hamadan, March 10.

Wheat is selling at 230 krans to 260 krans per khawar of 400 kilos, and barley at 130 to 180 krans per khawar. There is a steady demand. Granulated sugar is selling at 9½ krans per batman of 3 kilos. Loaf sugar is selling at 12 krans per batman of 3 kilos. There are very few buyers. Cotton is selling in sufficiently important quantities for export to Russia. Prices vary between 10 to 12 krans per batman of 3 kilos. The exchange market is quiet—sterling offerings exceed rupee purchases, and the market is affected by the shortage of money.

Jaffa, March 31.

The prices obtained for oranges in the United Kingdom have fallen 2s. 6d. to 3s. per case. If the low prices continue the orange exporters will lose on the year's business.

AGRICULTURAL BANK OF EGYPT.

The report of the directors on the working of the bank for 1922-23, submitted to the shareholders at the twentieth ordinary general meeting of the bank in Cairo on April 25, states:—The directors have to report that the net profits of the bank for the financial year 1922-23, established in accordance with article 40 of the statutes, amount to £E552,901.295. From this amount there have to be deducted (1) the service of the debentures, £E236,468.085; (2) the provision of the reserve fund, £E16,312.127; (3) the provision for the special reserve fund, £E18,994.626 — £E271,774.838; leaving, £E281,126.457. And there have further to be deducted (4) dividend on £1,250,000 preferred shares, £E48,750; (5) commission to the National Bank of Egypt, £E10,684.411 — £E59,434.411; leaving £E221,692.046, which is available for distribution as dividend on ordinary and deferred shares. The ordinary shares have to receive, in the first instance, dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, £E120,900; balance, £E100,792.046. The balance of £E100,792.046 is available for the ordinary shares to the extent of one-half, or £E50,396.023; and for the deferred shares to the extent of one-half, or £E50,396.023.

Ordinary Shares.—The amounts therefore available for dividend on these shares are as follows:—Balance from the year ended January 31, 1922, £E302,343.160; interest for the year, accrued on the above balance, £E15,117.158 — £E317,460.318; dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, as stated, £E120,900; further amount available, £E50,396.023; total, £E488,756.341. The directors propose to pay a dividend at the rate of 8½ per cent. per annum, requiring £E205,530, and to carry forward the balance of £E283,226.341.

Deferred Shares.—The amounts available for dividend on these shares are as follows:—Balance from the year ended January 31, 1922, £E222,011.687; interest for the year, accrued on the above balance, £E11,100.584—total, £E233,112.271; further amount available, £E50,396.023—total, £E283,508.294. The directors propose to pay a dividend of £45 per share, requiring £E87,750, and to carry forward the balance of £E195,758.294. The directors consider that the results of the year justify the proposed increase of dividend of ½ per cent. on the ordinary shares and of £5 on the deferred shares. Even with these increased dividends a smaller sum will be drawn on each of the amounts carried forward than was required last year.

Debentures.—The bank now holds £2,942,200 nominal of its own debentures, which have cost £2,312,470, as shown in the balance-sheet. The question of dealing with these debentures has occupied our attention for some time past, and we are of the opinion that the moment has now come to ask the shareholders to give the board authority to cancel, in whole or in part, not only the debentures actually acquired, but any others which may be acquired in the future. For this purpose we have summoned an extraordinary general meeting, which will be held at the conclusion of this meeting.

Mortgage Company of Egypt, Ltd.—The Mortgage Company of Egypt, Ltd., for the year ended March 31, 1922, again distributed a dividend of 12 per cent. on the ordinary shares. The transfer to Egypt of the control and administration of the company—of which we made mention in our report last year—has now been effected. As a result of this measure we are advised that the dividends on our holdings in this company will not be liable in future years to deduction of British income-tax. Demands for new loans presented to the Mortgage Company in 1922 show some restriction as compared with the two previous years, but a larger cotton crop and its quick realisation have produced a corresponding improvement in the encashment of annuities.

Arrears.—Out of the instalments in arrear on January 31, 1922, amounting to £E223,988, a sum of £E177,070 has been either collected or written off during the year; the amounts collected are included as profit in the profit and loss account for £E101,623 as capital and £E74,197 as interest. The instalments due in 1922-23 which have not been collected in the year amount to £E182,285, of which £E75,765 are for interest; no credit has been taken for this sum in the profit and loss account as, in accordance with the statutes, only interest actually encashed can be included in the profits. The balance, £E106,520, representing capital due and not received in the course of the year, has, as required by the statutes, been deducted from the receipts before arriving at the net profits for the year. Any encashments on the total outstanding arrears—£E229,203—will be included in the profits of the year in which they are effected.

Output and Collections.—We have made during the year 410 A loans for a total of £E10,500, and 344 B loans for a total of £E110,120. On the proposal and on behalf of the Egyptian Government we made loans on note of hand during October, November, and December to cultivators who had not sold their cotton, in order to enable them to meet their current engagements without forcing a large proportion of the crop on the market at the same time. The total number of loans made was 2,400 for an amount of £E72,962, repayable at latest by September 1923. The total of loans exceeding £E1,000 each was £E97,019 on January 31, 1923. The arrears on these loans were £E6,032. A sum of £E403,496 was collected out of the annual instalment of £E585,781, and £E175,820 was collected from the arrears, making a total collection of £E579,316. The percentage of the annual instalment collected has again fallen. On the other hand, the collection of arrears by the bank reached a higher percentage than that of many years past, and no doubt many clients found a difficulty in paying the annual instalment as well as the sum for which they were in arrear for past years.

Land Acquired.—The area of land owned by the bank has increased during the year. A considerable part of the land remaining on our hands is of poor quality, and is not easily saleable except during a period of activity in land purchases. We shall take advantage of every opportunity of sale which may occur.

Expropriations.—The number of expropriations made by the bank during the year are as follows:—Number of cases in hand on February 1, 1922, 469; number of cases begun during 1922-1923, 1,369—total, 1,838; cases settled, 984—balance, 854; cases brought to expropriation, 52—balance pending, 802. In 39 of these cases of expropriation 290 feddans were bought in by the bank, and in 13 remaining cases 84 feddans were bought in by third parties. The directors beg to thank the staff at head office and the agencies for their satisfactory work during the year.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Lausanne Conference.

The smooth procedure of the Lausanne Conference in regard to matters of minor importance was somewhat brusquely interrupted last Friday when the question of judicial safeguards for foreigners, to take the place of the Capitulations, came up for discussion. Ismet Pasha claimed to take his stand on certain proposals that the Italian delegate had made to him after the break-up of the Conference in February, in a last effort to secure Turkish agreement to a settlement there and then. He had rejected the proposals at the time, but on the following day, after Lord Curzon had left for England, expressed his willingness to accept them. From that moment the Turks have laid special stress on the "Montagna formula," in spite of emphatic statements on the part of the Allies that they had not confirmed and that they would refuse to recognise Signor Montagna's proposals. The Friday session of the First Committee was taken up entirely with an attempt to make Ismet Pasha see reason on this subject, and in the end the Allies decided to circulate their counter-draft, and reserved the right to discuss the matter again in committee. The tendency to take Ismet Pasha's attitude very seriously has fortunately yielded to a more hopeful view of the situation. Private discussions have since taken place between the Turkish and British delegates, and if Allied unity is maintained, there is some room for hope that, after a suitable interval, the Turks will concede the point.

Judicial Safeguards.

The question of judicial safeguards is of paramount importance to all foreigners resident in Turkey; for, however correct the intentions of the Nationalist Turks may be, the fact remains that the country's legal system cannot be transformed in a day. In the proposals now made, the Allied representatives will be regarded by many as having gone far beyond the safety limit; and it is not difficult to understand their reluctance to have the modified safeguards still further whittled away. Their scheme provides for the immediate appointment by Turkey of at least four European legal counsellors, selected from a list drawn up by the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague from among jurists belonging to countries which did not take part in the War of 1914-1918, for a period of not less than five years. These counsellors are to serve under the Ministry of Justice; they will participate in the work of the reforms of the legislation, will observe the working of Turkish, civil, commercial, and criminal courts, and ensure the strict observance of the provisions of Turkish legislation. The stipulation that domiciliary visits, searches, or arrests of foreigners other than those taken in flagrante delicto can only be carried out with the previous consent of one of the foreign counsellors is the only feature that can be regarded as in any way encroaching upon Turkish susceptibilities, and is more than offset by the invaluable help that Turkey will be given in reforming her judicial procedure, provided that she takes full advantage of the counsellors' presence.

Turkish Aggression.

The situation in regard to the Syrian frontier is easier. Although the Turks have avoided any direct reply to the French demand that they should withdraw their troops, they have sought to explain away the alleged concentrations as being merely the drafting of territorial units to their particular localities with a view to early demobilisation. While it is doubtful whether the French are greatly reassured, it is not at all unlikely that the Turks have been impressed by the military measures taken in Syria. In the meantime the Turks have found another way of showing what little store they set on placating the Allies with a view to oiling the Lausanne machinery. The Constantinople branch of the Bank of Athens has been suddenly seized, the doors closed, and the coffers sealed. Although the bank in question is a Greek bank, British and other Allied interests are said to be involved, and a protest has been lodged by the acting British High Commissioner. As far as is known, the explanation given by the Turks for their action is that the measure is in the nature of a reprisal for the seizure by the Greek Government of the property of Macedonian Moslems, and also that it has been prompted by the bank's connivance at Greek speculation on the local exchange in contravention of the Turkish Government's orders. One of Turkey's greatest handicaps at the present time is the lack of anyone in authority with sufficient knowledge of the world to realise how much the Turks would stand to gain if they could show a disposition to work in with, instead of against, the Allies.

Credo Quia Impossibile.

Never was there greater reason for a robust faith, if the world is not to sink into the depths of despair. Disillusionment is rampant everywhere, and is having the effect of promoting the doctrine of "What has been must ever be" to a universal creed. For this reason we welcome Lord Chelmsford's assurance, albeit expressed negatively, that there would be hope for the North-West Frontier when work was found for the turbulent young men in that area. The work stimulus as a potent factor for peace these days is often overlooked. In the case of the tribesmen of the North-West Frontier it may have to be forced upon them; in other parts of the world it acts of its own accord. One Jeremiah of the Press would deny all virtue to the new Protocol signed by the Irak and British Governments, because elections in Irak, having been vetoed by the head Mujtahid of the Shiah, can never be held, and that a Shiah country can never settle down under a Sunni king. Other equally obvious doctrines have been proved false, and no harm will be done by giving rein to optimism for a little longer. Work is playing its part even in Irak, however long the stimulus may take to make itself properly felt in the holy cities of Kerbela and Nejef. For the same reason it is to be hoped that, whatever the fate of the Chester Concession, the material development of Turkey that it stands for will still be carried out, in order that Turks in all spheres of life may find a speedier medium of moral and economic regeneration in work than in politics.

Bulgarian Reparations.

It is announced that the Inter-Allied Reparation Commission in Paris has approved the agreement made between the Bulgarian Government and the Reparation Commission in Sofia in regard to the amount of reparations to be paid by Bulgaria. The main work of the latter Commission is thus completed, and it is to be hoped that no long time will be spent over the subsidiary questions that are reported to be now engaging its attention. According to the agreement, the first payment under the reparations scheme is to be made this year, and when the requisite sum has been handed over, there should be no delay on the part of the Commission in giving effect to the plan, which is known to commend itself to some, at least, of the members, of disbanding itself. If, as seems probable, the work that remains to be done by the Allies in connection with reparations could be entrusted to officials of the different Legations in Sofia, the Bulgarian Treasury can be relieved of the not inconsiderable expenditure entailed by a large Commission, and the Allies will be making a definite contribution to the rehabilitation of Bulgaria by a practical illustration of the policy of economy that they are urging upon the country.

Politics in Yugoslavia.

In spite of a double resignation, M. Pashitch is back again at the head of the Yugoslav Government, and Parliament has re-opened. M. Raditch persists in his policy of abstention, the futility of which was clearly exemplified during the last session. While, however, the Serbian Agrarians and the Democrats are trying to make things uncomfortable for the Radical Cabinet, M. Pashitch is credited with a belief in the possibility of coming to an agreement with the Croatian group. In the interests of the country as a whole it would be well if a working arrangement could be reached between the two strongest parties. The Radicals can be in little doubt as to the difficulty of giving practical effect to their policy of centralisation, and they must realise that in regard both to Fiume and to Macedonia they have important international problems which hardly lend themselves to satisfactory settlement while Yugoslavia remains a house divided against itself.

The Ex-Sultan of Turkey.

After a stay of a little over three months the Sultan Mehmed VI. has left the Hejaz and is reported to be contemplating residence in Switzerland. The intention to live at Haifa has been abandoned, perhaps wisely. The ex-Sultan's future relations with Turkey are a matter that concern the Turks and himself, and there is no need to introduce international complications by the choice, for purposes of a residence, of a place so provocatively near to the Turkish frontier as Haifa. In Switzerland he will still be at hand, if public opinion in Turkey considers that it is in the interests of the country that he should return, and there will be no chance of the Turks taking umbrage at Swiss hospitality being extended to the ex-monarch. Although other reasons may have helped to bring about the change in his plans, it is evident that the health of the ex-Sultan leaves much to be desired; he is reported to be suffering from heart trouble, and may have to prolong his stay in Alexandria, where he now is.

The North-West Frontier.

The House of Lords discussed the Frontier question last week, on the motion of Lord Montagu of Beaulieu, and the debate may be regarded as satisfactory, for, if nothing very new was said, there was a substantial consensus of opinion in favour of the policy which at present holds the field, and in this case the mere absence of controversy is a fact of considerable political importance. Lord Chelmsford insisted rightly on the economic aspect of the problem when he said that there could be no permanent peace till work had been found for the young men; but we do not hear of any capitalists coming forward to develop the tribal areas, and work requires capital, as the text-books say. So long as work is scarce, we must expect outbreaks of what is only mischief in the tribesmen's eyes, though it is war to us, and we must be prepared to make such mischief a "dangerous trade." It is satisfactory to be assured that the drastic reductions in mechanical transport recommended by the Inchcape Committee are being examined with special reference to Frontier needs, for speed in action is essential if raids are to be made really dangerous to the raiders.

Warfare by Notice.

The most immediate interest of the discussion lay in the point taken by Lord Chelmsford that the recent outrages represented a reaction against the practice of aerial attacks, which, whatever their efficacy may be, undoubtedly conflict with the old border tradition that war is a game for men, and that the absolute safety of women and children is an inviolable rule. The Secretary of State replied that the evidence was against the existence of any such connection as Lord Chelmsford suggested, but it is not altogether an easy task to collect evidence regarding the mental attitude of the tribesmen, and he mentioned that the question of giving notice of aerial attacks was occupying the attention of the Air Force, so that the matter is not finally decided.

One can imagine the derision with which such a suggestion would have been greeted in old Berlin, and perhaps the attitude of new Berlin would not be materially different; but the Frontier has its own mentality, and we believe there is a large body of opinion in this country which would welcome a decision to revert to the practices of the age of chivalry, if they should be found compatible with essential military needs.

The Chauri Chaura Case.

The appellate decision of the Allahabad High Court marks the last stage of the colossal trial which arose from the destruction of the police-station at the village of Chauri Chaura. It will be recalled that the station was rushed, not by a mere mob, but by a body of men marching with set purpose, as the High Court has explicitly found, and nearly all the occupants were murdered in circumstances of almost incredible brutality. Some excellent detective work resulted in the arrest of nearly 200 men, and the Sessions judge, applying the strict provisions of the Penal Code, passed sentence of death on all who were convicted of having taken part in the attack. The appellate tribunal has, as is commonly done, admitted a more flexible interpretation of the law, and while reducing most of the sentences to the minimum of transportation for life, has indicated further reductions for the consideration of the executive; but the facts that 129 convictions for murder stand, and that the death sentence is to be carried out in nineteen cases, establish a record which we hope is destined never to be approached in any part of India.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

Our Present Discontents.

Three speeches of the first importance were made last week on the present situation in England—by Lord Curzon, by Mr. Churchill, and by Mr. Asquith respectively. Each orator treated the matter from his peculiar point of view, the first representing the Government, the second the Centre Party, and the third the Liberal Party. Easily first in substance and in sense was Mr. Churchill's speech, though it was vitiated by an ill-founded and all-pervading dread of Socialism in this land. But he was able to point out convincingly that the old party ties and shibboleths have disappeared from real life—there was, he truly said, no fundamental difference between Mr. Bonar Law and Mr. Asquith—and no one really would object to a Centre Party, provided it did not contain any of the dangerous adventurers who brought the late Coalition into such deserved disrepute—a proviso with which Mr. Churchill would scarcely agree! Lord Curzon, as was to be expected, was gently optimistic; his utterance was weighty and able, but because of its official nature will be discounted by at least 50 per cent. Mr. Asquith, who definitely refused to compromise any of his supposed principles for the sake either of reuniting the Liberal Party or of presenting a united front against Labour, was extremely sound, but, oh! so distant from the times! Bedrock principles, it is true, the present generation demands of our politicians, but more than that, no. There is not now a voter thinking for himself who honestly subscribes to all the party tenets, and as the voter compromises, so must the politician.

Of these three analyses of our present discontents, then, Mr. Churchill's was the one which will find the truest echo. But for him and his friends we have at the moment little use, though it is certainly, as he suggested, to men' steeled in and altered by the War that we shall continue to look. The possibility of an English Mussolini still consoles us.

The Naval Base at Singapore.

The very interesting debate which took place in the Commons a few days ago on the naval base at Singapore, for which the Government proposes to spend from ten to twenty millions, aroused strangely little comment in the Press. In it were some first-rate speeches, some, even, based on first-hand information; and the main issue seemed to depend on whether for the next ten years or so the super-battleship is, or is not, to be the protector of the British Empire. If it is, then the balance of argument is in favour of a base at Singapore; but if it is not, then certainly those critics who would concentrate on the air defences of London have their case.

No doubt the question will be finally decided when our experts meet Australia at the forthcoming Imperial Conference; it is possible that Australia will plump for aircraft as against the vast super-battleship. But the whole thing is a matter upon which it is impossible for the layman to hold any opinion.

Reassessment.

The Government does not have a great deal of luck, for what it gains on the roundabouts of foreign policy it seems to lose on the swings of housing. Perhaps its left hand does not know what its right is doing. In any case the new complication of reassessment that has been evolved is going to do it much harm; it is thought, indeed, that agitation against it will rise to such a pitch that the scheme may be withdrawn. The middle-class householder has been reassessed in some cases 80 per cent. above his former rating; and no one knows yet what his rent may be next year, for control beyond the present summer is problematical. It would seem a curious moment to choose to increase the already appalling housing muddle, and, incidentally, to nullify the reduction in income-tax; for almost inevitably the reassessment will goad landlords into making the earliest possible increases in rent. The middle-class people are at the moment taking the matter gently enough, waiting, probably, to see what will be done in Parliament about it; but certainly they will ultimately kick against it. If the Government does not find "Housing"

The Royal Academy.

There are those one of whose annual duties is a visit to the Royal Academy; there are, again, those whose principles include a rigid avoiding of the same institution. Myself, I have not been to this year's show, which opened to the public to-day; but from what has already been written about it one imagines that the first class of people, if they have any intelligence left, will find their patience hardly strained. For apparently it is this year a veterans' Academy; modernist works are amazingly few. One is scarcely reassured in the contemplation of a visit when The Times of all papers can brace itself to this: "The great mass of the pictures are not even interesting, nor are they thoroughly painted. They seem to express nothing in the artist's mind, but rather to be painted because the time had come for painting them." If this is anywhere near the truth, one can look forward jubilantly to what the younger critics will say about the exhibition, and especially to their remarks on Sir William Orpen's enigma, which seems to have offended many people. But why cannot our official people distinguish between occasional work and the genuine thing? We do not now expect our Poet Laureates to pump out stuff on public occasions, and, in fact, would welcome a similar lethargy or restraint on the part of our painters. Abuse of the Academy, however, is inevitable and ceaseless: only it does seem rather a pity to provide it with such abundance of justification.

The Country and Art.

At the annual banquet of the Royal Academy of Arts on Saturday, at which the Prince of Wales was the principal guest, the stimulating announcement was made that the Government are considering the possibility of creating a Commission of Fine Arts, to advise on all matters which may arise affecting the æsthetic amenities of our towns and countryside. This is excellent news. The Prince in his speech referred justly to the great improvement in public advertisements, calling the posters on our hoardings the art galleries of the great public. As applied to such places as the Underground Railway—where most people pick up their knowledge and conception of contemporary artistic productions—this compliment is undoubtedly true; but there are still places in our countryside which can only be described as horrible blots. There is, in fact, an extremely useful institution called the Scapa Society, which exists for the express purpose of preventing the disfigurement of the countryside. If the Government will, through its Commission, support this society's scheme, there is yet hope. At the moment there are lovers of the country and of towns, too, who are in actual and impotent despair at the wrecking of tradition and beauty by the commercial man and his poster; but at the prospect of this Commission they can soften their anger and lift up their hearts.

The Commercial Airship.

Another interesting proposal of the Government which has recently crystallised is that of a commercial airship service linking up Great Britain with India, and eventually with Singapore, Burma, and Australia. This development has, of course, been long projected; but we have just had the final proposals and estimates. The principle has been approved, and the scheme is to reach India in seventy or eighty hours. Exactly how the Government is to assist the scheme is still under consideration, and the service will have to be watched very carefully in the early years. But in the nature of things it must come, and though there may be disappointments at first, we shall gradually accustom ourselves to the fact that trips to the other side of the world will become as common as trips to the Mediterranean now are. These voyages in airships, moreover, will be very much more comfortable than those at present undergone in aeroplanes—a point which the future plutocracies will doubtless insist on and maintain.

The Month of May.

May came in with unusual splendour—I do not refer to the dull processions which one saw in London on May Day, when banners were flaunted calling upon the workers of the world to unite and to force the capitalist to disgorge—but to the glory of the weather. Everything, apart from mere humans, who, after perspiring bewilderedly for a day or two, are now accustoming and habiting themselves fitly, simply burst for joy in the rare heat; the South of England, at any rate, has been a wonder of blossoming. Lawn tennis began in full and happy swing on Saturday, and cricket ball has begun to meet the bat with the familiar challenge instead of the shy diffidence of a fortnight ago. I do not wish to make readers abroad discontented; but if they have anything more lovely than England is now, well, discontent should not be possible to them. This year, indeed, "By Goddés fay, by Goddés fay! It is the month, the jolly month, it is the jolly month of May." Poets always are proved true, even in this country, at some time or another; one has only to wait long enough.

The Rivers of London.

We had a day or two ago an interesting reminder of the existence of the many little rivers—mostly subterranean now—which course their way through the capital to the Thames. For the workmen who were widening the City and South London Tube suddenly found that the water was coming in on them, and in the roadway above a sinking took place and the trains had to stop running. Apparently it was a little stream called the Effra that the workmen had tapped—a tiny river which formerly ran from Brixton Hill to the Thames, and which is now mostly enclosed in a sewer. The very existence of it had been forgotten, and its name, as with many other rivers of London, is preserved only in roads; for every hundred who knew the "Effra Road" in the district, not one, until last week, knew of the Effra River.

Egypt's Constitution.

Within a few hours of the departure of the mail with my last letter the situation underwent a sudden and unexpected change. Agreement was come to between the King and the Cabinet on the various points in the Constitution around which there had been so much discussion, and late the same evening the King signed the Rescript granting to Egypt her democratic Constitution. The question of the control of the religious institutions and Wakfs was settled by the provision that the King should continue to control them according to the laws of the country. The Sovereign will also continue to create and bestow decorations, but this is restricted by the general provision that he exercises his powers through his Ministers. The difficulty with regard to the Senate has been overcome by fixing the nominated proportion at 40 per cent. of the total and by allowing the King to nominate the President, but Ministers will not be responsible to the Senate, only to the Chamber of Deputies. As regards Ambassadors, the King will nominate and dismiss them on the proposal of the Minister of Foreign Affairs. Lastly, the clause that "all power emanates from the people," which, under the Nessim Cabinet, was deleted from the draft put forward by the Constitution Commission, has been reinstated.

On the other hand, in the Constitution as now promulgated appear the amended Sudan clauses which the British Government insisted that the King and the Nessim Cabinet should substitute for the original clauses, which were regarded as prejudicing the future negotiations. While it must be admitted that the Egyptians generally do not like the change, nevertheless they have submitted with a good grace to what is, after all, but the inevitable.

Reception of the Constitution.

The Constitution as it now stands is an exceedingly liberal reform. It may contain defects, but these do not affect the main fundamental principles, and Parliament has power to remedy such defects as they make themselves manifest. It has, indeed, been received with widespread satisfaction. Throughout the day following the promulgation, which was a Friday, and the next day, which, in honour of the occasion, was declared a public holiday, large crowds of notables arrived from all parts of the country and signed in the book at Abdin Palace, and called on the Prime Minister at his office in order to express their thanks for the gift of the democratic régime which had at last been bestowed on them.

The Liberal Constitutional Party held a meeting at which its President, Adly Pasha Yeghen, expressed the general satisfaction at the promulgation of this Constitution, and all those present proceeded in a body to Abdin Palace in order to express their gratitude to King Fuad. The Constitution Commission which was responsible for the original draft, from which the present Constitution varies only in minor details, if one excepts the Sudan clauses, on their side addressed a letter to the King expressing their gratification, while that courageous lawyer, Abdel Aziz Bey Fahmy, who had been the first to draw public attention to the dangerous amendments that were threatened, himself signed in the book at the Palace.

The only dissentient voice has come from the so-called Wafd, which has rushed in with a manifesto which is childish and unreasonable in the extreme. I have written "so-called Wafd" advisedly. In the past the Wafd was held amongst the Egyptians to represent the nation for the execution of a certain mission. To-day that mission has long since been completed, and the mandate, which, by the way, none of the present members of the so-called Wafd ever enjoyed, having expired, neither this body nor any other body has any longer the right to speak on behalf of the nation. Consequently the manifesto issued by these men in the name of the nation is a usurpation, rendered all the more impudent by the fact that the nation, as represented by the thousands who called at the Palace and on the Premier this week, has plainly voiced its approval of the Constitution. The perverted mentality of these men leaps to the eye when it is added that, while exhorting the nation not to accept the Constitution, they demand that Zaghloul Pasha shall be allowed to return and participate in the elections which are to be held in virtue of the Constitution, which they want rejected.

Restrictions on Sugar Removed.

It is announced that, starting from May 10, all restrictions on the import and export of sugar will be removed. The monopoly was granted on the outbreak of war to the Société Générale des Sucreries et de la Raffinerie d'Égypte, which in return undertook to keep Egypt and the Sudan supplied with sugar at reasonable prices. The company has more than fulfilled its promise, for it also met the demands of the British Army in Egypt and in the Mediterranean, and Egypt has throughout enjoyed an uninterrupted supply at prices very much below those ruling on the world's markets. After the Armistice the monopoly was continued on account of the uncertain state of the world's markets, but the economic situation having now more or less righted itself in this respect it has been very wisely decided to remove all restrictions on the sugar trade.

The Conspiracy Case.

The second conspiracy case, in which fifteen Egyptians are accused of conspiracy to murder Englishmen, continues before the Military Court, and, judging by the manner in which the proceedings are being drawn out, it is likely to rival in length the Abdel Rahman Bey Fahmy case, which lasted more than three months. An interesting episode this week was the appearance before the Court of the responsible editor of a vernacular paper called the Afkar to answer the charge of contempt of court in an article dealing with the trial. The President ordered his detention until sentence in the conspiracy case had been promulgated, and recommended that his paper should be shut for the same period.

The Health of Mr. Howard Carter.

About a fortnight ago Mr. Howard Carter and many of his friends received telegrams from London stating that alarming reports were current as to his health. As Mr. Carter had been perfectly fit, these inquiries caused everyone much surprise, but at the time nothing more was thought of the matter. The explanation was, however, forthcoming this week when the mail arrived with the London papers which published the reports referred to. The whole story is, of course, an invention from beginning to end, but what has incensed everyone is not so much the publication of the first news, as the manner in which it has been sought to back up the false report and keep the sensation alive by following it up by bulletins purporting to report Mr. Carter's progress to recovery. There is no doubt that this was a deliberate attempt to pander to popular superstition by providing matter for the propagation of the stupid theory of the Tutankhamen curse, and the mystery of the widespread circulation of these false reports is explained by the fact that two of the large London dailies and the telegraphic agency which supplied the news to the other papers are represented in Cairo by one man. Wherever I have been I have heard the most bitter condemnation of these tactics, and I have been requested not merely to expose them, but to ask that the British public should be warned not to be too hasty in accepting such sensational stories, which may appeal to certain journalists as good copy, but the irresponsible circulation of which in the peculiarly sad circumstances surrounding the Tutankhamen find is, to say the least of it, in the worst of bad taste.

ROUMANIA.

Bucharest, April 27.

Parliament.

Parliament closed for the Easter vacation at the beginning of this month and will re-open on May 1. The opening has been somewhat delayed in order to allow the draft law containing the administrative regulations under the new Constitution to be prepared for submission to the Chamber of Deputies.

The Unpopularity of the Liberals.

The Opposition, more especially the Transylvanian Nationalists, have been making use of the vacation to organise mass meetings in the principal large towns, at all of which strong censure was passed on the Liberal policy. Most sections of the community, indeed, seem to be very tired of the Liberal Administration, one of the chief complaints being that the cost of living has gone up 100 per cent. in the course of the last fourteen months—i.e., since M. Vintila Bratianu took over the Ministry of Finance. The increase in the cost of living might have been tolerated with a better grace, if the commercial affairs of the country were at least showing signs of improving; but this can hardly be said to be the case, and merchants in the towns and farmers in the country are alike dissatisfied, to say nothing of the industrialists, who constantly complain of the obstacles set in their way by unforeseen and even contradictory regulations.

The Strike of Government Employees.

Another sign of the prevailing discontent has been the recent strike of Government employees, which affected several Departments, including the Ministry of Justice, where, indeed, the trouble is not yet over, although it appears to be gradually subsiding.

Yesterday an order was confirmed by the Court for the arrest of three of the ringleaders of the strike on the ground that a strike of public "functionaries" was made illegal by the law of M. Trancu-Iassi, in 1920, and by Article 181 of the Penal Code. The discussion lasted for eight hours, and one of the accused made a very able defence; but the arrests were finally confirmed, and the accused were led away by a side door to avoid the demonstration of a number of strikers who had collected before the Court to express their sympathy with them.

It is reported that at a meeting of employees of the Post and Telegraph Office it was proposed to declare a general strike as a protest against the above arrests; but this is hardly likely to materialise, especially as the Budgetary Committee charged with the distribution of the sum of five hundred million lei, set aside for the purpose of improving the status of Government officials and employees, has just published its report showing how this distribution is to be made. After a great deal of calculation a curve has been established to include all grades of officials, and the scheme has been officially accepted, although it requires an additional thirty million lei, which will have to be covered by an extraordinary credit from the Budgetary surplus.

Of the total sum of 530 million lei, 250 million lei will be distributed to employees who received less than 200 lei monthly in 1916, 216 millions to those whose salaries were from 200 to 700 in 1916, and 70 millions to those whose salaries were over 700 lei in 1916. The following table shows how the salaries of 1916 and those now established will compare :—

1916, 100 lei, 1923, 1,600 lei; 1916, 200 lei, 1923, 2,100 lei; 1916, 400 lei, 1923, 2,900 lei; 1916, 500 lei, 1923, 3,500 lei; 1916, 700 lei, 1923, 4,670 lei; 1916, 1,000 lei, 1923, 6,200 lei; 1916, 1,500 lei, 1923, 8,170 lei; 1916, 2,000 lei, 1923, 10,000 lei. These increases, however, do not include housing and family allowances.

In order to obtain some idea of the extent to which those increases do or do not cover the increase in the cost of living it is interesting to compare them with some of the index numbers for March, 1923, published in the Argus last month, 100 being taken as the standard figure for August, 1916 :—Sugar, 2,910; rice, 4,330; coffee, 3,300; tea, 2,500; beans, 6,000; maize flour, 4,000; wheat flour, 2,000; bread, 1,500; milk, 1,750; meat, 2,250; butter, 4,500.

In considering these figures, moreover, it must be remembered that the prices of wheat, bread, meat, and butter are fixed maximum prices imposed by the Government. Maximum prices are fixed for other merchandise as well, and it is not always possible to procure the merchandise at all at the prices fixed. These tables show that the food prices have on the whole increased almost twice as much as the salaries, and figures could be given to show that the increase in the price of clothing is very much greater.

The Universities' Disturbance.

The disturbances begun some months ago by the medical students at the Universities of Cluj and Cernautsi still continue, and the Universities all over the country have been closed for many weeks. The University of Bucharest has been re-opened, and all the professors are exhorting their students to preserve order and to continue their studies. The students, however, protest against the large number of Jews of non-Roumanian nationality who have been admitted to the Universities and demand their expulsion; the turbulent anti-Jewish section seems to be retaining its influence, and the classes are very poorly attended.

It is difficult for the ordinary liberal-minded Englishman to understand or sympathise with the students' point of view, but they argue that the Jew is never a patriot, and ought not to be allowed to carry off all the professional plums in the country.

The Harvest and Exports.

Of the areas sown for this year's harvest it may be possible to give figures next month. This season is a very late one, owing to the long winter and the heavy rains that fell during the month of March, and the spring sowings are still going on.

Grain exports show a tendency to decline, as is usual at this season, and the same applies to exports of timber. Petroleum exports for the last two months have remained about the same figure—i.e., just under 20,000 metric tons. In December of last year they amounted to 38,000 metric tons.

PERSIA.

Teheran, April 11.

The New Parliament.

The past fortnight has been devoid of political interest. The firman for the elections for the new Parliament, which will be the fifth since the granting of the Constitution by Muzaffer ed Din Shah, was signed by the Shah on the 2nd instant, and, as the period of the present Mejliss will be finished in about three months' time, endeavours will be made to have all the deputies elected by that date. In the Royal Decree his Majesty hopes that electors will accomplish their duty to the nation conscientiously, and not lose sight of the fact that the tranquillity and prosperity of the country depend on the election of capable persons as deputies. According to the Constitutional Law, the new Parliament must be opened as soon as half the total number of deputies, plus one, have arrived in the capital.

Persian Relations with Russia.

A few days ago the President of the Mejliss stated in the Parliament that Shumyatski, the Russian Chargé d'Affaires (who, by the way, has just been raised to the rank of Minister), had personally thanked him on behalf of Lenin for the help extended by the Persian nation and people to the starving Russians in the time of the late famine, and he hoped the present friendly relations would always continue between the two countries. The President's statement was much applauded by the deputies, which was perhaps accounted for by the fact that Shumyatski himself was present in the diplomatic gallery.

An Aeroplane from Moscow.

The Russian Legation announced in the Press the other day that, by permission of the Persian Government, an aeroplane from Moscow, flying on a trial trip, would land in Teheran. As Teheran has seen no aeroplanes since the departure of the British troops in 1921, this announcement aroused a certain amount of excitement, and at the time fixed crowds flocked to the ramparts to witness the landing on a prepared piece of ground on the plain north of the town. Tents had been erected by the Russian Legation, and Shumyatski and his staff kept on coming and going, but no aeroplane arrived, nor has it made its appearance since! The Russians attribute the delay to strong winds and bad weather in Enzeli, where it had landed from Baku, and announce that as soon as conditions improve the plane will leave for Teheran. It is stated that the object of the present flight is to test

The Russo-Persian Agreement.

The papers state that negotiations for the new Russo-Persian Commercial Agreement have been concluded, and that the terms will shortly be presented to the respective Governments for ratification. In the meantime the Russian authorities are showing a more conciliatory attitude with regard to trade between the two countries, and the prohibitive tariff introduced some months ago has been replaced by the 1901 tariff until the result of the Commercial Agreement is known. This has done a good deal to revive trade, which had practically ceased, and should the Agreement be signed shortly a boom is expected to follow.

Changes in Governorships.

There have been several changes in the Governorships of the Provinces recently. Sardar Assad Bakhtiari has been appointed Governor-General of Khorassan, and has left to take up his post. Nayer es Sultan has resigned the Governorship of Ghilan, and Prince Sarem ed Dowleh that of Fars, but the latter has not been accepted by the Government. It is reported that Nayer ul Mulk will replace Sardar Moazzam as Governor-General of Kerman.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Administrative Changes in Cyprus.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—The news has just reached me that the District of Kyrenia is to be merged into that of Nicosia. The latter district is the largest in the island, and even, as it is, is somewhat unwieldy. Kyrenia, moreover, is physically intended to be a separate district. It lies to the north of a range of mountains 2,000 ft. in height. There is only one carriage road through the range. In addition to the town of Kyrenia and other widespread villages, there are the townships of Karava and Lapithos, both thriving communities, with an aggregate population of 12,000. To compel the inhabitants of Kyrenia district to travel to Nicosia in order to transact their business at the Commissioner's office, the Law Courts, or other Government offices is grossly unfair. It would mean that a villager would have to be absent for three days instead of one.

Until further details come to hand I cannot throw more light on the subject. But already there have been meetings of the inhabitants to protest against the change.

I left Cyprus only a month ago; at that time there was not even a whisper of the proposed change. I have been a landed proprietor in the Kyrenia district for forty years, and am strongly opposed to the scheme. If carried out, it will only affect me socially. I can motor hither and thither; the case of the villager is quite different; he travels from place to place on his humble donkey. Distance, therefore, means much to him.

Before concluding I would make one remark. From the storm of indignation that has been evolved it is quite clear that no means were taken to ascertain the wishes of those immediately concerned. Not so very long ago you allowed me to describe under what autocratic rule we Cypriotes (if I may call myself one) live out our days.

No doubt we read in the Government Gazette "by and with the advice of," but we know to our cost that behind those words lies absolute autocratic power.—I am, etc.,

GEORGE L. HOUSTOUN.

Johnstone Castle, May 4.

A CYPRIOT MONTHLY.

The appearance in Cyprus of a monthly periodical devoted to literary matters, under the title Cypriot Chronicles (Κυπριακά Χρονικά) is a welcome sign of intellectual progress. Although the number of Greek weekly papers is large relatively to the population, those who knew the island only a few years ago might well wonder that a sufficient number of readers could be found to support an enterprise of this character. But during the 45 years of British administration which will close this year, a great stride has been made in education. Praiseworthy efforts have been successfully exerted both in towns and villages to raise the standard of teaching. Many well-to-do Cypriotes have sent their sons to study in Europe for the legal, medical, and other professions. A considerable number, especially of Greeks, but also some of the Turkish community, have been called to the Bar in London; and the number of boys and—it may be added—of girls now studying in England, France, Switzerland, Greece, and other countries is fairly large. The result of all this progress is that there clearly exists in the towns a cultured class of an extent to justify the confidence of a little group of scholars who are launching the present undertaking. It makes a good start with contributions in four languages.

The object of the journal is "to collect and publish every fragment of written and traditionary lore which can throw any light on the history of the island." It is conducted by a committee of six, including Nicodemus, Bishop of Kitium, Dr. N. Kyriazis, and Mr. Lukas Z. Pierides, grandson of Mr. John Pierides—who did so much for the decyphering of the early Cypriot syllabary—who was for many years secretary to Mr. C. D. Cobham, and is himself an enthusiastic worker in the field of Cypriot history.

A notable feature will be the regular publication of extracts from rare books, as a continuation of Excerpta Cypria, the "monumental work" compiled by the late Mr. Cobham, to whose memory they will be dedicated. Mr. Pierides starts with extracts from the memoirs of Baron de Tott, of the French Embassy in Constantinople, who visited Cyprus in 1755, when the Turkish Musellim and the Greek Archbishop between them fleeced the wretched Cypriotes, both Moslem and Christian; and of Henry Bunting (1583), when conditions were apparently rather better. The cattle, he tells us, "went to pasture in winter, but in summer, when the heat is exceptional, they stay in the house, as they have nothing to eat."

No doubt in the archives of the Consulates, British, French, Italian, and others, and in those of the Greek Church, as well as in the possession of old Cypriot families, there are many documents which would throw light on island history, and help to fill the blank pages of the Turkish period, which Mr. C. Luke has already touched.

Much remains to be done in ethnology and archaeology, while Cyprus offers a rich field for the study of folk-lore, legend, and superstition, not to speak of natural history, for researches in which there is ample scope. For the publication of notes in all these subjects, the Chronicles should offer a welcome medium. The journal deserves every encouragement, and should stimulate a new spirit of inquiry in the island. It closes with the offer of a prize of £5 for the best collection of names given to animals in Cyprus, including cats, dogs, sheep, goats, and birds.

THE SMYRNA HOLOCAUST.

Under the auspices of the Anglo-Hellenic League, a public lecture was given on May 3 in King's College by the Rev. C. Dobson, M.C., Chaplain of Smyrna in 1922, his subject being "An Eye-Witness's Account of the Smyrna Holocaust." The chair was taken by the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Gloucester. Mr. Dobson told simply the story of his experiences in Smyrna, from the days preparatory to the entry of the Kemalist troops down to the fire. He paid tribute to the orderliness and discipline of the first Turkish troops in the town, but his story of the later days was a harrowing one. The lecturer did not set out to establish any political views, and he concluded by appealing to his audience not, at any rate, to blame the British for what had happened.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor and Sir Edward Grigg spoke later, mainly in defence of what Mr. Lloyd George's Government had done at Chanak; and the Bishop of Gloucester further emphasised the political and racial aspect of the subject of the lecture.

Jevad Bey, who has been appointed Turkish Minister in Bucharest, will for the present also represent his country in Belgrade and Sofia.

INDIAN YARNS.

'THE SOUTHLANDS OF SIVA: SOME REMINISCENCES OF LIFE IN SOUTHERN INDIA.' By A. Butterworth. (London: The Bodley Head, Ltd. 10s. 6d. net.)

This is a book of reminiscences by a retired Madras civilian, who, judging from the account he has given us, must have enjoyed a remarkably good time during his Indian career. The book is full of anecdotes, and some of the stories are racy—indeed, very racy; but many of them are delightfully humorous, and the author's remarks on men and matters show that he was a shrewd observer. From the title one might have been led to expect to hear a good deal about the god Siva; but this is not so. There is really very little information, moreover, about the habits and customs of the Indian population of the Madras Presidency, but the author, by his own admission, did not attempt to dabble in ethnology; he had not time to do so, "being absorbed in contemplation of the activities of sundry minor officials wearying themselves to commit iniquity." He found leisure, nevertheless, for a good deal of shikar, to go fishing, and for other amusements. But these were the days, presumably, before the Reformed Councils, and when the Press was not so observant of the doings of European officials in the Madras Presidency as in other parts of India. Mr. Butterworth's account takes us back to the time when Indian regiments in Madras suffered from a plurality of colonels, who were fond of eating jack fruit (presumably in the celebrated Madras curries), as well as of other more questionable things. There are tiger stories galore, and stories of elephants and bison, as well as snake yarns, sufficient in amount and quality to satisfy the appetite of the average person of inquiring mind regarding India. One of the tiger stories—that on p. 37—comes from another part of India, if we are not mistaken, and gives the account of a wonderful adventure of a tea planter with a tiger. There are two good stories about Lord Kitchener on p. 40, and the account of the objection memo. of Colonel Bird and its highly unconventional reply are exceedingly funny. The reference to the Noakhali judgment reminds us of a time when the local Government was suffering from a more than usually strong fit of ineptitude. Some of the author's contemporaries are described, on p. 116, as belonging to a corps d'élite of alcoholists (this was before the days of Pussyfoot Johnson), and a Baptist missionary even seemed to have enjoyed a glass of champagne with boon companions. The description of the Taj at Agra leaves much to be desired, but perhaps the author did not wish to dwell on such a well-worn theme. The monument to poor "Mary Dalrymple" (p. 132) may have been erected to commemorate the helpmate of some Madras official, and its want of detail may have been due to the same cause which prompted the following epitaph in another part of India, e.g. :—

"To a child fondly called Camilla, Soft silken primrose fading timelessly."

One would have liked to have heard more than the author has given us of such interesting people as the Nagars, with their system of matrilineal descent; of the Moplahs, who have given us so much trouble lately; of the "black," as well as of the "white" Jew communities; but ethnology was not the author's hobby. The story of the piles of unopened official dak, on p. 215, reminds us of a civilian in another province, who for some time before availing himself of a hard-earned period of rest, caused his peons to stamp all official papers that came in with the device: "Put up for orders to my successor." It is doubtful whether the Ceylon planters, or the tea industry generally, will quite appreciate the remarks about "industrial brutality towards nature" on p. 244, although the æsthetic sense will certainly sympathise. The author went to Simla, but does not seem to have been particularly impressed with the beauties of the scenery there; one would have liked to have heard what such an acute observer of mankind thought of Simla society, and if it is now as was described in "Plain Tales from the Hills," e.g., whether such a lady as Mrs. Hawksbee still flourishes, or if nous avons changé tout cela under the new enlightened dispensation.

Before concluding, one would like to remark on the want of a map, which in a book like that before us, dealing, as it does, with such a vast area, is certainly a desideratum. Some illustrations, also, of such places as Tanjore, Madura, the Gersappa Falls, and the Neilgerries would have been welcomed. The book, however, is cleverly written and is full of humour, which, indeed, is its redeeming feature. It has been exceedingly well printed on excellent paper, and is, for the present time, moderately priced.

PALESTINE EXPLORATION FUND.

Together with the "Annual Report and Accounts, with List of Subscriptions for the Year 1922," of the Palestine Exploration Fund, we have received the Quarterly Statement for April. The "Annual Report" states that, owing to various reasons, the Fund's work at Gaza and Te'll Jemmeh is being abandoned in favour of the Hill at Ophel, at Jerusalem; but the Statement is unable to make any definite statement regarding the excavation of Mount Ophel. The sum of £5,000, which the Government of Palestine stipulates must be guaranteed, has not yet been forthcoming; and we must emphasise the importance of the appeal which the editor of the Statement makes that the coming season, with very special opportunities, be not lost. The Statement contains, among other things, articles by W. J. Phythian-Adams on "Report of the Stratification of Askalon," by E. J. Pitcher on "Portable Sundial from Gezar," and by Dr. Samuel Daiches on "Goshen in Palestine."

The teachers in the Alliance Israélite schools have decided to join the Organisation of Hebrew Teachers in Palestine. They also resolved to recognise in principle that it was desirable that Hebrew should be the language of instruction in the Jewish schools in Palestine.

OBITUARY.

GENERAL HADDAD PASHA.

It is with regret that we have to record the death at Nice on May 1 of General Gabriel Haddad Pasha, representative in London of King Faisal of Irak. Early in 1922 he had a bad attack of dysentery in Baghdad, and, although it was thought that the climate of Europe would eradicate all ill effects, he never recovered complete health, and was continually ill in London. As a political refugee from Syria many years ago, General Haddad took up his residence in Egypt, where he became Assistant Director of Public Security. During the War he held a British commission, and was attached to the Emir Faisal's army. On the occupation of Jerusalem he was appointed Director of Public Security in Palestine, and afterwards joined the Emir Faisal at Damascus. From that time he became closely associated with the Emir, accompanying him to London, and subsequently following him to Baghdad. Haddad Pasha was a man of considerable ability and great personal charm; he worked hard for the Arab cause, and although his views were not always acceptable to the phase of British policy in vogue at the moment, he had the satisfaction of seeing the course of affairs in Irak gradually modified in the direction of the policy that he had consistently urged.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRAK.

Mesopotamia has proved a blessed word to many a politician, publicist, and paper seeking a bubble reputation for omniscience, but in the face of the latest political development in that part of the world they may have to transfer their attention to other spheres if they wish to delude themselves in the belief that they are holding their audience. Since the rebellion of 1920 far more water has flowed down the Tigris than the critics have realised. Arabs, British officials, the British Government—everybody, indeed, except the advocates of immediate evacuation—have learnt something, and, we may hope, are continuing to learn every day. The millennium has not yet started in the Middle East, but neither has the clock stood still. Very gradually the policy to which Great Britain is committed in relation to all countries under her charge that have hitherto ranked as backward is being adopted in Irak. More fortunately than in Egypt, it is not being retarded by extremist excesses, and since the brief display of force last year by Sir Percy Cox an unexpectedly rapid rate of progress has been possible. The Treaty, signed on October 10, 1922, was the outcome of prolonged negotiations, and may be said to have been based on the situation a year previously. It provided for the establishment of an independent constitutional Government in Irak, but, by fixing the term of the agreement at twenty years, displayed no very robust confidence in the powers of the Iraklis to acclimatise themselves in their new constitutional surroundings. The Iraklis, however, hold other views of their political capacities, and the British Government has appreciated the wisdom of restricting as soon as possible its commitments and responsibilities in the country. Accordingly, by means of a Protocol, the Treaty has been subjected to an important modification; it is to terminate "upon Irak becoming a member of the League of Nations, and in any case not later than four years from the ratification of peace with Turkey." Under the terms of the Treaty Great Britain pledged herself to use her good offices to secure the admission of Irak to membership of the League of Nations "as soon as possible," and this undertaking has now been rendered more precise by making it dependent upon the fulfilment of two essential conditions—the delimitation of the frontiers of Irak and the establishment of a stable Government in accordance with the Organic Law. The former depends on the ratification of peace with Turkey; the latter is making such satisfactory headway that its fulfilment is anticipated "at no distant date."

The Protocol is the outcome of the consideration that Mr. Bonar Law's Government promised to give to the Irak question. It represents the policy that Sir Percy Cox has recommended, but in regard to which he did not succeed in carrying with him the members of the Coalition Cabinet. The decision now taken, we may hope, will put an end to the agitation for the immediate evacuation of Irak by Great Britain. As a practical measure the phrase was meaningless, because it was a physical impossibility, but it stood for an attitude of mind that was prepared to subordinate honour and practical politics to any fetish that promised to appeal to the popular fancy. The need for economy in Great Britain's oversea commitments is an axiom that cannot be challenged. It says much, however, for the sober sense of the nation as a whole that at a time when the desire to lighten its financial burden is overwhelming, it has refused to be stampeded into a facile escape from certain expenditure unless it could be assured that economy was not going to be practised at the expense of national honour. The Government has evolved the correct solution, which, it is to be hoped, will prejudice neither British prestige nor the interests of Irak.

The policy of the Protocol introduces a new era of vital importance to the Arab world. If only by virtue of the start that it has in political knowledge and experience as a result of a brief period of British training, Irak should be able to set a standard that no other Arab State in Asia can challenge. On it, therefore, devolves the task of acting as a bulwark of the Arabs against reabsorption by Turkey. Against a hostile Turkey bent on conquest the Iraklis by themselves stand no chance. For salvation they must depend either on British protection or on the maintenance of a friendly relationship with the Turks. Better still if they can rely on both, and to this end their policy, it is obvious, should be constantly directed. According to present indications, there is ground for supposing that, when once the problem of Kurdistan has been settled, the Turks will be willing to leave the Iraklis to themselves. Whether a solution in regard to the Kurds that will satisfy Kurds, Turks, and Arabs can be found it is not easy at this stage to determine. The fact that it is the crux of Irak's future peace of mind should not be lost sight of, and it is worth a considerable amount of careful thought and investigation on the part of Great Britain and Irak, with a view to settling the Kurdistan question once and for all. Of British goodwill and Britain's moral support the Iraklis are assured unless they themselves go out of their way to forfeit them. They will have been started with all the advantages of a stable government; in one particular or another it may conceivably chafe them or fall short of some theoretical ideal. If they remember, however, the dangers to which they will inevitably be exposed as a result of disturbing the basis on which the new State rests, they will be the more inclined to bear such ills as they may think they suffer from than fly to others that they wot not of. It should be to the interest of all parties to make a success of the present régime in order that internal improvements may be effected gradually without the risk of any disturbance to the general security of the State.

A BOSNIAN CATTLE FAIR.

At Zvornik the grey cliffs, rising from the Bosnian side of the lovely River Drina, once separating, now uniting Serbia and her kindred in Bosnia, shelter the town from the strong mountain winds, so that looking up one may watch the play of sunlight on the feathery fronds of the young acacias which somehow find a footing amid the rocks, or, glancing higher still, mark the graceful sway of the trees of loftier growth silhouetted against the cloudless blue of the sky. The town, nestling under the shelter of the mountains, bears unmistakable evidence of its Turkish tradition imposed upon the country for so many centuries. The whitewashed houses, roofed with the beautiful hand-made tiles of Bosnia or the grey of shingled timber from the mighty forests, have latticed windows to their women's quarters.

Around the market place the shops, open-fronted to the streets, ply a busy trade, and when the great cattle fairs of Zvornik are held hundreds of peasants pour in from remote villages, so that there is a hum of life in the quiet streets and the bridge spanning Drina River is a kaleidoscope of colour.

In summer that lovely river is a miracle of changing light, turquoise or jade as the sunshine falls, most beautiful, perhaps, when the sky, turning to pearl grey, lends its blue to her waters. But Drina can be terrible in wrath when, swollen into spate by the mountain snows, she pours her waters along the valleys, so the bridge which links Zvornik with Serbia is buttressed by strong breakwaters, beneath which the slender, graceful feluccas with hooded prows are moored.

And since the life of the people centres round the river, its natural highway, so the cattle fair of Zvornik is held upon its banks. The tents and booths are pitched by the waterside, and Serb in sheepskin cap and Bosnian in scarlet fez wrangle amicably over their bargains, undismayed by the frowning masonry of the old Turkish citadel, now an empty menace. Among the booths the cheap-jacks carry on a roaring trade with brightly coloured biscuits shaped like ikons, common hardware and jewellery, pictures of saints, gay handkerchiefs, and here and there some of the beautiful old silver work of Bosnia. Every Kafana has its gipsy fiddles, and there is much dancing of "Kolo," without which no Serbian festival would be complete. The Kafedjaria plies his trade with much jingling of brass coffee pots or water bottles: and "malina," the sweet raspberry syrup beloved of Serbian hearts, finds many customers.

Every Bosnian dandy has turned out for the day in spotless white shirt and scarlet fez, smart black Zouave jacket and folded sash of green and yellow silk. Best of all are his wonderful trousers, which would be the despair of any European tailor. Tight over the hips, they fall into a graceful pouch both back and front, while down the leg the fullness decreases to the knee, clinging tightly to calf and ankle, and being strapped over the shoe. The Bosnian "man about town" is indeed a very beautiful being, and doubtless gives his tailor an infinitude of trouble over the line of black braid which outlines his shapely limbs! An armoury of silver-hilted weapons, to-day merely for show, completes the outfit of the stalwart brown-skinned mountaineer.

The Serb remains faithful to his sheepskin cap and homespun trousers, but for the Fair he dons his smartest embroidered shirt, wearing it over the trousers the better to display its pleats and folds, and girding his waist with a handsome leather belt or fine silk sash. On his feet are the traditional "opanke," leather sandals fastened round the ankle with a thong, and the gay stockings, into which the clever fingers of the Serbian women have woven marvellous patterns of flower or fruit.

The cattle fair of Zvornik is a gala day for the women, who are here in all the bravery of white linen dresses spun from bleached flax, with great puffed sleeves held up by ribbons, a velvet sleeveless coat embroidered in silk and pearls over this, wonderful double aprons of velvet or silk, and on their heads either a silk handkerchief of red or yellow, a fringe of silver coins showing beneath, or one of the innumerable varieties of starched lace headresses in which Bosnia is so rich. They crowd the booths and investigate the cheap stalls like so many butterflies; and while their menfolk are busy with cattle and horses they are revelling in the social intercourse so unwonted in their quiet, busy lives in remote villages or mountain hamlet. Little money passes, except in the Kafanas, where all assemble to eat and drink, but the cheapjacks do not seem ill pleased. Perhaps their turn comes later, when the serious business of the day is over.

Nightfall finds the bustle unabated. A shaft of light striking the bridge turns the pillars into golden things of beauty. There is the soft haze of blue wood smoke from the cooking places, and the slender columns of the mosques pierce the sky above the poplar stems. The little brown roofed houses, their whiteness picked out with blue or green at the lattices, stand out against the dusky green and purple of the Bosnian hills at sunset, but the river gleams with the last rays of the sunlight, the perfect jade green of an uncut stone.

When darkness falls, the blue velvety darkness of a Bosnian night pierced with silver stars, the bustle dies away from the river bank. Only the red glow of the camp fires break the dusk, and the thrumming of a guitar the silence. Within the latticed houses the people, weary after the excitement of this day in their quiet lives, sleep peacefully, and presently a silver moon bathes river and mountain alike in a splendid radiance.

The Irak Decision.

The Morning Post thinks that the decision of the Government that Irak shall have "full and complete independence at any time within a maximum of four years from the ratification of peace with Turkey," will be welcomed not only by the Arabs, but by the British peoples. A British administration of Irak, it says, could have been justified only on two grounds: (1) It must have the loyal co-operation and approval of the Arabs—"precisely what it did not have"; and (2) considerations of Imperial strategy, on which it pointedly remarks that "it is better to spend money on docks at Singapore than on barracks at Mosul." And it proceeds to attempt to establish a connection between Irak and Palestine:—

The Government, therefore, have taken a wise decision in reducing our commitments in Irak, subject to a durable peace with Turkey. We hope they will now go on from strength to strength, and similarly reduce our commitments in Palestine. Mr. Lansing spoke of self-determination as a phrase loaded with dynamite. But the phrase has never had a chance of showing its destructive possibilities in Palestine. There the Arab is held down under the Zionist yoke, and, to our shame be it said, under the British bayonet, while his brother in Irak is being inundated with successive showers of liberty. We have struck off the light fetters of the Arabs of the Euphrates, but we still shackle the Arabs of the Jordan with the Zionist chains. We have abolished the mandate in Irak. The next, the inevitable step, is to abolish the mandate in Palestine.

The Times considers the decision to be "a compromise with which both honour and economy may be satisfied." Irak, it thinks, will approve of the new agreement; ratification of which, however, must necessarily take some time. Meanwhile—

The only wise course for us to take in the transition period before the expiry of the Treaty is, as it has always been, to provide by amicable arrangement with the Irak Government for the gradual reduction of our expenditure. There does not appear to be any reason why the whole cost of the civil administration, except, perhaps, that of the High Commissioner and his staff, and why a part of the cost of the military and air services should not fall upon Irak itself. The "nature and extent" of British assistance were reserved, as has been seen, for subsidiary Agreements. These should now be concluded so that they may be ready for ratification with the Treaty, and they should be drawn upon lines which will relieve the British taxpayer from unnecessary expenditure while providing all that is really requisite for the efficient protection of Irak. The details are matters of agreement, and happily there is no reason to believe that King Feisal or his people will be unreasonable in discussing them. Meanwhile the Government are to be congratulated on the skill with which they have handled an extremely difficult problem.

The Manchester Guardian emphasises the importance of the point of Irak's entering the League of Nations, and adds pertinently:—

In proposing to terminate the Treaty as soon as Irak enters the League, we are deliberately leaving to the League the task of protecting Irak against enemies, and we are basing our action—our escape from obligations voluntarily undertaken—on the assumption that the League is in a position to afford that protection. This seems, to say the least, to impose on us the necessity of making the League adequate to the task of performing our duties which we are assigning to it. There is, of course, one other thing on which the Government, in the coming debate, should furnish information: the grounds for now supposing that Irak will be able within four years to forgo the protection which last autumn we were assuming she would need for twenty years.

The Lausanne Conference.

A writer in the Manchester Guardian of May 3 considers the relations between France and Turkey, and suggests that M. Poincaré's position is shaken. All French journals, he says, are agreed that the humiliation of France by Turkey has gone far enough. But, in addition to humiliation, now comes danger, a fact which prompts the following paragraph:—

The Conference of Lausanne has, therefore, recommenced its work in an atmosphere of gloom and deceit greater even than that which enshrouded its predecessor. Admiral Chester is the new Franklin Bouillon, and the French are left out in the corridor. Only the British policy remains the same, or practically the same. The British troops stand where they did, and Constantinople is still in pawn. But France, in addition to sending General Weygand, is preparing two divisions of troops for the defence of Alexandretta, an unexpected and disturbing development. No wonder M. Poincaré was less militant at Dunkerque than had been expected in his attitude to Britain, or that he omitted in his speech at Voie all reference to Lord Curzon's speech. He must be beginning to think things over again in the light of the new French crusade in Syria. The withdrawal from Cilicia was a bitter pill, even if it did at the time help the cause of the changed French policy. In England it was hardly even realised that there had been such a setback to French prestige, and by now even Chanak is forgotten. But in France it seems as if Cilicia and Chanak will be the war-cry that will chase M. Poincaré from his throne. Time will show.

NEWS IN BRIEF.

Thomas Middle, an Indian Mutiny veteran, wounded during the storming of Kashmir Gate, died at Totnes last Thursday.

General Weygand, the new French High Commissioner for Syria, sailed on May 4 from Toulon for Beyrout, on board the battleship La Lorraine.

It is announced from Bucharest that the King and Queen of Roumania propose to visit Warsaw, Brussels, London, Paris, Rome, and Belgrade next August.

According to present arrangements, the whole of the twenty-two thousand Greek refugees now in Constantinople from Pontus will have been evacuated to Greece before May 9.

An Athens message says that the Yugoslav Minister has notified the Belgrade Government's acceptance of the latest views of the Greek Government in regard to the free zone of Salonika.

It is stated that Saadi Bey, who as acting Chief of Police took over the police control of Constantinople under Rafet Pasha from the Occupying Powers at the end of last year, has been dismissed.

A Belgrade message states that M. Pashitch resumed office on May 2 with the same Cabinet as before, the Radical and Democratic Parties being unable to agree on terms for a Coalition Government.

Sentence of three months' simple imprisonment has been pronounced on the assistant surgeon of the Poona hospital, who by mistake administered the drug which caused the death of the Raja of Akalkot.

The Soviet Government announces that an official proclamation has been issued stating that the Transcaucasian Republics of Azerbaijan, Armenia, and Georgia have been united politically, militarily, and economically.

Unemployment in Palestine is diminishing, but there are still about two thousand out of work. The closing of some relatively large industrial establishments at Jaffa and Tel Aviv has aggravated the general industrial situation.

It is officially stated that during the first quarter of the current year 2,493 Jewish immigrants entered Palestine—namely, 1,039 men, 815 women, and 639 children. The number for the corresponding period of 1922 was 2,452.

The Palestine Land Development Company has purchased an area of 3,200 dunams of land on Mount Carmel for a group of Roumanian Jews. The company is also purchasing land to the value of £10,000 near Jerusalem for Mr. Pears, of Canada.

Communication by the recently completed telegraph line between Peshawar and Kabul has been interrupted since April 6, the line having broken down in several places. Meanwhile, communication by wireless is being actively carried on.

Of the 2,335 licensed premises in the Constantinople area, it is expected that all except about two hundred, which will be kept open for the convenience of the subjects of the three Occupying Powers, will be closed after Ramadan under the Turkish Dry Law.

The Postmaster-General points out that letters addressed to members of the Forces serving in Irak must be prepaid at the international rate of 3d. for the first ounce, which is in force for civilian letters. A number of such letters are still being posted prepaid 1½d. only, and are surcharged on delivery.

ARCHÆOLOGY IN IRAK.

A growing interest in archæology is being manifested in Irak, and a proposal which aims at the creation at Baghdad of a museum under the charge, in the first instance, of a foreign expert curator has received substantial support. In the meantime, as a preliminary step, the Council of Ministers has authorised the provision of sufficient space in the new premises of the Ministry of Communication and Works for such antiquities as are now available from Ur and elsewhere. This collection will be under the care of the Honorary Director of Antiquities, assisted by an Iraki who was formerly employed in the Constantinople Museum.

TAXATION IN TURKEY.

Our Constantinople Correspondent writes:—

In regard to the Temettu, or income-tax, as it applies to salaries, much uncertainty has prevailed as to the exact intentions of the Government. For the moment there appears to be no effort to insist on the payment of this tax at this juncture by Allied subjects. The difficulties that have arisen have been in connection with the sending in of lists for employees of Ottoman nationality, for which the employers are responsible. It was pointed out that the law as it stood would entail the payment by the salaried person of Government and municipal taxes to the amount of 22½ per cent., or nearly three months' salary per annum. It has now been decided, however, that the tax shall be calculated—in the case of salaries paid in foreign currencies at the nominal rate of exchange for the currency in question; thus for sterling at the rate of 110 piastres to the £—and in the case of salaries paid in Turkish currency at the scale for such salary as it obtained in 1915.

PALESTINE EXPLORATION.

The Colonial Office states that there is no foundation for the report that the proposed excavation of the ancient city of David will be made in the vicinity of the Coenaculum, on the hill popularly known as Mount Zion. The real site of Zion, the City of David, has long been known to archæologists. It lies, not on the hill on which the Coenaculum stands, but further eastwards on the little triangular spur called Ophel, which, starting between the Dung Gate and the south-eastern corner of the modern city wall outside the Haram (Mosque of Omar) area, runs southward to its apex above the old Pool of Siloam. It was on this small spur, first occupied by the Jebusites, that David founded his City of Zion. Here his tomb is probably to be found, and here the excavations will be carried out. The site has at present no religious interest in the eyes of Christians, Jews, or Moslems. It is over a quarter of a mile distant from the Coenaculum.

NOTES AND NEWS.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The Zagreb Fair.

Our Liubliana correspondent gives this week a detailed review of the recent Zagreb Fair. It was a more impressive event than last year, and was notable, inter alia, for the evidence it provided of the extent of the manufactures of the communities comprising Yugoslavia. Foreign countries, our correspondent points out, took full advantage of the opportunity for trade development afforded by the fair, but this country was only represented by the Associated British Manufacturers (Near East) and it appears that disappointment was felt that British goods were not more to the fore.

Possible Reasons for British Apathy.

While it is much to be regretted that British firms have not utilised such a promising opportunity of entering a market which offers such undoubted scope for trade expansion as Yugoslavia, it is not difficult to find reasons for it. For one thing, there was no attempt at organised publicity for the fair in this country. A few brief notices in the Press, a poster or two, and similar things, may suffice in cases where there will inevitably be a large demand for the commodity advertised, but, as regards a fair in a foreign country, of which (though I blush to admit it) British business men, the bulk of them at any rate, have but small knowledge, nothing but systematic advertising will suffice. Another reason, and one which is equally important, and, it may be added, makes even more vital the need for publicity, is the plethora of fairs and similar undertakings nowadays. Before the war, fairs were comparatively rare, and for that reason were usually representative. Since 1918, however, we have been literally deluged with fairs of all descriptions, and business men have become doubtful, especially with the existing trade depression, whether representation at them is worth their while. That is a factor that organisers of fairs are likely to have to take into increasing consideration.

The Levant Company.

The report of the Levant Company, which has just been issued, covering the last two years to December 31 last, aptly reflects the extremely unfavourable conditions in the Near East since the collapse of the short-lived "boom" which followed the Armistice. The company has truly had a tragic experience. Under anything approaching reasonable conditions it would have been certain to achieve a very considerable measure of success long before this, but the circumstances with which it has been faced so far have given it no chance whatever, and for the two years in question the company and its subsidiaries sustained a net loss on trading operations of £649,315, against which dividends amounting to £10,000 have to be placed.

There was a debit balance brought forward of £361,169, so that the company has, therefore, a total loss of £999,604.

Scheme of Reconstruction.

At the meeting which will be held this week before these notes appear a drastic scheme of reconstruction is to be put forward. The capital is to be reduced from £1,000,000 to £400,000 by the cancellation of the existing 400,000 ordinary and the 200,000 deferred shares which have been issued. The shareholders are to receive instead profit-sharing certificates of no nominal amount in the proportion of one certificate for every ten cancelled shares. After a 10 per cent. non-cumulative dividend has been paid on the ordinary shares, holders of the certificates will be entitled to receive half the surplus profits. The adoption of the scheme and the provision of further working capital, which is assured, will enable the company to "carry on," and as we have now passed the apex of trade depression, the time should not be far distant when the company will justify to some extent the hopes that were aroused at its formation.

Empire Cotton Growing.

It scarcely needs emphasis that the speedy passage of the Empire Cotton Bill is a matter of special importance for Lancashire and for the country as a whole. The Bill is now before a Standing Committee of the House, and grounds exist for the view that as a result of the pressure of other business time may not be available during the present session, failing the grant of special facilities by the Government, for further progress to be made. In view of this position a letter was sent last week by the Inter-Imperial Trade Committee of the Federation of British Industries to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as Leader of the House, drawing attention to the necessity for the prompt passing of the Bill. The Committee pointed out that delay in regard to the measure would mean that the work of the Empire Cotton Growing Corporation would be seriously handicapped, and that the Corporation would be unable to develop its operations in relation to the extension of the supply of cotton within the Empire.

YUGOSLAVIA.

Liubliana, May 2.

The Zagreb Fair.

The Second Zagreb Samples Fair (April 22 to May 1) has been brought to a successful close. Visitors who had seen the first fair last year were struck at once by the great improvement noticeable in all that concerned organisation and arrangement. There was an air of old-established order and prosperity about the well-filled stands in the unpretentious pavilions, and the standard of quality of the goods on exhibition was high. Of course, the machine section was by far the largest and the most interesting, and it may have come as a surprise to foreign visitors to note how much machinery is made in the country, especially around Zagreb and Liubliana, the chief centres of industry in Yugoslavia. Agriculture, timber, and water power are the three main factors in determining the type of machinery required and produced. The leather section was good, as was to be expected; there was far greater variety in the boots and shoes shown by native makers; indeed, there seemed to be every type on view, from the most serviceable to dainty examples of the latest fashion. The furniture was well made, and the beauty of the native timber seemed to have been turned to very good account. Yugoslav biscuit-makers have greatly improved their wares, and are now competing successfully with foreign importers. The textile industry is still the weak point, although here we must expect everything that can come under the head of home industries. Serbian rugs are well known already, and Bosnian rugs are not much inferior in design or colour. There was an excellent show of Croatian embroideries and Bosnian fancy wares. One firm sent elaborately hand-carved furniture from Sarajevo, which in design and taste showed an interesting blend of Western and Oriental ideas, while a Slovene firm was showing a severely plain and solid dining-room suite in cottage style, carried out in well-seasoned wood (timber from the old bridge over the Drava at Mariber), unstained and polished. A kind of heavy homespun linen from Bosnia was exhibited for the first time. In all, there were 720 exhibiting firms as against 660 last year. Among foreign exhibitors the Czecho-Slovaks filled their large pavilion; over one hundred French firms were represented, 40 Austrian, and 20 German firms; there were two Swedish firms (iron and machinery), two Italian, two American (motor-cars and agricultural machinery). Great Britain was represented solely by the Associated British Manufacturers, who occupied their own pavilion. The interest in British goods was great, and there was real disappointment because there were so few samples on view. As it was, much business was done, and a great deal more could have been done. So far British manufacturers have encountered a good deal of difficulty in trying to get into touch with the Yugoslav market. There has been the unfortunate instability of the exchange, and there have been alterations in the Customs regulations which have proved vexatious to would-be exhibitors. But the Yugoslavs have only had four years' existence as an independent State, and they are learning by experience. Special facilities had been this time accorded to goods destined for the fair, and there was no delay in delivery at this end. The Zagreb Fair may now be looked upon as a regular spring fixture, and it is to be hoped that next year British industry will be better represented.

One was glad to note that, in spite of internal politics, the number of Serbian firms at the fair was nearly twice as great as last year. The fact is that far too much is made of the political side of things over here. In practice, a good business man does not let his party point of view (if he has one) interfere with business or embitter him against a good customer, and the Liubliana and Zagreb Fairs are doing yeoman service in helping to dispel that ignorance of each other which is the real trouble between the various populations of Yugoslavia. The Zagreb Fair attracted customers from all over the kingdom, especially from the Voivodina (the north-eastern part).

For those interested, it may be added that the Liubliana Fair Committee have made arrangements for facilities in getting through the Customs for all goods destined for the Liubliana Fair, which is an autumn fixture, and will open on September 1 this year.

THE SUDAN AND THE EMPIRE EXHIBITION.

Since the issue of the last notice of arrangements in regard to the representation of the Sudan at the British Empire Exhibition, a number of modifications of plan have been made to meet the wishes of the various countries forming the East African group of exhibitors, of which the Sudan is a member (says the report of the Central Economic Board of the Sudan Government). Under the present scheme the area to be taken up by the Sudan in the pavilion to be erected to house the exhibits of the group will be 2,500 square feet. On this basis the share of the Sudan in the cost of the building is estimated at £2,400. As originally arranged a separate room with independent access will be available for Sudan exhibits.

Valuable support is being received from the Sudan Chamber of Commerce, and from firms interested in the development of the Sudan. Messrs. S. Pearson and Son, contractors for the Makwar Dam and Gezira Canalisation Works, have promised to contribute £500 towards the cost of the Sudan exhibit, and to assist in preparation of models and photographs. Messrs. the Sudan Plantations Syndicate are contributing £E.400 and helping with provision of samples of cotton and photographs. Contributions of £100 have also been promised by Messrs. the Nile Congo Divide Syndicate and Messrs. James Laing, Son, and Co. Messrs. McCorquodale and Co., Ltd., are subscribing £25. Mr R. S. Hakim is contributing bales of cotton.

Among the firms subscribing through the Sudan Chamber of Commerce are the following:—The Anglo-Egyptian Bank, Ltd., £E.100; the National Bank of Egypt, Ltd., £E.100; Messrs. Gellatly, Hankey, and Co., £E.100; Messrs. Contomichalos, Darke, and Co., Ltd., £E.100; Mr. Aziz Kfour, £E.40; Messrs. George Th. Stamatopoulos, £E.25; Messrs. the Sudan Mercantile Co., Ltd., £E.25; Messrs. Sudan Trading Co. (Ph. Contomichalos), £E.25; and Messrs. the Sudan Import and Export Co., £E.25.

PORT SAID NOTES.

Port Said, April 30.

Last week the demolition of the lantern of the lighthouse at Port Said was begun, and is now proceeding quickly. This is preparatory to the installation of a new light, which, it is hoped, will be ready about June. There is a temporary light shown from a window lower down the tower, which is run by an electric arc light, as was the old one; but this only has a nominal range of twelve miles, as against a visibility of twenty miles for the old light. The new light will also have a nominal range of twenty miles, but as the illuminant will be oil (the "Chance" incandescent method) it is confidently expected that it will have a greater fog-penetrating power and that there will be great economy in the running expenses. Meanwhile the time signal will not be exhibited, but this is not serious, as it would have been a few years ago, as most ships now get the wireless time signals from the Eiffel Tower when coming along the Mediterranean, and often in the Red Sea, too.

The last vestiges of the floating bridge for road and foot traffic across the Canal at Kantara have now gone, as the two chain ferries which were installed some months ago have been found sufficient to cope with the traffic.

The Resolute, a large vessel of over twenty thousand tons, which is perhaps the last of the big tourist ships this season, has just passed through bound west. She was sailing under the flag of the Panama Republic, but had on board a large number of United States citizens. It is rumoured (but, perish the thought!) that it is for reasons of humidity that the ship is not under the United States flag.

REDUCTION IN PASSAGE RATES TO EAST

The Ellerman and Bucknall Steamship Co., Ltd., have again reduced the passage rates ruling by their Far East Service from Southampton, to take immediate effect.

The revised rates will be as under:—1st Class: To Singapore, £78 and £86; to Hong Kong, £84 and £92; to Shanghai, £90 and £98; to Kobe and Yokohama, £94 and £102. 2nd Class: To Singapore, £50 and £56; to Hong Kong, £56 and £62; to Shanghai, £60 and £66; to Kobe and Yokohama, £62 and £68. The fares between the Far East ports and Marseilles will be £7 first class and £4 second class less than the foregoing rates. The steamers operating this service include the latest additions to the Ellerman passenger fleet.

A revision of Czecho-Slovakia's commercial treaty with Spain is to be made in the near future.

The annual general meeting of the Alexandria Water Co., Ltd., will be held at Alexandria on June 1.

Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields.—Production for week ended May 4: Gemsah, 33 tons; Hurghada, 3,421 tons.

Cyprus Oil Trust.—Cable advice from Trinidad announces that No. 1 well is now down to 170 ft., and that the first oil sand was encountered at 160 ft. Drilling is continuing.

Major Boyd Carpenter, replying in Parliament on May 1 to Commander Bellairs, said: The present holding of Great Britain in the Suez Canal consists of 160,101 original shares and 16,501 Actions de Jouissance, which replace drawn original shares. The estimated market value of this holding is £19,206,335. When an original share is drawn the holder receives in addition to an Action de Jouissance repayment in cash; 16,501 original shares held by Great Britain have so been drawn, and over a period of years the Exchequer has received in repayment of these drawn shares £292,451.

ROUMANIAN BONDS SINKING FUND.

Mr. Raine asked the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, on May 7, whether he would inquire of the Roumanian Commission appointed to investigate the claims of British holders of Roumanian Government bonds whether that Government proposed to honour its obligations under the terms of its 1908 loan by restoring the sinking fund and paying interest to British holders in gold lei as printed on the coupons of these bonds.

Mr. McNeill: His Majesty's Government has drawn the serious attention of the Roumanian Government to the terms of the 1908 loan. It is for British bondholders themselves, taking into full account the present value of the lei and the causes of its depreciation, to decide whether the terms which may be offered by the Roumanian Commission are reasonable and just.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Dull.

The Commercial Company of Egypt, in their report for the week ended April 27, state:—

Since our last report, the futures market has been very dull. The weakness must be attributed mainly to the almost complete absence of fresh orders from spinners and to the apathetic attitude of local speculators. Ashmounis have maintained a better tone, due to the recent rise of the New York market and to the appreciation of the American dollar; American prices are again practically at par with Ashmounis, allowing for exchange difference. Egyptians in Liverpool have been slightly firmer, due presumably to the continuation of the fairly heavy daily sales and the consequent buying back of hedges in that market; however, Liverpool prices continue to be considerably cheaper than Alexandria, and it is but natural to expect trade demand to go to that market for the time being. The arrivals from up-country have this week amounted to about 60,000 krs. and the exports to about 126,500 krs. Stocks stand at 1,723,819 krs., against 2,195,380 krs. a year ago. The statistical position remains very satisfactory, and as arrivals from the interior will more or less cease after a few days we are of opinion that the present weakness of the market will only be temporary, or, at any rate, that a serious drop is not to be anticipated unless something unforeseen and of considerable importance happens.

Spot.—Once more we have had a poor week at Minet el Bassal. Sales for the five days during which the market has been open amount to about 3,700 bales, of which we estimate 2,100 bales Sakellarides, 1,500 bales Uppers, and 100 bales Brown and White. The demand from abroad continues extremely limited, and spinners do not seem disposed to buy much cotton at present.

Sakellarides.—Most of the business has been in the medium and lower qualities, though a little demand has arisen for Good. Prices are generally unchanged for spot against contracts.

Uppers.—All styles have been dealt in, with rather more attention paid to the better grades. There is practically no change in prices.

Brown and White are neglected, and only a retail business has been done, at last week's rates.

Crop 1923.—The new crop does not appear to have made a very good start owing to the cold weather during the past month; however, good weather can do much to remedy this poor start, especially if the summer water supply is better than it was last year, which hope present indications would appear to justify. Rains in Abyssinia, which commenced early in the month, have continued to fall freely, and water supply prospects are such that the cultivation of about 200,000 feddans of rice in Egypt will be permitted.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Market Unsettled.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended May 2:—

The continued weakness in the American markets has naturally affected Egyptians, and at the moment an unsettled and restless feeling is apparent throughout the trade. Yesterday a fair amount of "fixing" took place on the supposition that, for the time being, the bottom had been reached and that a reaction was due. A further decline in New York overnight, which brought more Continental selling into our market this morning, has upset this idea, however, and to-day prices have given way all round. Receipts in Alexandria have been heavy during the past week, the end of April coinciding with the close of the ginning season, and we are now within a measurable distance of knowing the total crop figures for 1922-23. The Liverpool stock taken on the 27th ult. has been returned as 119,174 bales, of which 5,570 are Sudan cotton. This return was rather below what was generally expected, but constitutes nevertheless a formidable figure to absorb, with only a few months more of the present season still to run. In the face of persistently dropping markets, it was only to be expected that the demand for spot cotton should ease off somewhat, and such was the case during the first two or three days. To-day, however, the enquiry broadened out again, and rather more business has resulted. Good fair to fully good fair Sakellaridis and Uppers, as usual, have attracted most attention, the former being obtainable at from 25 to 75 points on contracts, and the latter at about 15 to 30 points on. Good Sakellaridis, and grades above, have been but little in request, the tendency having swung round again toward the lower cotton, just when some progress appeared likely in the other direction. Low cottons, at anything from 7d. to 13d., have been in moderate request, and sellers are distinctly easier. Other growths have been neglected. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending 27th ult. were returned as 6,374 bales—a considerable falling off! C.i.f. business has been very quiet. Total sales 2,900 bales (includes 120 Sudan). Quotations of Sakellaridis good fair and above are reduced 50 points; Fair, exceptionally 40 points. Brown and Upper are reduced 30 points all round. F.G.F. Sakellaridis to-day 16.75d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Demand for Cloth in Near East.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended May 5 states:—

This market has shown no sign of increased animation during the past week, and business remains exceedingly dull. Negotiations have been taking place with regard to the operatives' wages, and it appears to be generally thought that the result will be a stabilisation of the current rates for a further period of probably one and a-half to two years. The present scale is approximately 70 per cent. above pre-war.

Yarn.—Prices are a little lower following the fall in the cost of raw cotton, but business remains very quiet, and so far as concerns spinners of American it is questionable whether the much reduced output is being cleared. Egyptian yarns are in fair demand.

Cloth.—The principal markets and the Home trade continue to purchase very sparingly, and the most hopeful section during the past week has been the Near East. A fair business has been done for Constantinople, and there appears to be more confidence in shipping to that market and to Smyrna, with both of which it seems probable that a good trade could be done if the Lausanne Conference should be successful in arranging terms of peace.

Raw Cotton.—Following New York, the Liverpool cotton market has shown a falling tendency throughout the week. The demand has been small, weather reports from the American cotton belt have been favourable, and the effect of the action taken by the United States Government with a view to stopping speculation in sugar has not yet worn off. The feeling is growing here that much lower prices will have to be seen before Lancashire goods can be produced at a price which the majority of the people abroad who wear them can afford to pay. Closing prices are as follows:—American Fully Middling, 14.88d.; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 16.40d.

The Steaua Romana (British), Ltd., are advised that their fields' gross production during the month of April was 18,900 tons.

Sultanias are a very firm spot, and Smyrna fruit is dearer. Plums have continued in excellent request, and supplies are now almost exhausted. Figs have been moving off well.

Among the openings for trade in the Near East recently reported to the Department of Overseas Trade are the following:—A firm of earthenware manufacturers in Brasov (Transylvania) desires to receive quotations from British exporters of flake litharge and pure red lead (free from iron); a firm at Timisoara is desirous of purchasing drugs and chemicals from British sources; a merchant of Durazzo wishes to get into touch with British manufacturers of pharmaceutical and medical materials, and would also be prepared to represent manufacturers of patent medicines.

SUDAN PRODUCE.

The following extracts are taken from the report of the Central Economic Board of the Sudan Government for March:—

Gum.

The exports of gum during March were as follows:—Via Port Sudan, 2,923,635 kilos of hashab, of the value of £E133,590, and 199,725 kilos of talh of the value of £E3,913.

Kordofan Province.—15,618 kantars of 100 rotls (45 kilos) were sold in El-Obeid market during the month, as against 18,425 kantars during the same month last year. The average price was £E1.513 m/ms. per kantar. The arrivals at El-Obeid from Nahud were 14,902 kantars, as against 9,552 kantars last year. The amount sold at Nahud during the month was 10,751 kantars, as against 10,840 kantars last year, the average price being £E1.200 m/ms. per kantar. 6,064 kantars were sold at Um Ruaba at an average price of £E1.460 m/ms. per kantar, as against 4,413 kantars last year. At Rahad 3,981 kantars were sold at prices ranging from £E1.600 to £E1.350 per kantar, as against 1,990 kantars during March last year.

White Nile Province.—389 tons of gum were exported from Tendelti and 25 tons from Kosti.

Cotton.

Dongola Province: Gurier Pumping Station, February.—Cotton has not yielded quite as well as was expected. There is still a good deal to come in, only about half the crop having been picked from Gurier and Kaneesa, but it is doubtful if the total yield will exceed 2½ kantars per feddan. Total collected to end of month, 623 kantars. Ghaba Pumping Station, February.—Cotton is late and slow in opening owing to the cold weather at Ghaba. The cotton of Ghaba and Arab Narti has yielded about all it will give. Gharb Dongola and Baga cotton will give a large amount yet.

Berber Province: Bouga Pumping Station, February.—Cotton looks well, and capable of yielding more. Areas that were overwatered are improving greatly. American cotton yielded 192 kantars this month, giving a total to end of February of 1,338 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned). Sakellaridis yielded 57 kantars, giving a total of 82 kantars to end of February. March.—Cotton is doing better, and should yield something over 4 kantars per feddan. American cotton yielded 100 kantars this month, giving a total of 1,554 kantars to end of February. Sakellaridis has given a fine yield on good soil, though the average is poor; 55 kantars were brought in during the month, giving a total of 112 kantars up to the end of March. Kitiab Pumping Station, March.—The cotton yield will be less than 2½ kantars of 315 rottles (unginned) per feddan over the whole area. The yield of cotton up to the end of March has been 1,044 kantars, or 2.3 kantars per feddan. Small quantities are still coming in.

Red Sea Province.—The cotton has been slow in coming in, the season being unusually late. The weather has remained damp and cloudy, so ripening has been slow. With a little more sun, the daily supplies will be very much larger. An experiment is to be made during April to discover whether a more detailed classification than that employed at present would be more satisfactory. Tokar.—The cotton market opened on the first, and good prices were obtainable at once.

DRIED FRUIT REPORT.

Messrs. J. C. Houghton and Co., of Liverpool, report as follows under date May 1:—

Currants.—The market during the period under review has shown a substantial recovery, due partly to the strong position in Greece, and to increased business from the country. Stocks here are light, and the attitude of most buyers being one of confidence, they are displaying more disposition to operate on freer lines. Arrivals have been s.s. Tyria and s.s. Cressado, with about 650 tons, a portion of which was disposed of afloat. Pyrgos has steadily appreciated in value, and fair lines have been moved in $\frac{1}{4}$ -cases at 54s. 6d. and in bags at 53s. 6d. Cleaned $\frac{1}{4}$ -cases have been eagerly competed for at 58s. to 60s., and smalls 65s.; Gulf and Panariti, 60s. to 63s.; Vostizza Shade Dried, 68s. to 73s.; Small also in demand, 71s. to 75s. Latest quotations:—Pyrgos, 54s. 6d.; Amalias and Patras, 56s. to 58s.; Gulf and Panariti, 60s. to 63s.; Vostizza, 68s. to 73s. S.s. Cypria and s.s. Maronian are loading, and, as the stock remaining shows an extremely poor selection, these arrivals should meet keen competition. The first arrival of Australian 3 Crown fruit realised 71s. London, quality being very attractive. It is regrettable that no direct shipments have so far reached this market, the trade having to look to London for their supplies, considerably adding to the cost of distribution.

Raisins.—The few remaining parcels realised 35s. to 37s. for $\frac{1}{4}$ -boxes.

Sultanas.—A distinct improvement in the market tendency has taken place, but unfortunately the volume of trade has continued small, buyers refusing to purchase more than necessary to meet immediate requirements. Sales have been made from 75s. to 80s., medium to fair qualities; good, 82s. to 90s.; white fine grade is scarce at 95s. to 115s. Greeks are selling from 75s. to 80s. Continued reports of an adverse nature concerning the growing crop are coming to hand from Smyrna. Afghans.—Holders show more disposition to make progress, but prices fail to attract buyers. Californian Soda Bleached are selling slowly at 65s. Australian 3 Crown Grade sell at 90s. c.i.f. afloat.

Figs.—Dragging sale. Smyrna Natural 35s., Algerian 26s.

THE CZECHO-SLOVAK JUTE INDUSTRY

In common with most of the industries in Czechoslovakia, the prosperity of the jute spinners and weavers depends on their export markets, as the home demand can only absorb two-fifths of the maximum output (says the British Vice-Consul at Prague in a recent report). The sugar industry is the biggest local buyer for sacks, and the Aussig chemical works are also large purchasers. As regards yarn, about half the product is sold to carpet works, while the best export customers are the United Kingdom (Dundee) and Bulgaria. In addition to exporting cement bags to Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia also sells considerable quantities of sacks for corn to Roumania, and sacks for prunes to Yugoslavia.

At the present time, owing to the high costs of production in the country, the Czechoslovak jute industry cannot compete with the British, Swedish, and German manufacturers. A reduction of 60 per cent. has been fixed in the output of all the firms belonging to the Kartell, which comprises eight firms with a central office in Prague. The outside firm of Weiss Söhne at Koniginhof, however, has cut prices, and is working night and day for the home market. Most of the manufacturers have large stocks of finished goods on hand, and a considerable proportion of the present reduced output is for stock, as manufacturers anticipate a scarcity of raw materials, and that consumers, who have been holding back, will shortly be forced to cover their requirements.

Dundee buyers have taken fairly large consignments recently from this market; but the managers of two jute firms have both stated that these and other export orders were executed at a loss. The immediate prospects of the industry are not bright. Its future will largely depend on the fate of the German jute industry. Many Czech manufacturers took advantage of the fall in the German exchange to obtain a control of some of the German works. This has hitherto proved a profitable investment, but it is questionable whether so large a return can be obtained as in the past two years.

The eight factories which belong to the Kartell own 30,788 spindles and 1,412 looms, the factory which remains outside the Kartell possesses 2,750 spindles and 140 looms.

BARSI LIGHT RAILWAY.

The interim report of the Barsi Light Railway Company for the year to March 31, states that the gross earnings totalled Rs. 18,07,500, with working expenses Rs. 8,23,700, compared with Rs. 14,40,515 and Rs. 7,29,933 respectively in the previous year. It is estimated that the net revenue (after providing for probable taxation thereon in India) will amount to some £57,000, from which has to be met interest on the Four per Cent. Debenture stock and interest and sinking fund instalment on the Four per Cent. "Latur Extension" Debentures, totalling £11,249. The directors have declared an interim dividend of 3 per cent., together with a bonus of 2 per cent. (at rate of 10 per cent. per annum), which will absorb £13,000.

Messrs. Chapman and Hall will shortly publish in their "Directly Useful" technical series "Fuel Oil and its Applications," by Harold Moore and A. J. Wilson.

The numbers are published of share warrants to bearer for 1,450 shares in the Egyptian Salt and Soda Company, Ltd., which have been lost, fresh warrants for which are to be issued by the directors to the Anglo-Egyptian Bank.

BUSINESS RESTRICTED.

Dull and Irregular Tone.

London, Tuesday Morning.

It has been anything but a good week on the Stock Exchange. The markets have been overshadowed by the foreign political situation, with the result that following the development of inactivity after the May Day holiday dullness set in, and yesterday quite a dull tone prevailed. While it is difficult to foresee how long the present conditions will obtain, it would seem doubtful that there will be any outstanding improvement until there are indications that we are on the way towards a settlement of the Reparations question. Certainly at the moment the confidence that was responsible for the broadening of activity in the Industrial section has disappeared.

Gilt-Edged Lower.

Gilt-edged have reflected the prevailing conditions, and stocks have declined almost all along the line. Consols at 59½ are ¼ down, War Loan Fives are unchanged at 101½ x.d., the Conversion Loan at 80 13-16 has shed ½, while Fundings are unaltered at 92½. Indian stocks have been fairly steady. The Three per Cent. Loan is unchanged at 60½, the 5½ per Cent. Loan is unaltered at 103½, while the Seven per Cent. Loan is ¼ down at 119½.

A rather dull and irregular tone developed in the market in Foreign Government securities as a result of the latest developments abroad. French stocks have declined, War Loan Fives being 2 down at 29½, while the Four per Cents. are 1½ lower at 23½. German Three per Cents. are 1s. down at 14s., while Italian Rentes are unchanged at 22½. In Near Eastern securities Turkish Unified have been weak, and at 25½ are 1½ lower. Greek Monopolies have failed to maintain their recent rise, and are a point down at 40½. Czecho-Slovak Eight per Cents. have been a firm spot round about 94, while the new Roumanian Loan stands at 1 discount.

Industrials Inactive.

The activity so much in evidence during the past few weeks has been absent during the past week, and has been replaced by a dull and somewhat irregular tendency. As is always the case in circumstances like the present, business has been on a most restricted scale, buyers for the most part awaiting developments. The market has, however, not been devoid of good features, and there is no mistaking the strength of the undertone.

Textiles have been rather variable, Courtaulds shedding 1s. 3d. at 72s., while Coats are 6d. up at 69s. 6d. Iron and Steel shares have been fairly steady. Vickers are unchanged at 16s. 3d., Armstrongs are 6d. up at 20s., while Guest Keens are 1s. down at 43s. 9d. Tobaccos have been rather dull. Bats are 6d. down at 94s. 6d., while Imperial Tobaccos are 9d. lower at 82s. 6d. Shipping securities have been steady. P. and O. Deferred are unchanged at 335 x.d., Cunards are 21s. 3d. x.d., while Furness Withys are 6d. up at 35s. 9d. In Bank shares, Chartered of India are ½ down at 20, National of India have shed ¼ at 47½, Imperial of Persia are unchanged at 7½, Bank of British West Africa are 4 15-16, while Westminster, at 18 11-16 are 1-16 up.

Oils Irregular.

It was only to be anticipated that the Oil market would be affected by the prevailing conditions, and an almost general decline is to be recorded. Anglo-Persian ordinary are 1-16 down at 4, while Burmahs at 5 13-32 are ½ lower. Lobitos are 6½, Mexican Eagles are 1 11-16, and Shell Transport are 4 3-32. Among Egyptians, Anglo-Egyptian B at 1 9-16 are 1-16 lower. In the Roumanian group, Phoenix at 1 5-16 are 3-32 down, Dacia Romanos are 1-16 lower at 1 1-32, Steaua Romanas are unchanged at 8s. 9d., while Hamilton's Concessions are 1s. 9d.

SLOVAKIA'S TIMBER RESOURCES.

At the opening of a timber section in connection with the Bratislava Bourse last month, the chairman of the Bourse referred to the wealth of timber possessed by Slovakia as evidenced by the following figures:—Of the total forest area of the Czecho-Slovak Republic, which is upwards of 10,000,000 acres, or about one-third of the total area of the republic, some 5,000,000 acres are in Slovakia, which is afforested to the extent of some 35 per cent. Of the Slovakian forests, 25 per cent. are oak, with an annual growth of 1,600,000 cubic metres, 42 per cent. beech, with an annual growth of 3,000,000 cubic metres, and 33 per cent. fir and pine with an annual growth of 400,000 cubic metres. The inauguration of a timber section at the Bourse is expected to contribute to an increasingly favourable development of the already considerable timber trade of Slovakia.

FOREIGN EXCHANGES.

The Continental exchanges have shown a very variable tone during the week as a result of developments with regard to the reparations question. German marks have fallen away to 169,500, while French francs, Belgian francs, and Italian lire are all fractionally lower. In the Near Eastern exchanges Greek drachmæ have risen sharply to 327½, Bulgarian leva are 25 points better at 600, while Turkish piastres have improved to 755, but Roumanian lei have weakened to 975.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS

The following extracts are taken from a recent report received by the Imperial Ottoman Bank from Baghdad for the month of March:—

The situation of the market in general remains the same with little or practically no signs of improvement. The only activity has been in the groceries line, particularly in loaf and granulated sugar. The money market is easier. The discount rate for first-class commercial paper has dropped to 7 per cent., as compared with 12 per cent. some five or six weeks ago. The exchange market remains steady. Rates for sterling exchange have been oscillating between Rs.1,500 and Rs.1,515 per £100 during the last two months.

Piece Goods.—An advance of 5 per cent. in the price of white shirtings was reported some four weeks ago due to a demand for this commodity from Persia. But business in general has been exceedingly slack during the last fortnight or so, and practically no sales have been effected.

Sugar.—This article continues to be in very great demand. There has been a considerable enhancement of prices during the past two months. It is believed that dealers in this line have derived handsome profits from the stocks which they had on hand. The stock at present available is believed to be small, and would not suffice to meet the requirements of the Persian market, but important arrivals are expected shortly.

Wool.—Sheep-shearing in the Baghdad, Hillah, and Khorassan districts will shortly be started. Arrivals of important quantities of Awassi and Karradi wools from the Mosul and Kurdistan districts are reported, but no shipments to Europe have yet taken place.

Cereals.—Harvesting will be commenced shortly. It is said that the recent floods of the Tigris and Diala rivers have not made any serious damage to the crops, which are believed to be good.

Cotton Growing.—The cultivation of cotton is making good progress in the Hillah, Amarah, and Dialah areas, particularly in the Yusufiyah and Saklawiyah canals which offer the greatest prospects of rapid extension in the near future. Cotton sowings are not yet completed, but it is estimated from the quantities of seed sold by the Agricultural Department that about 4,000 acres of cotton will be grown this year, and a crop of at least 1,000 bales of 400 lb. of seed cotton is anticipated. The following details convey an idea of the progress that has been made in cotton cultivation in Irak since the work was started in 1918.

1918 and 1919 were devoted to experimental purposes. 1920 was also experimental, and 80 acres were grown in the Yusufiyah under the direct supervision of the Department of Agriculture. The average yield was 1,250 lb. of seed cotton. No crop was harvested owing to the Arab insurrection. In 1921 the area under cotton was estimated at 600 acres. The total yield was 90,588 lb. of seed cotton. Large areas of cotton were abandoned owing to shortage of water. In 1922 the total area sown amounted to 1,354 acres. The total yield was 460,121 lb. of seed cotton from 1,189 acres of matured crop. Large areas suffered from shortage of water.

COMPANY MEETING.

THE ADRIATIC BANK.

The annual general meeting of the Adriatic Bank, Ltd., Belgrade, took place on March 8 at the bank's temporary headquarters in Liubliana. Of the 600,000 shares, 468,665 were represented. The annual directors' report and statement of account were submitted to the shareholders by M. Ciro Kamenarovich. The first part of the report deals with the course of the dinar and takes an optimistic view of the situation, since the recent change of personnel in the financial administration of the State have also brought a change in policy and new schemes for solving the question of the rate of exchange. All business concerns, including banks, are suffering from the lack of ready money, and it is a mistake to think that the banks score when money is dear. On the contrary, the banks lose, because, although interest increases, this increase does not balance the loss caused by the falling of deposits and the restriction of business. Following upon last year's report, the Adriatic Bank increased its share capital from 30,000,000 dinars to 60,000,000 dinars by the issue of 30,000 additional shares at the nominal value of 100 dinars. The entire issue was absorbed by home capital—indeed, whereas 30,000 shares were issued, 326,515 were subscribed for.

Owing to the unsatisfactory conditions of the money market, the Adriatic Bank has not committed itself to any fresh enterprise of importance during the last year. Exceptionally it took over 10,000 shares at 50 pesos of the Banco Yugoslavo de Chile, thereby strengthening its ties with the prosperous Yugoslav colony in that country. Finally, the report stated that the various commercial enterprises in which the Adriatic Bank has an interest, and which were enumerated by name, had done well during the past year, and were prospering satisfactorily. The iron, chemical, wood, building and printing industries were represented, likewise breweries, etc.

The balance-sheet shows that the whole turnover of the Adriatic Bank during the past year amounted to 29,285,759,622 dinars. The actual cash turnover alone amounted to 4,227,583,247 dinars, and the net profit to 7,855,454 dinars. The directors' and auditors' reports were unanimously passed by the general meeting. Upon the directors' proposal it was agreed that out of the 7,855,545 dinars net profits for the year a 5 per cent. ordinary dividend and a 7 per cent. super-dividend should be declared, and the balance of 24,245 dinars carried over to the account of 1923. Consequently, 12 dinars per share will be paid out for share coupon 17 of the bank. The regular surplus fund, which amounted to 15,500,000 dinars on December 31, 1921, was during 1922 increased by 17,015,000 dinars, and on December 31, 1922, amounted to 32,315,000 dinars. As the total amount of the surplus fund, therefore, exceeds 54 per cent. of the paid-up shares, the board deemed it unnecessary to propose an addition to the fund, such addition being demanded by the statutes only in the event of the surplus fund not being equal in amount to at least 10 per cent. of the paid-up shares.

The members of the board and supervisory board were then unanimously re-elected, and in addition to them the following new members:—M. Edvard Pajkuritch, of the Littoral Bank and Savings Society in Susak; M. Stane Uskokovitch, director of the Co-operative Association in Belgrade; Dr. Misa Kolin, director of the "Racic" S/S Company; and M. Luka Militchitch, president of the Serbo-American Bank in Belgrade.

The ordinary general meeting of the Gharbieh Land Company will be held in Cairo on May 28.

The total gross Indian Customs revenue, excluding salt revenue, for the year ended March 21, amounted to Rs. 4.267 lakhs, as compared with Rs. 3,556 for the previous year.

Imperial Government of Persia 5 per Cent. Sterling Loan of 1911.—Coupons due May 15 will be paid on and after that date at the Imperial Bank of Persia, 25, Abchurch Lane, E.C.4, or at their bankers, Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie, Holt, and Co., 67, Lombard Street, E.C.3, and must be left three clear days for verification. Forms for listing coupons can be obtained on application.

The State would undertake the felling and transport of the timber, while a special company, in which both the Government and the American banking interests would participate, would concern itself with export.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Britain and Russia.

Even if the Near and Middle East could contrive to be at peace despite the Soviets, they will inevitably find their material progress handicapped until there is agreement between Russia and the rest of Europe. In these circumstances Great Britain can have but one goal before her in regard to Russia—a return to normal relations. The difficulty that besets the British Government is to hit upon the best way of reaching that goal. In the early days of Bolshevism there could be no question as to the attitude to be adopted towards it, and the Soviet régime was boycotted. Russia, however, showed signs of settling down under what had been condemned by the rest of the world as a monstrous tyranny; the drawing of a line at the point where the choice or indifference of the Russian people ended and the compulsion of Bolshevism began became more and more difficult, and in any case the actual plight of the Russian people, largely reduced to starvation, remained the same. Partly, therefore, for the sake of Russia and partly to ease the world's trade stagnation, the late British Government agreed to recognise business dealings between Britain and Soviet Russia on definite terms fixed by Treaty. For a time the Bolsheviks were on their best behaviour, but more recently they have resumed aggressive tactics against the world in general and Great Britain in particular. Anti-British propaganda was intensified, outrages were perpetrated on British subjects, British trawlers have been seized, and a fresh outbreak of religious persecution in Russia has led to the dispatch of offensive Notes to the British representative in Moscow.

Patience or Ultimatum?

In order to bring the Soviets to a better sense of the fitness of things, a strongly-worded Note was sent by the Foreign Office to Moscow, calling upon the Russian Government (1) to repudiate and apologise for its anti-British propaganda, recalling the officials responsible; (2) to admit liability and to undertake to pay compensation for the offences committed against British subjects and British ships; and (3) to withdraw unequivocally the two communications handed to Mr. Hodgson, the British representative to Moscow. A limit of ten days was given to the Soviets within which to comply with these demands, and, in the event of no satisfactory reply being received, Mr. Hodgson has been instructed to return to England, and the Trade Agreement of March, 1921, is to be terminated. It must be admitted at once that the Note is not more vigorous than the actual offences warrant. If the Bolsheviks comply with the demands, the strong action of the British Government will have been justified. If they merely temporise or refuse, British amour propre will have to be vindicated, and the ultimate settlement of the Near and Middle East will have been retarded. The difficulty is that, as Russia is impervious to an economic boycott, there are only two ways of dealing with her intransigence, by negotiation or by war. The latter is ruled out of court in all the circumstances, and the British Government may have effectually put an end to the former. It is true that Russia will suffer more than Great Britain will from the stoppage of trade between the two countries, but progress towards a general world improvement will have been arrested. Thus it remains a question among enlightened Governments whether, be it in Russia, Turkey, or elsewhere, if what is objected to cannot be stamped out, anything should be done to lessen the opportunities of reasoning it out of existence.

The Lausanne Conference.

The proceedings at Lausanne during the past week were somewhat overshadowed by the murder of M. Vorowski, the Soviet representative, by a Swiss. M. Vorowski had received no official invitation to attend the second Conference, but he had gone to Lausanne in the expectation of being admitted to the Council Chamber. Exception was taken by Swiss Chauvinists to his presence in the town, and he had been warned to leave. His murder was an act of personal vengeance, committed by a man whose relatives had been the victims of Bolshevik outrages, and as such it has no bearing on the peace negotiations. It happened, however, in a week during which the deliberations had been unusually barren, and the inevitable excitement to which it has given rise has tended to emphasise the lack of any definite progress on the part of the Conference. For the rest, it is difficult several hundred miles away from Lausanne not to feel convinced that, from the Allies' point of view, time is likely to prove the best peacemaker between the parties. The Turks, for obvious reasons—conditions in their own country, no less than the Ruhr complication—are regarding time for the present as their special ally; but they are thinking only in days and weeks. If the Entente Powers can convince Ismet Pasha that the passage of months or years is a matter of indifference to them, so long as they secure a just and practical peace, the signing of the treaty will have been brought much nearer. For this policy to succeed, however, there must be complete understanding between the Allies.

The Macedonian Question.

It will put the finishing touch upon Allied ineptitude in regard to the handling of the Near Eastern problem if the Macedonian question is allowed to be settled more Balkanico, instead of an attempt being made under the auspices of the League of Nations to bring about a peaceful and lasting settlement. The chief crime of the Macedonians is a fierce attachment to their native soil. As is explained in an article on another page, when they first became prominent in recent history the racial instincts of the bulk of the population were towards Bulgaria. Then propaganda descended upon Macedonia, and it became in turn whatever the propagandist wished it to be, but never for long. To-day, after much partitioning, it is essentially Macedonian, and there will be little chance of peace in the Balkans until it is accorded an entity of its own and its integrity is assured. The Macedonian is a born fighter, and, so far, has shown no inclination to be an obedient subject of any alien jurisdiction. As soon as he found himself made a Serbian by the Treaty of Neuilly he entered a protest by the only method familiar to him. The Serbian authorities were in no mood to tolerate such behaviour, and they adopted the only methods familiar to Near Eastern Governments for dealing with opposition. Now, the Macedonian does not mind being killed, and he is not sophisticated enough to raise on his own behalf the "atrocities" outcry in Western drawing-rooms. He would, therefore, have carried on according to the rules of the game in the Balkans with little said, if the Serbians had been content with merely trying to stamp him out. But the latter, in Macedonian eyes, did not play fair; not satisfied with driving the Macedonians out of their homes and killing them where they could, the Serbians proceeded to introduce colonists from North Serbia into the districts which the Macedonians intended to abandon only temporarily. This was the signal for war, and not merely killing exercises.

Autonomy the Solution.

In the Serbian, it so happens, the Macedonian has his match. War was accepted cheerfully, and the Macedonian bands had to use Bulgarian territory for breathing spaces from the pursuit of Serbian troops. The Yugoslav authorities threatened Bulgaria with war if she afforded asylum to the Komitajis. M. Stambolisky, who has placed friendly relations with the Allied States in the forefront of his programme, undertook to do his best, but pleaded inadequate forces at his disposal to deal properly with the situation. At the same time, as an earnest of his good intentions, he urged Yugoslavia to discuss a settlement of all outstanding questions between the two countries. Agreement was reached at Nish, but the Bulgarian Government either ignored the Macedonians, or decided that they must be sacrificed to the greater good of the greater number. Since the War the Macedonian hold on Bulgarian policy has gradually weakened. M. Stambolisky has evidently decided that the time has come to give it its coup de grâce. The Macedonians have accordingly declared war on the Bulgarian Government, and the immediate prospect would seem to be either decimation for the Macedonians or a prolonged campaign of assassination in Bulgaria. This particular form of unrest is a disgrace to Europe, and the Allies or the League of Nations ought to find occasion to intervene for the good of all concerned. The suggestion that Macedonia should receive autonomy under Yugoslavia provides the only practical settlement of a vexed question.

The Mania for Deportations.

Turkish insistence upon the deportation of Greeks from Asia Minor has come in for some severe criticism, and it is impossible to defend it, even from Turkey's own point of view; but there is at least this to be said on behalf of the Turkish method of procedure, that the deportations were nominally the subject of an agreement. The system, however, is being carried out in parts of the Balkans without this saving clause. We have already seen how Macedonians have been expelled from their homes in Serbia, while an attempt is made to forbid their taking refuge in neighbouring territory. The same practice is now the subject of a complaint made by Bulgaria against Greece in regard to Western Thrace. Not only are individuals arrested and deported to Greek islands, but whole families also, it is alleged, are being driven from their homes and are forced to take refuge in Bulgaria. In the case of the men interned in the islands, it is stated that they have all come under suspicion, and have been deported for military reasons. The same can hardly be urged in regard to the families. Something can, perhaps, be said for the voluntary exchange of populations as a remedy for the hopeless racial tangle in parts of the Balkans and for the incompatibility of temperament of different nationalities; but it must be effected decently and in order. As it seems to be now in progress in Western Thrace, it must almost inevitably lead to reprisals, and the expulsion of Greeks living peaceably in Bulgaria. Yet the War was to have made the world safe for democracy and minorities.

Egypt's Constitution.

The Egyptian Government, it is understood, is engaged upon drafting an Indemnity Act, which is required as an antecedent condition to the abolition of martial law, and its promulgation is expected within a few days. In these circumstances it is difficult to appreciate the criticism that Zaghoul Pasha has brought against the new Constitution, that it is an attempt to deceive the nation rather than to realise its aspirations. In a communication to the Manchester Guardian the Nationalist leader declares that the administration of Egypt will continue as it is at present until the Constitution becomes operative. This in itself, if true, would not invalidate the Constitution; but as far as martial law is concerned it is not the case, the purpose being to abolish it as soon as the Indemnity Act is passed, in order that it may not be in force when the elections are held. Clearly the abolition of martial law, apart from the Indemnity Act, depends in some measure on the freedom of Egypt from the senseless crimes of violence that have sullied its history during recent years. It is, therefore, a matter for regret that Zaghloul Pasha has taken up an attitude which may still further encourage extremists in Egypt in a blind antagonism to the constituted authority. The points in the Constitution against which Zaghloul Pasha inveighs are not of Great Britain's drafting, but represent the wisdom of the Egyptian Committee appointed for the purpose of framing a Constitution. Now that Egypt is about to exercise her rights of independence, it would be thought that criticism on details would be postponed until Egyptians among themselves by constitutional means can gradually improve their charter of liberty in accord with the genius and aspirations of the people.

Foreign Students for England.

Great Britain might well do much more than she has done so far in the way of encouraging and assisting students of the Near and Middle East to continue their studies in England or Scotland. A certain number find their way here of their own accord; but there would be many more, if financial assistance were forthcoming in the way of monetary grants or reductions in fees or the cost of living. When there are said to be no fewer than thirty-five Afghan students in France, most of them, if not all, assisted by Government in one way or another, it is clear that other nations are not blind to the advantages of attracting the student class from countries with which it is hoped to strengthen political or commercial relations. We could wish that something could be done at this time to bring over to England students from the Balkans and from Turkey. The rate of exchange is a special obstacle in the way of students from the Near East selecting this country, and there is little chance of their coming in adequate numbers unless some measure of help is provided them.

The Indian Frontier.

The Lords' debate on Indian Frontier policy was carried further last week by the publication of letters from Lord Inchcape and Lord Montagu of Beaulieu, both of whom can claim to write with some degree of authority on the subject. There is very little difference between them, for both give general support to the line of action which has been adopted by the Government of India, and the only noteworthy feature of the correspondence is Lord Inchcape's chivalrous plea that the authorities should not be subjected to interference on the part of Parliament. As a matter of fact, the risk of actual interference is for the moment very small, and we think Lord Montagu of Beaulieu is fully justified in his contention that Parliament is entitled to ask for all the information that can be given without putting the tribesmen in possession of military secrets. Parliament has not yet transferred to the Indian legislature any fraction of its responsibility for the frontiers of India, and in these days of transition it is rather dangerous to offer to the public the spectacle of a virtuous Government at Simla plagued by the "interference" of its sole master. In this particular sphere of its activity it could protest with much greater force against the interference of the Indian Legislature.

The Amritsar Riots.

The news of fresh rioting between Hindus and Moslems at Amritsar, though unpleasant, is not surprising, because for some time past it has been evident that the two communities are angry with each other throughout the great cities of Northern India, and, when that is the case, the most trivial incident may lead to serious disturbances. The Punjab Administration has clearly recovered the steadiness and effectiveness which for a time seemed to be lacking, and there are no grounds for anxiety so long as each disturbance is dealt with in the traditional way, by the immediate display of sufficient force to render stern measures unnecessary, but we fear that special vigilance will be wanted for some time to come. It used to be said that in such cases the ailment yielded at once to the simple treatment of a little blood-letting prescribed by the surgery of the country, but things are more complicated now, and there is an appreciable risk that the ill-feeling may become chronic, unless it is taken in hand by the real leaders of the people, not the busybodies who claim that title on the flimsiest pretexts, but the men who carry weight with the adherents of each religion.

A Prosperous Country.

Apart from this religious difficulty, Northern India is more comfortable than it has been for a long time past. One must search the local Press very thoroughly to find an expression of anything that can be called a real grievance, and though Indian journalists are usually in too great a hurry to notice economic conditions, information which reaches us from other sources shows that the people in general are perfectly happy and contented, busy in marketing the fine crops they have safely harvested, and beginning to get ready for the next monsoon. In India, as elsewhere, peasants do not chuckle out loud, but their quiet satisfaction is a fact of great political importance, and perhaps some idea of its extent can be formed from the remark of an old villager that "it is almost like the good days of Queen Victoria." Indians still look backward for the golden age, but while thirty years ago they were agreed in placing it in the reign of Akbar, they are now more and more looking to the great Empress who succeeded to his throne. Some day, perhaps, they will turn their eyes to the magnificent future which is within their reach.

The Russian Note.

The country was thoroughly startled last week by the publication of Lord Curzon's ultimatum to Russia. His statement of British grievances against the Soviet Government was drawn up with unconciliatory masterliness; in his actual setting out of the offences of which he complained—offences against religion, offences against British subjects, and offences relating to propaganda, there was little that could be gainsaid. But his conclusion, that, unless Russia swallows his Note, friendly relations between her and Great Britain must cease, did, as I say, startle many people. Naturally, the first opposition came from business men interested in Russia, who stand to lose by the cancellation of the Trade Agreement; but there is a large mass of disinterested, if slow-moving, opinion which holds that the time for ultimatums has not yet arrived, and, indeed, cannot yet arrive.

On the other hand, some considerable people think that the Note was justified, that the Trade Agreement has never been much more than a farce, that the treatment of British sailors off the Murman coast warrants every word of the Note, and, in short, that it were better completely to sever relations with Soviet Russia until she is no longer a Soviet. It would seem that, at the moment, these people hold the field, but I do not think that they hold the country. However, we shall soon see.

The peremptoriness of the Note was as unexpected as the time of its publication. But there may be in it more than meets the eye. It is possible that Lord Curzon, being convinced of making a satisfactory settlement with Turkey at Lausanne and of so gaining Turkish benevolence towards British intentions in the East, has deliberately chosen this means to break the present Turco-Russian alliance. It is obvious to anyone that Britain must have either Russia or Turkey as friend in the East, though it is by no means obvious that Turkey will for long prove the better friend. Just as Mr. Lloyd George turned from Turkey towards Russia, so it looks as if this Government would turn from Russia to Turkey. One can only hope that they will have better luck than had the Coalition.

The Note to Germany.

To the German reparations proposals advanced on May 2 Lord Curzon has answered with a Note which is certainly statesmanlike and reasonable, but which carries us little further. It is true—and it is welcome news—that he says that the British Government will have nothing to do with the latest German offer, but one cannot hope much from his mere suggestion that Dr. Cuno should make another and more expansive offer. What this Government of ours will not do, apparently, is to possess themselves of a determination to act; they speak firmly, their doctrines are excellent, and their preaching sound, but we look almost in vain for the faintest hint of action. To show how gentle and full of sweetness and light they are, it may be mentioned that Lord Curzon achieved the singular feat in his Note to Germany of avoiding all reference to the Ruhr. Yet this is the one question on which the country wants the intentions of the Government plainly stated; merely to describe the situation there, week in and week out, as one of "international peril," and to repeat from month to month our determination to intervene at a "suitable moment," is a little perplexing, and makes the ordinary man wonder whether a suggestion of force would not sooner bring Germany to a completer sense of her responsibility.

The Art O'Brien Case.

Little surprise was caused among the initiated—people whom, after the event, one meets everywhere—by the decision of the Court of Appeal in the Art O'Brien case. It will be remembered that a few weeks ago, when there was a round-up of Irish suspects in England and Scotland, the arrested were sent, at the request of the Free State Government, for internment without trial in Ireland. The Court of Appeal has decided that this step was illegal, and it was rather thrilling to read of this arrest by the Judicial Bench of the Executive.

The Government in this nasty hole appealed to the House of Lords, who decided to-day that they had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal. The course that the Government must, therefore, adopt is to bring in an Indemnity Bill for the Home Secretary's action, and a very stormy debate is bound to arise. The death struggles of D.O.R.A. will have thousands of interested spectators.

Championships.

Even during this past week, which has rung importantly with sounds of foreign events—the sentence on Krupp, the jolt with Russia, the Chinese outrages, the Vorowsky assassination, and so on—the eye of the British reader of newspapers first turned to the account of the Golf Championship at Deal. Undoubtedly our American visitors had put a very distinct wind up us, and their gradual elimination scarcely lightened our fears; we were mortally afraid that they had the final up their sleeve. But we were wrong, gloriously wrong. The final was fought out between an Englishman, Wethered, and a Scot, Harris, and Wethered won by seven and six. Wethered, who is only twenty-four years old, almost won the championship two years ago, and certainly deserved it this year; it was bad luck that his sister, who last year won the Ladies' Championship, was this year defeated.

As most good judges predicted, Smith won the Billiards Championship, defeating Newman by 820 points. Smith is by no means as pretty to watch as several inferior players, but there is not much doubt that he is the most efficient player who has ever lived. There are a few things in which we excel our forefathers, and billiards is one of them, though that it may have become a drearier business I am not a sufficient enthusiast to deny.

Our Air Weakness.

Much attention has recently been drawn to our weakness in the air, and woeful comparisons have been made by politicians like Lord Birkenhead between our own number of squadrons and that, say, of France. That there is something in this criticism of Government inactivity was granted last week by Lord Salisbury, who stated the intention to create a "very extensive remedy" for our weakness. The Government admits that there is evidence of the existence of considerable German aircraft outside Germany, and it is this, probably, that they fear, rather than the superior number of France's machines. If they did fear France—and, frankly, the idea is absurd—then the Morning Post's contention is good enough—make friends with France.

Whether this step of Government means that the main defence of these islands is in future to fall upon our air squadrons, it is too early to say; but doubtless the Navy will look with somewhat of a jealous eye on the sum to be expended on the Air. It is about this time, one supposes, that the big decision concerning the future defence of this country must be made; and one can but hope that this Government has, or can employ, sufficient intelligence to make it.

England's Militarism.

An incident occurred in Piccadilly the other day, small enough in itself, but significant of Britain's larger attitude, when a subaltern in the Blues censured a police officer for failing to salute the Colours. In any other country, militaristic or pacifist, an enormous fuss would have been made over the business; but our people calmly thought that both policeman and subaltern were sufficiently right for the incident to be allowed to blow over. The policeman, apparently, was employing both arms in directing the traffic: and as for the subaltern, well, of course, it was a little impetuous of him, but keenness on his regiment was cause enough for pardon. There is not, whatever our own peace-mongers may say, a halfpennyworth of militarism in England, but we have a very characteristic and adequate discipline of our own. We do not think so much of our standing Army as we ought, but the present generation, at any rate, is not likely to forget the virtues of symbols and of esprit de corps.

Caught Again.

I knew when I wrote last week on "the jolly month of May" that I might soon have to eat my own words; but the unpalatable dish has been served up earlier than I expected. Last week-end we were revelling in the heat, and cheerily cast our clouts, in defiance of all old women's wisdom; and this week-end we were shivering by the fire, with the more philosophic of us thinking of tobogganing! It is well that the ancients regarded the months of the year as female, for from no other sex could such deceitful conduct as this come. To woo and caress and then laughingly to withdraw to sting and to bite—what man would trouble to do all this? Many a game on Saturday was almost entirely spoiled by heavy falls, not of rain, but of snow and hail: and even where the heavens did not descend on us, fielding at cricket was purgatory. There is some sense in the "cold and frosty morning" of the "gathering nuts in May" nonsense, after all.

Protests on Reassessment.

The protests which the new assessments were certain to arouse have already flooded the country, and the wise decision has been made to extend the period during which appeals may be lodged from three weeks to three months. These protests have been conducted with most becoming decency, and are no mere unreasoning agitation; and there is every hope that through them the excessive assessments will be toned down and that individual inquiry will be substituted for the scheme of a general increase on a flat rate basis. ALTER EGO.

THE NEAR AND MIDDLE EAST ASSOCIATION.

A general meeting of the Near and Middle East Association was held on May 10 at 14, Hans Crescent, S.W.1, by kind permission of Mrs. Cobham, under the presidency of Major-General Lord Edward Gleichen. Speeches were made by Mr. Leonard Whittall on "Events Preceding the Burning of Smyrna"; by the Rt. Hon. Srinevasa Sastri on "The Indian Point of View Towards Peace in the Near East"; and by Professor Arnold Toynbee on "Angora and Smyrna To-day."

Mr. Whittall began by describing the character of the Turk. He expatiated on the Turk's intensely religious sense, and paid tribute to, and gave illustrations of, his profound tolerance. He denied that the massacres of Armenians and Greeks were due to religious fanaticism. The Armenians he divided into two classes: first, the Armenians of Armenia, a pastoral people; and, secondly, the Armenians of the coast towns and of foreign lands—these latter the people who continually stirred up trouble. He then passed to the Greek, contempt for whom on the part of the Turk he did not disguise, but who, nevertheless, had lived for long at peace with the inhabitants of the country of his adoption. Mr. Whittall briefly reviewed the history of the relations between Great Britain and Turkey, and described how, from being on the highest ground and in the shoes of a dictator at the time of the Armistice, we had now, largely through our pro-Greek policy and subsequent desertion of our Greek friends, fallen to the lowest of the low.

Dr. Sastri, in a very eloquent address, deliberately dwelt on the gloomy side of the picture of India vis-à-vis Great Britain. He explained the birth of the slow but surely-developing conception of a federation of Asiatic States stretching from Constantinople to Peshawar. Such an idea might be scoffed at by the so-called statesman of to-day, but the children of the present generation would hear more of it. He then described the elements in India tending towards rupture from Britain, how Indians had been deceived by the promises of Mr. Lloyd George concerning Thrace and Asia Minor, and how the Kenya question, which he was in England now to try to solve, might have very serious consequences. The point for the Empire to decide was: Were all its members, irrespective of colour or of the accidents of place of birth, to enjoy equal freedom, or was there to be preferential treatment? Though the signs were many—and he warned his readers not to be lulled into false hopes by the apparent quietude in India—that India might break away from the Empire, he was not without hope that moderate counsels would prevail.

Professor Toynbee began by underlining Dr. Sastri's remarks upon the prospects of a federation of Asiatic States. In Angora, he said, he recently had no sooner stepped into the town than he met an Afghan and an Egyptian—proof that the Eastern peoples were awake and that they looked to Turkey for their lead. He gained the impression that the Turk was intensely serious about the economic reconstruction of his country, and though in the immediate future he might do foolish things, and so drive away trade, of the more distant prospect there was no reason to be hopeless. He saw no cause why peace should not be ultimately signed at Lausanne—if we conceded everything, little could stop it. Turning to the Mosul question, Professor Toynbee thought that Turkey would insist on having South Kurdistan.

To the subsequent discussion the Rt. Hon. Ameer Ali and Sir Graham Bower contributed.

A Belgrade message states that the Convention establishing a free zone for Serbia at Salonika has been signed.

The Electoral Law.

Certainly the Yehia Cabinet will go down to posterity as a Cabinet of action, for within ten days of the promulgation of the new Constitution it has managed to complete, and to secure the King's signature to, the new electoral law which was promulgated on the 30th ultimo. The decree, like that of the Constitution, has been exceedingly favourably received, and so far I have seen no criticism of any importance whatsoever.

As a matter of fact, the new electoral law does not differ materially from the old one of July 21, 1913, which replaced the electoral law of 1883 on the formation of the Legislative Assembly. Naturally, there is special provision for the substitution of a two-chamber for a one-chamber Parliament, i.e., for a Senate for which election will take place in three degrees as opposed to two degrees for the Lower House; but in regard to the Chamber of Deputies which replaces the old Legislative Assembly the only changes are as follow:—Every Egyptian subject of male sex will have a vote, but the age limit is raised from twenty to twenty-one. Electors-Delegate for the election of Deputies and of Senatorial-Delegates must be aged twenty-five as against thirty, and will be elected by colleges of thirty instead of fifty electors, while the age for qualification as candidate for the House of Deputies is reduced from thirty-five to thirty: the tax qualification is abolished, and there will be one Deputy for every 60,000 inhabitants, as against one for every 200,000 provided for under the old electoral law.

Of course, there remains a great deal of detail work to be done in regard to fixing of circumscriptions, drawing up the electoral lists, and so on, but it is expected that it will be possible to hold elections early in September and open the first Parliament under a constitutional régime about November 17.

It is to be noted that, whereas the electoral law of 1913 dealt with elections for the Provincial Councils as well as the Legislative Assembly, the new law only provides for elections to the two chambers of the new Parliament. It is intended that the provisions of the old electoral law concerning the Provincial Councils shall remain in force, and the concluding clause of the new electoral law merely abrogates the old in so far as it concerns elections to Parliament.

Egyptian Nationality.

The electoral law lays down that the definition of Egyptian subject shall be that established by the nationality law of June 29, 1900, which extends Egyptian nationality to all Ottoman subjects who have been domiciled in the country for fifteen years. The new situation created by the War really renders a new nationality law necessary owing to the large number of former Ottoman subjects now in Egypt whose country of origin has been detached from the Ottoman Empire. This is, however, a matter which must be dealt with directly between Egypt and Turkey, and such discussions cannot be entered upon until the Allies and Turkey have signed a peace treaty which, amongst other things, recognises the new political status acquired by Egypt.

The Legislative Assembly.

A necessary consequence of the promulgation of the new Constitution providing for a new form of Parliamentary Government has been the suppression of the Legislative Assembly, for which the King has signed a decree. The Legislative Assembly came into existence in 1913 to replace the General Assembly and Legislative Council, which had operated since 1883. It was able to hold only one session. The War intervened before the opening of the second session, and the Assembly was suspended. Its suspension has continued ever

The Late Earl of Carnarvon.

On Monday last a memorial service was held at All Saints' Church in memory of the late Earl of Carnarvon. The Rev. C. C. Hamilton, Acting Chaplain, officiated, assisted by the Rev. C. P. Halet. The service was very simple; it included the late Earl of Carnarvon's favourite hymn, "Lead Kindly Light," and concluded with Chopin's Funeral March. Amongst those present were Viscount and Viscountess Allenby, with Major Critchley; Said Pasha Zulfikar, representing King Fuad; Yehia Pasha Ibrahim, the Prime Minister; Dr. J. Morton Howell, American Minister; Their Excellencies Adly Yeghen Pasha, Ahmed Ziwer Pasha (Minister of Communications), Hafez Pasha Hassan (Minister of Public Works), Izzet Pasha, Mohamed Mahmud Pasha; M. Pierre Lacau, Director-General, Department of Antiquities; Mr. Whiting Andrews, First Secretary to the American Legation; Lewa Castle-Smith Pasha, A.D.C. to King Fuad; Lewa Herbert Pasha and Mrs. Herbert, Mrs. Harry Burton, Dr. Fletcher Barrett, Dr. and Mrs. Llewellyn Phillips, and Messrs. Patrick Bolland and Gerald Delany. Mr. Howard Carter and the members of the expedition who are working in the Valley of the Kings were represented by Mr. R. G. Fitz-Gerald.

The Conspiracy Trial.

Interesting information was given this week in the course of the conspiracy trial with regard to the organisation of the "Black Revolver Society," which was formed for the assassination of British officials and members of the British Army. The society had several branches in Cairo, at the head of each of which was a president. Each member had a number and a membership card. Those who had taken part in outrages had black cards; those who had not yet done so had green cards, while the presidents had red cards. It appears that prominent people in Cairo finance this society. They were advised beforehand of the imminence of an outrage, and after its commission the president of the branch concerned reported to one of these persons, who paid him £E15 per outrage: £E3 for the president himself and £E12 for division amongst the assassins the president taking his share in addition if he took part in the attempt. As a result of these revelations, several important arrests have, in fact, been made, and interesting developments are expected.

The cross-examination of the principal witness for the prosecution, which has taken up the whole of the past week, produced evidence which would appear to show that deliberate efforts were made last autumn in certain Egyptian quarters to squash the inquiry, and considerable interest has been aroused by these statements in the box, for they are regarded as exceedingly serious, and necessitate some more detailed explanation from the quarters concerned.

Two Egyptians accused of attempting to suborn witnesses for the prosecution appeared before the Ezbekia Military Court this week. They were found guilty, and have been sentenced each to two years' imprisonment and a fine of £E100.

YUGOSLAVIA.

Liubliana, May 8.

The Internal Situation.

The formation of an all-Radical Cabinet under the presidency of the veteran statesman, M. Pashitch, has put an end to the seventeen days' stormy Government crisis, although the solution will in all probability prove only a temporary one. The tasks confronting the new Government are too great, and the number of Radical deputies is too small (108 out of 313) to permit of its being regarded as definite, although the Radical victory over the Democrats was materially helped by the Revisionist Opposition, and some support in that quarter for the Radicals may fairly be counted upon. It was in the interests of the Revisionist Opposition that the Democrats were ousted from power, and, above all, that M. Svetozar Pribitchevitch was got rid of. Now it remains to be seen whether the Government programme which M. Pashitch wishes to carry through will find acceptance with the Opposition. This acceptance is urgently required, because without some help, even passive help, their work in the Skupshtina will be impossible. Meanwhile, it seems pretty certain that the Revisionist Opposition will not withhold its tacit support. For one thing, the Opposition has already agreed that the most urgent questions of State (such as that of adequate pay for Government officials and provision for disabled soldiers and the law regulating the farmers' credits) shall be voted upon first, and the ticklish question of the amendment of the Constitution not tackled until afterwards, under the condition, however, that none of the provisions touching the centralist administration of the State is carried into effect. Furthermore, a certain agreement of the Opposition with the Government has been noticeable at the sittings of the Skupshtina and its various committees so far, and, finally, there are plenty of other signs indicating a disposition friendly towards the Government among the Opposition parties, notably the Koroshets and Spaho groups.

But against these hopeful prospects must be set great obstacles, above all, M. Pashitch's Government programme.

Officials' Salaries.

The whole country, from the King to the last Socialist, admits that the question of officials' salaries is of vital importance to the State. It is intolerable that a married official should be expected to live on a salary of 1,000 dinars (about £2 5s.) a month. And, therefore, the urgency of fresh legislation to regulate the position of officials is admitted even by the Opposition. But in order to solve the problem of official salaries money is required—in fact, a great deal of money. For that reason M. Pashitch wishes to deal with the Officials and Invalids question simultaneously with the introduction of increased taxation, and so to bring the question of official salaries in relation with the Budget. To this the Opposition objects, for obvious reasons.

Her Civil Service costs Yugoslavia at present three and a-half milliard dinars—i.e., the half of her total State expenditure. To effect even a slight improvement in the lot of government employees would take considerable sums of money, and so the Minister of Finance proposes to solve the problem by reducing the number of Government employees by at least 10 per cent. and the acceptance of new taxes. To find more money for the Civil Service by fresh issues of paper currency is a policy emphatically rejected, as inflation invariably causes a drop in the value of the dinar, and prices go up in proportion. That would be the Austrian method, which everyone wishes to avoid. The Finance Minister's scheme has been approved by the Government, but not yet by the Opposition, which fears new taxes even while admitting that they are necessary.

It must be borne in mind that the Opposition conducted its electoral campaign with the crudest battle-cries, and that now it stands to commit suicide if it fails to keep any of its promises (and there were many of them) regarding revision of the Constitution and other matters, and only introduces fresh taxation. On the other hand, the Opposition dare not incur the responsibility of wrecking the Officials and Disabled Soldiers Law. And so we see the Opposition prepared to vote for the Officials and Disabled Soldiers Law, but not for the necessary financial measures without which no improvement in the plight of State employees is possible. This would-but-dare-not attitude is characteristic of the present parliamentary position in Yugoslavia. And before the Opposition parties acquire sufficient will-power to have the courage to incur the responsibility for urgent legislation, although it be unpopular, we can speak only of provisional solutions of the Government crisis.

The sins of the electoral campaign are the ghosts of the new Government, and nothing but patriotic courage in the parties will serve to lay them. Whether the Opposition parties possess this courage is a question to which we shall see the answer in the near future.

The Budget.

After four years of fierce party warfare Yugoslavia was presented with her first Budget in 1922. This Budget was by no means ideal, although revenue and expenditure as recorded were made to balance. But this Budget was based on the figures of that of the Constituent Assembly of unhappy memory, and shared all its faults. It was more theoretical than practical. In connection with the question of State employees the Minister of Finance, M. Stoyadinovitch, proposes to submit a new Budget to the Skupshtina, as the old one expires in June. The new Budget proposes a great increase in all State expenditure—almost by 100 per cent.—yet, all the same, M. Stoyadinovitch hopes to show a surplus in his Budget. State expenditure is to amount to 13 milliard dinars (so far it has been seven milliards). Of these, ten milliards are to be for ordinary expenditure, two for liquidation of State obligations, and one milliard for extraordinary expenditure. Speaking broadly, M. Stoyadinovitch is likely to succeed, as the revenue in every department considerably exceeds the estimated figures given in the Budget. But a properly-balanced Budget cannot be obtained merely by raising the revenue, but the latter must be accompanied by new taxes and extensive reduction in all State expenditure. There are far too many commissions which do no work and cost a great deal, and among State officials there are a great many unqualified persons who owe their appointment only to party considerations, and are therefore difficult to get rid of. For this reason it will not be easy to effect a judicious reduction, although no one can doubt the sincerity of M. Stoyadinovitch's purpose. The Revisionist Opposition parties propose "cuts" after the model of Great Britain's policy in this respect.

The Rise of the Dinar.

The dinar has risen latterly. This is the consequence of increased exports and the scarcity of money caused by M. Stoyadinovitch's policy of deflation. Securities have been thrown upon the market, and this has brought about a rise in the dinar, which is really lower than it ought to be in view of improved economic conditions.

The outlook for the harvest is, generally speaking, good, and much better than last year. Moreover, the area under cultivation is greater by one-third.

Dr. R. W. Seton-Watson's Visit.

In April, Dr. R. W. Seton-Watson—or Scotus Viator, as he will always remain for the Yugoslavs—paid a very brief visit to Yugoslavia. He spent a few days in Belgrade, Zagreb, and Liubliana, and spoke with most of the country's political leaders. The impressions he received he expressed in an article originally written for the Beogradske Novine, but published simultaneously in the Zagreb Obzor, and then quoted at length in every paper of importance throughout the kingdom. Pretty well all parties come in for sharp criticism, but the general opinion seems to be that Dr. Seton-Watson is just in his views, and in any case so old and faithful a friend of Yugoslavia that he has a right to place them before the public.

WESTERN THRACE.

In the House of Commons last week, in reply to a question by Mr. Noel Buxton, M.P., as to whether, having regard to the fact that the League of Nations has referred to the Council of Ambassadors Bulgaria's protest respecting the persecution of minorities in Western Thrace, His Majesty's Government agrees with the statement of the League of Nations to the effect that Western Thrace is under the protection of the Allied Powers; and, if so, what instructions His Majesty's Government is prepared to give to its representative on the Council of Ambassadors with a view to promoting the maintenance of order in Western Thrace, Mr. Ronald McNeill, the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, replied:—

"It is true that under the Treaty of Neuilly Western Thrace was transferred to the Allied and Associated Powers. Under the subsequent Treaty of August 10, 1920, the territory was, however, assigned by the Powers to Greece, and the Greek authorities have since that date administered the territory with the full approval of the Powers. This latter treaty has not yet been ratified, but His Majesty's Government do not consider that the present juridical status of Western Thrace imposes upon them an effectual responsibility for the administration of that territory.

"The Greek Government are understood to be doing their best to maintain order in the country, and to restrict the activities of the Bulgarian bands on the northern frontier. They have given an assurance that the deportations which have been necessitated by the present situation will not be permanent, and that the deportees will be repatriated. His Majesty's Representative on the Ambassadors' Conference will, therefore, be instructed to confine his efforts to taking note of the assurances of the Greek Government, and to pointing out the desirability of taking early action to conform the de jure to the de facto status of the country."

ISLAMIC MYSTICISM.

"THE IDEA OF PERSONALITY IN SUFISM." By Reynold A. Nicholson, Litt.D. (Cambridge University Press. 5s. net.)

The essence of mysticism is a realisation of God's personality and of the possibility of attaining to personal relations with Him. Every organised religion develops a mystical side, and Professor Nicholson's aim is to inquire how far this evolution has gone in Mohammedanism. Since religious sentiment is rooted in the emotions, it is impossible to expect logical processes in theologians. "I believe dogma," said St. Augustine, "because it is incredible." Thus we find in the Koran many conflicting utterances as to the personality of God. In Mohammed, writes Professor Nicholson—there were two voices, one certainly louder and more frequent than the other, yet each a mighty voice. One declares that Allah sits on His throne, that He is the great Taskmaster, whose eye is ever on His servants, as ready to punish and destroy the wicked as to pardon and protect the righteous; the other proclaims that He is nearer to us than our neck-vein.

A mighty change was wrought in the spirit of Islam by contact with beliefs current in Western Asia. From the Hellenistic Gnosis it borrowed the conception of Ma'rifat—the Knowledge of God; Mohammed was identified with the Logos of Judæo-Alexandrian philosophy; and the doctrine of Fana, or absorption in the Creator, must have been suggested by the Nirvāna of Buddhism.

Mysticism originated in Persia, which was the seat of an ancient civilisation. In 815 A.D. a Khurasāni named Abī-l-Ḥair, founded a monastic order, in defiance of the Prophet's injunction: "There is no monkery in Islam." His followers were nicknamed Sūfis, or "woolleners," from the garb which they habitually wore, just as members of the Society of Friends are commonly styled "Quakers." The earliest Sūfis were rigid ascetics, penetrated by a sense of the wrath to come; they withdrew from the world in order to work out their own salvation with fear and trembling. But "perfect love casteth out fear." Later Sūfis laid less stress on the transcendence of God, and saw in Him a Being to be loved with devotion. Man, they held, has no power to cross the chasm which separates him from the Creator; it must be bridged by the Divine Will. There is a striking parallel between this phase of Sūfism and Christianity. The ecstasy, or putting away of self, which revealed God to the Sūfi, is identical with the "conversion" of Protestantism. That religious sentiment is a question of temperament is shown by Professor Nicholson's account of prominent Sūfis. In the tenth century of our era there arose in Baghdad a teacher named Husayn-al-Hallāj, who borrowed from Syrian Christianity the doctrine of Duality in the Divine Nature. While he asserted the pre-existence of Mohammed as the Light from which all prophecy emanates, he found in Jesus the perfect type of the deified man. Such heresies were anathema to the orthodox, and Hallāj met a martyr's death in 931 A.D. Two centuries later another notable mystic appeared in the person of Abu Hāmid Ghazālī, whose spiritual experience strongly resembled that of St. Augustine. He was deeply versed in dialectics, and became a Professor of Theology at Baghdad. But his keen critical sense rebelled against the iron-bound dogma which he taught, and he became a complete sceptic. After intense inward travail the light of God entered his heart, inclining him towards Sūfism. After ten years of meditation in retirement he returned to the orthodox fold, and died in 1111 A.D. in full submission to its authority. Ghazālī's contemporary, Jalāl-u-ddīn Rūmī, was a mystical poet, who shrank not from speculations which have perplexed the keenest intellects in Christendom. He accounted for the existence of evil by declaring that it is a necessary condition of good: "Suffering purifies, sin leads to repentance, and evil is turned to good for the righteous." Free will is a Divine gift accepted by man; and complete freedom is attained by him who loves God so perfectly that his will is identical with the Divine will.

While the evolution of Sūfism wears a striking resemblance to kindred phases of Christianity, it presents a fundamental difference, because—

In Islam the Perfect Man, who is identified with Mohammed, represents the idea of Divinity revealing itself in Man rather than the ideal of Humanity realising itself in the personal life of God.

Professor Nicholson has brought scholarship and sympathy to bear on a subject needing both in a supreme degree. F. H. S.

TENNYSON.

"TENNYSON." By Harold Nicolson. (London: Constable and Co. 12s. 6d. net.)

The inevitability of a reaction by this age to the Victorian artists does not prohibit a certain shock or puzzlement from befalling us when the actual attempt is made. This endeavour to restate the position of the Victorians is at the moment most notable in regard to Tennyson and Mendelssohn; but it is more likely to achieve its object in the former case, for, though it has often been asserted that Tennyson was a successful versifier who lingered on to attain a peerage, it has never been denied by any considerable judge that he was a great lyricist. There was a time, indeed, before the War when the most sapient pleaded complete ignorance of him, but this was an obvious pose, because it was no more possible to forget the succulent ditties that one had learned at school than to drive out of one's memory the facile and empty tunes of the "Liede ohne Worte."

Mr. Harold Nicolson, whose novel "Sweet Waters" was recently reviewed in these columns, and whose connection with Near Eastern affairs is extensive, has come to put Tennyson in his place—that is, in his place for this generation. Despite his knowledge, his power of nice judgment, and his insight, the author of this book shrinks with modesty before the task of resolving a final judgment on Tennyson. He merely states, or discovers, which parts of Tennyson's works contemporary literary taste is likely to approve of—a narrow enough aim, which has, however, happily implicated an admirable critical study.

One cannot, of course, precisely divide Tennyson's work into the good and the bad. Of a man who was both magician and mystic, and conjurer and sophist, it is impossible to speak in unqualified terms, and if, on broad grounds, one may agree with Mr. Nicolson's acceptance of the lyrics and with his rejection of the didactic and narrative verse, one must be prepared to have pointed out all sorts of gems in the dross, and vice versa. But the author's main contention that the permanent Tennyson is the poet of the Lincolnshire wolds and seas, not the bard of the Isle of Wight pleasures, is certainly sound, and, indeed, accepted; it is to Mr. Nicolson's merit that he is the first, and an extremely able first, to demonstrate fully what many others have been seeing in less detail.

It is outside our scope to discuss adequately the author's particular opinion of Tennyson, still farther outside to prefer our own opinion of this H. G. Wells of the Victorian era; but we are quite confident that the candour, honesty, and sanity of this book will commend it at once to readers. No one really, except the impossibly tolerant "judicials," approaches Tennyson as he would approach, say, Shakespeare, or Milton, or Keats; but apparently it is not possible to fail to be impressed with the greatness of the man, just as another recent critic shrank back awfully before the mighty presence of Queen Victoria. If anyone distrusts the essential greatness of Tennyson, he should read Mr. Nicolson's book, for it is mainly in the interests of those infidels who infallibly discredit their fathers' and grandfathers' opinions that this new valuation of Tennyson has been made.

BUDDHISM AS A WORLD-FORCE.

"THE WISDOM OF THE ARYAS." By Allan Bennett (Ananda M.) (London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner. 2s. 6d. net.)

Mr. Bennett discourses with inside knowledge of the creed which he has embraced. Many years ago he became a Buddhist monk in Burmah, rising eventually to the dignity of Elder. On returning to England he founded an International Buddhist Society, and delivered a series of lectures which forms the basis of the present handbook. In a lengthy Introduction he attributes all the evils under which Western civilisation is groaning to the growing "individualism" of our age. He lays stress on the ever-widening gulf which yawns between Christian dogma and applied science. The first postulates that Nature's phenomena are subservient to an arbitrary and omnipotent Will; the second has proved conclusively that the sequence of events throughout the universe is regulated by immutable Law. Thus many anxious thinkers are forced into the arid wastes of Agnosticism, and many more render but lip-service to their fathers' creed. Buddhism is alone capable of reconciling revealed religion with scientific truth. It is at once an all-embracing creed and a body of science covering the whole realm of Nature. Such is Mr. Bennett's thesis, and he develops it with a convert's enthusiasm.

He traces a parallel between the civilisation of our day and that of Rome in her decline. In each case we observe sex and class-antagonism, a recrudescence of animistic superstitions; violent contrasts between abounding wealth and abject destitution; finally, the apotheosis of individualism culminating in the World-War. He regards these phenomena as indicating a "failure of the life-impulse," ignoring the stupendous energy put forth by all the combatants in the recent struggle—energy which, under proper guidance, would have regenerated the entire world. Nor is Mr. Bennett happier in the reason which he gives for optimism as regards the future. Roman civilisation, he asserts, was the work of a single race with which it perished, while ours will be more durable because it has been built up by the co-operation of many races. A different story was told by the historian Gibbon, who showed that Rome at her apogee had marvellous assimilative power. All the intellect of the known world was enlisted in her service—Britons, Gauls, Spaniards, Africans, and Jews gloried in their status of Roman citizens. Her decline and fall were brought about by faulty economic and political conditions, which sapped her strength and rendered her an easy prey to barbarian invaders.

Mr. Bennett believes that the universal acceptance of Buddhism would raise civilisation to an infinitely higher plane. But it has to contend in Japan with ancestor-worship; in China with systematised morality, and in Tibet with the survival of debasing superstitions. The only regions in which the creed taught by Gautama survives in something of its pristine purity enjoy the protection of Great Britain. We may fairly infer that Buddhism, despite its moral grandeur and its partial conformity with the discoveries of science, is utterly unfitted for the age of transition in which our lot is cast. The quietism which it inculcates would paralyse human effort in the coming struggle with assailants inspired by a militant creed.

ARABIC-ENGLISH DICTIONARIES.

ELIAS A. ELIAS. ARABIC-ENGLISH MODERN DICTIONARY. AND THE MODERN ARABIC-ENGLISH DICTIONARY OF SPIRO BEY. (Published by Elias, in Cairo.)

These works appear to us as most useful works for Englishmen whose knowledge of Arabic is imperfect and for Arabs whose knowledge of English is slight. Undoubtedly they will supply a much-felt need in the East, and their idiomatic expressions, as well as the correct pronunciation given in Spiro Bey's book should be of great help to learners of Arabic.

The modernity of these dictionaries consists in the facility they offer non-learned Arabic students of both sides to ignore the roots of the Arabic words and seek each word as it appears to them in writing. There is also an attempt to coin new Arabic words for modern scientific and commercial terms. Much, however, remains to be done in this direction, and, on our part, we should suggest "Manhada" for lift, and for aeroplane "Saffaf" instead of "Tayara," although the act of flying may continue to be expressed by "Tayaran," whereas "Saffaf" is strictly "planeur."

THE YUGOSLAV SOCIETY FOR THE STUDY OF ENGLISH.

Our Liubliana correspondent writes (May 8):—This society was founded a year ago in Liubliana, the first of its kind in the kingdom. Since then it has progressed steadily and surely. The number of members has more than trebled. It owns a small, but representative English library, provides its members with special facilities for learning English, and is already proving its usefulness as a centre for all who are interested in the study of English and everything that that implies. The library consists exclusively of books presented by friends and well-wishers in Great Britain and America, as the low value of the dinar makes purchase impossible. The society's annual general meeting took place on March 28.

Gifts of books will be gratefully welcomed by the Secretary, Yugoslav Society for the Study of English, Gosposvetska cesta, 5, Liubliana, Yugoslavia. The books should be sent by ordinary book post.

TURKEY AFTER LAUSANNE.

The course of events at Lausanne may be regarded as an earnest of the part that Turkey is likely to play, for a time, at least, in international affairs. Whether because familiarity with his surroundings has given Ismet Pasha more confidence or because the second Conference is not being guided by the same master-hand as the first, Turkish obstruction is more pronounced and obstinacy is employed less with the idea of extracting concessions on which the Turks may legitimately set some store than for the purpose of annoying the Allies or delaying the proceedings. It is well to bear in mind, however, that the Allies are largely to blame for what is happening, and if Turkey does nothing worse than adopt dilatory tactics, the Entente Powers will be paying lightly for their mistakes of the last four years. The amazing turn that events have taken is calculated to upset the mental equilibrium of more advanced nations than the Turks. Three years ago they were a defeated and dispirited people; to-day they are in a position to hold up the whole Allied machinery in the East, and can even persuade themselves that they are dictating to Great Britain and to France. It is inevitable that they should feel tempted to explore the new situation to its farthest limits. Within the four walls of the Conference chamber the process of exploration will necessarily prove to be circumscribed, and Turkey may then sign the Peace Treaty in the expectation of having unlimited scope for the exercise of her independence in the general scheme of the world's affairs. For this second phase the Allies will need an even greater measure of patience than their representatives have successfully displayed at Lausanne. To the most exasperating tactics that Turkey can adopt they must oppose an unruffled equanimity. Territorial aggression, if it should occur, must be immediately countered; but there is probably less danger of this than present indications suggest. It will be within their own frontiers that the Turks will feel obliged to show themselves aggressive. They have established their moral equality with the West, and they will be at pains to convince foreigners that this carries with it an equality of intellect and experience. They will learn ultimately that experience is acquired by slower methods, and they may pay dearly for the lesson. The Allies, and especially Britons, must avoid any attempt in Turkey to force the pace towards Western standards. The Turks should be allowed to discover their own shortcomings rather than have them dinned into them by foreigners before the public conscience is ready to distinguish between the best and the second best. The leaven of progress that may in time succeed in leavening the whole lump is there, but at present it finds it prudent not to make its presence felt.

If it were possible or popular to adopt a dispassionate attitude towards Turkey, some allowance might have to be made for a very embarrassed Government. Angora, according to its own lights, has good reason to be proud of its achievements; but it can hardly hide from itself the fact that it has only a makeshift Administration. The number of subjects that ought to be engaging its attention at this moment might well tax the capacity of an established and well-ordered State, able to rely upon an efficient Diplomatic Corps and a trained Civil Service. The Lausanne Conference alone covers a range of questions far too wide for the adequate comprehension of the Angora authorities; but, in addition to this, they have on their hands complications with France and with Russia, and are, no doubt, experiencing difficulty in meeting the expectations of a crowd of enthusiasts—Egyptians, Afghans, Indians, and others—who have been encouraged to look to Turkey for a new era for the whole Moslem world and have come to Angora to secure tangible benefits. It is more than likely, however, that Mustapha Kemal Pasha's Cabinet, collectively and individually, is at this particular moment wholly engrossed in the elections. Little wonder, therefore, that Ismet Pasha at Lausanne is playing desperately for time, trying to disguise the deficiencies both of the Delegation and of Angora, and often reduced to obstruction merely for obstruction's sake; that in her foreign relationships Turkey blows now hot, now cold; and that legislation is made and unmade, applied and withdrawn, with bewildering inconsistency. Things, we may hope, will not always be in this state. The elections will shortly be over, and, as the Opposition appears to have been effectually intimidated into silence or abstention by an ad hoc treason law, Mustapha Kemal's party should be returned to power in a strong position. If the Lausanne Conference should have a satisfactory ending as well, the Angora Government will find the order of the day reduced to more manageable proportions, and Turkish affairs may come to be handled amid fewer distractions, and, consequently, with greater wisdom. No one will wish to prophesy in regard to Turkey's future. Where, however, things cannot be cured by external agencies, but have to be left to cure themselves, it does not entail the exercise of much statesmanship to recommend that they should be endured, especially when there is a strong incentive for being concerned with the things in question. Foreign enterprise will have many obstacles to contend with in Turkey; but it is certain that in the end it will be worth all the troubles and set-backs. If our line of reasoning is correct, the obstacles may prove less formidable than present indications suggest. Only the very timid will withdraw from all business undertakings until the indispensability of foreign co-operation has been properly understood by the Turks; the more knowledgeable will realise that, although trade will be badly handicapped at first by Turkish ignorance and suspicion, the example of sound business methods will provide the quickest means of educating the Turk to the advantages of liberal treatment of foreign enterprise.

One of the most striking features in Nationalist Turkey is the emphasis laid on economic reconstruction. The cynical will find in this a connection with the interest that all Oriental Governments have in the handling of large sums of money; but, as the Angora Government has already shown itself to be far in advance of any previous Turkish authority in setting its face against corrupt methods of administration, and as the chief exponent of the policy of reconstruction is Mustapha Kemal Pasha himself, there is no reason to doubt that the Turks will try to promote the rapid development of their country. The Chester Concession, whatever its political bearing, commanded support, because it was regarded as a definite step in this direction. The force behind the Angora movement is nationalism. For the first time in his history the Turk is being actuated by pride in his country rather than by other motives. He wants his country to be on a level with other countries in regard to the things on which he has now learned to set store. If his present frame of mind and his inexperience prompt him to impose impossible terms on those to whom he looks for assistance in carrying out his programme, he is more likely to adjust his views to what is practical politics than to abandon his desire to develop the country. Here, then, is another steady factor which may come into play when the Lausanne Conference has run its term. As in diplomacy, so in the business world, only those possessed of inexhaustible supplies of patience should enter into dealings with Turkey. However disquieting the present symptoms, it will be found that the more intractable characteristics of the Turks will pass, for other considerations than the desire to score off the Allies will enter into his scheme of things.

THE MACEDONIAN PROBLEM.

(Contributed.)

Three years have barely elapsed since the signature of the Treaty of Neuilly, which was supposed—by its authors, at least—to have “definitely” settled the Balkan question, and now the Macedonian problem once more threatens the peace of South-Eastern Europe.

From the date of the Treaty of Berlin until the Great War Macedonia was the nucleus of Balkan politics, and in the eyes of Europe always seemed to be the spark that was in danger of exploding the Balkan powder-magazine. At the outset the Macedonian problem was merely a feud between the Turks and the Bulgarians, or possibly between Moslems and Christians; but since the fratricidal war of 1913 it acquired wider importance, involving Greece and Serbia on the one hand and Bulgaria on the other. The claims of Serbia over Macedonia are of recent date; for it was only after the occupation and annexation of Serbian territories by Austria-Hungary—a fact which deprived Serbia of any outlets to the sea—that covetous eyes were turned towards Macedonia, and hopes of redeeming the empire of the Great Dushan were kindled. Until then the Serbians had even helped the Bulgarians with their propaganda work in Macedonia and had printed pamphlets for this purpose at Belgrade. The Bulgarians, ever since the Treaty of Berlin, made no secret of their aim to help their Macedonian kinsfolk to shake off the fetters of Turkish rule. The necessary funds to this end were supplied by national subscriptions in Bulgaria, and the hope of a speedy union with Macedonia became the fundamental basis of Bulgarian politics. In due course these aspirations led to the participation of Bulgaria in the war against the Allies, for Germany had readily offered to Bulgaria the full realisation of all her claims to Macedonia and the Dobruja, while the Allies were not at the time in a position to promise her territories that belonged to one of their number.

As matters now stand, the Treaty of Neuilly, supposed to have put an end to the Macedonian question once for all, has only served to complicate it more than ever. The earliest symptoms of the new order appeared in the first elections to the Yugoslav Parliament, when the Macedonians voted in a body for the Communists, not because they particularly favoured Communist principles, but simply in order to express their discontent. The challenge was promptly taken up by the Belgrade Government, which installed in Serbian Macedonia its most chauvinistic functionaries. As an immediate result of this policy groups of komitajis, recruited from peasants who had suffered losses through Serbian administration, were organised under the command of some of the former leaders of the famous “Macedonian Committee.” These bands set to work to harass the Serbian police and Serbian authorities and to persecute the members of the Serbian “colonies” recently transported to Macedonia from the North by orders of the Yugoslav Government. It is this “colonisation” of Macedonia, already begun in 1913-1914, that exasperated the Macedo-Bulgarian inhabitants of that region, who were driven out of their homes by force and compelled to witness the installation of the “colonists.” It was these events that threatened the relations between Serbia and Bulgaria at the end of 1921 and the beginning of 1922. The bands, pursued by the Serbian gendarmerie, often took refuge in Bulgarian territory. The Bulgarians, with no adequate military forces at their disposal, declared that they were powerless to prevent the actions of the komitajis, in spite of the goodwill of the Government. M. Stambolisky, indeed, may well have claimed to have had his hands full as it was in Bulgaria itself, owing to the perpetual scheming and plotting of Macedonians in and around the capital. (The murder of the Minister of War, M. Dimitroff, occurred at this time and was attributed to Macedonians.)

The Macedonian Committees are represented in Bulgaria by several thousands of adherents, including those settled in Bulgaria before the Balkan wars and a great number of new refugees. The latter have been particularly prominent for their policy of intimidation, accusing the Government of neglecting the Macedonian question in its attempt to win the friendship of Yugoslavia.

The present development of the Macedonian trouble is directly associated with the rapprochement between Yugoslavia and Bulgaria. As is well known, M. Stambolisky has made it a cardinal point of his policy to establish cordial relations with his Western neighbours. During his visit to Belgrade, on the eve of the first Lausanne Conference, he laid the foundations of the Serbo-Bulgarian Conference that was held a few months ago at Nish. As a result of this exchange of views the relations between the two countries have been placed on a satisfactory footing, at the expense, however, of the relations between Bulgaria and the Macedonians. A year ago Yugoslavia was threatening to send troops into Bulgaria, unless immediate measures were taken against the komitajis and against Macedonian propaganda in Bulgaria. The necessary measures were taken by M. Stambolisky, with the result that the Macedonian Committee is now the avowed enemy of the Bulgarian Government, on whom it has declared open war.

The value of good relations between Yugoslavia and Bulgaria needs no emphasis. Around such a nucleus might be built a great Southern Slav federation. The idea is known to commend itself to the Croats led by M. Raditch, to the Slovenes and Bosnians, and to the younger generation in Serbia, which is less chauvinistic than the Pashitch school. It would be a tragedy, however, if such a rapprochement can be secured only at the cost of a permanent sore in the Balkans. The Macedonians contend that the Serbian policy of colonisation is still being continued at their expense, and that the Macedo-Bulgarian population is being subjected to arrest and to imprisonment or execution. They protest and retaliate, killing gendarmes and burning the houses of the "colonists." Quite recently the Macedonian Committee informed the Yugoslav authorities that if the Serbian colonists did not leave the country at once the Macedonians would be obliged to take the necessary measures to compel them to do so. On the other hand, the Macedonians living in Bulgaria are a source of trouble and anxiety to the Government, which, owing to the lack of adequate forces, has hitherto not felt in a position to cope with the menace. Hence the series of murders perpetrated by Macedonians and the sudden declaration of autonomy by the district of Petritch, which follows upon the temporary occupation last year of Kustendil, to say nothing of attacks on sentries, the bomb-throwing in the Sofia theatre, and the despatch of threatening letters to Ministers and prominent Civil Servants. Now, at last, however, the Bulgarian Government appears to have made up its mind that the problem has to be dealt with drastically. Numerous arrests of Macedonians have been carried out, and it is announced that there is to be a general Agrarian mobilisation, and that 20,000 Agrarian guards are to be summoned for the protection of Sofia. Among the leaders of the Macedonians arrested is M. Karandjouloff, a former President of the Macedonian Brotherhood, who, as far as is known, has always been on the side of moderation. The arrested people will be kept in camps and tried by one of the new laws that the Legislature has evolved for the special purpose.

Thus Macedonia may be compared with a thorn in the hand of Serbia that goes deeper into the flesh of Bulgaria the more tightly she clasps her neighbour's hand.

The end of all this trouble cannot be seen at present. The example of Ireland, which is in many ways similar, is not encouraging. It is a characteristic of the Macedonian that he despises death and places patriotism above everything else. It is unlikely that he will ever consent willingly to surrender his rights, and a system of oppression will never solve the Macedonian problem. Undoubtedly the only satisfactory solution would be the granting of autonomy to Macedonia under an agreement between Yugoslavia and Bulgaria. If the future holds out the prospect of Bulgaria joining a Southern Slav Federation, there is no reason why Macedonia should not be given autonomy without political severance from Serbia. In this way both Yugoslavia and Bulgaria would have peace, and the present bone of contention between them would serve as a link in a friendship not only beneficent to both countries but fruitful of good results to the whole of the Balkan Peninsula.

The Turkish Government has announced that those Greeks who left Constantinople during the Allied occupation without Turkish passports will not be allowed to return. This does not necessarily mean that their land will be considered as being within the scope of the Abandoned Property Law.

Reuter's Jerusalem correspondent reports that Sir Herbert Samuel, on May 8, attended by a large number of officials and prominent residents, inaugurated, by cutting the first sod the new settlement of the Maccabean Society at Gezer, near Ramleh, on the Plain of Sharon. This is the first British Jewish colony in Palestine. Gezer was an important place in olden times, and was given by Pharaoh to Solomon as a wedding gift.

Compulsory Labour Service in Bulgaria.

The New Statesman has an article based on a pamphlet by M. Max Lazard on the working of the system of compulsory labour introduced three years ago in Bulgaria by M. Stambolisky's Government. M. Lazard was sent by the International Labour Office to examine on the spot the application of the law and to explain its working. The article proceeds:—

The Act applies to able-bodied men between the ages of twenty and forty, and to women between sixteen and thirty. The maximum service required is eight months for the former and four months for the latter, and it may, on the demand of the Government, be performed either on one single occasion or in instalments. There are certain specified exemptions, but the only really important one is that of married women. But commutation also is permitted on terms. This was insisted on by the Allied Powers against the wishes of the Bulgarian Government, whose purpose was to make the service universal. As it is, such proportion of persons as the Government may decide (it is now about 20 per cent. of those liable to be called up) may buy themselves out on payment of a "fine." This "fine" varies according to the means of the applicant.

The work is, of course, all public work—either for the State or municipality. It ranges over a wide field. The men may be put to the construction of roads, railways, waterworks, and so on, the draining of marshes, the laying of telegraph and telephone cables, afforestation, farming and land cultivation of various sorts, fishing or mining. Women may be employed in different kinds of household work, typing and telegraphy, sick nursing, food preserving, silkworm and bee-raising, dairy and poultry farming. No wages are paid either to men or women; but the workers are housed and clothed and fed at the public expense.

The administration is under the Ministry of Public Works, functioning through a Director-General of Compulsory Labour Service and a whole hierarchy of central and local officials—making a grand total of nearly two thousand. Such in outline is the scheme on paper. How does it operate in fact? It has been applied with considerable caution. The men have been called up in fairly large contingents on various occasions during the last two and a-half years, and undoubtedly a great deal of valuable work has been done. The finding of the right kind of occupation for the women and girls, however, under the terms of the Act presents more difficulty, and what little has been done with them amounts only to a demonstration of principle. Three hundred young women of the Sofia bourgeoisie were called up last spring and set generally to clerical work in the different Ministries.

From the point of view of technical education it seems to have been disappointing. Nor is M. Lazard enthusiastic about its more general "moral" effects, though it may be pleaded, no doubt, that the limited application of the Act so far has not given it a fair chance in this respect. The most important question, however, is the economic one. Does compulsory labour pay? There is much controversy on this point. Although there are no wages, the cost of maintenance of the workers and the general administrative expenses make a heavy bill to be footed by the State. Then a substantial allowance must be made for a lower output per man, owing partly to the natural inefficiency of many of the workers at unfamiliar jobs, and partly to the fact that compulsory labour could not be expected at first, at any rate, to call forth the workers' maximum effort. Some critics assert that the service itself is not well-organised and that there is a heavy waste in bureaucratic expenditure. M. Lazard, after examining the whole matter very carefully, comes to the conclusion that the gain to the State, in its bald financial aspect, may be nil—or even a minus quantity. But he suggests that there are other considerations to be taken into account, and that in the Bulgaria of to-day "the community seems to have reached a lower stage of development than the individual and so hampers the latter's progress, and consequently work performed for the benefit of the community will have a factor of urgency which renders it preferable, even if of less intrinsic value, to that on behalf of the individual.

The Turks and Lausanne.

In the Daily Herald, Captain E. N. Bennett, writing from Lausanne, says that if the second Conference ends in failure it will be France who is to blame, for no valid reason exists why Great Britain and Turkey should not sign the Treaty without further delay. He proceeds to explain the heavily-soaked financial atmosphere of the Conference:—

The living and dominant issue to-day is finance, and finance only. How often at nightfall in my desert journeys I have heard from the lips of chattering Arabs round their camp fire that one reiterated word, "feluss, feluss" (money). It is just the same here. In the conference hall, in the corridors of the hotel, at the dinner-table, all the talk is of "concessions" and "bond-holders." It is nauseating. The trail of dirty finance is over the whole business, and the chances of peace are being jeopardised. French newspapers are full of jingo threats and French reinforcements are being detailed for Syria. The Turks have been beset and harried by concession hunters and commercial speculators ever since the Armistice. And what a field for these fortune-hunters! Here is a country rich in oil and minerals and a marvellously fertile soil—everything undeveloped, a skeleton railway system, few harbours, intolerable roads, and undrained land; here, too, is a country which has to import its ink and its paper, its glass and hardware, its boots and clothes, and practically everything it needs for ordinary household life. Now that the tyrannous Capitulations can no longer crush out local industries, the field for industrial development in Turkey is almost unlimited.

And the Turks are perfectly willing to open their country to legitimate traders. If there is oil in Mosul, or copper in Arghana, or coal in Pontus, the Turks are not emulating the example of Western nations by seeking to put a ring fence round their resources; the door is open to honest traders from Great Britain, or France, or anywhere else.

The New Roumanian Constitution.

The Manchester Guardian of May 11 contains an account of the opposition which the new Constitution of Roumania has aroused. Those, says the writer of the article, with whom M. Bratianu's Government is unpopular, assert that it has set its sails towards reaction, that, not content with failing to fulfil promises as regards minorities, it is even curtailing acquired rights, and that the substitution of "minority representation" for proportional representation is a mere trick. But the bitterest point of opposition to the new Constitution centres round the nationalisation decree, which, say M. Bratianu's opponents, merely means that the wealth thereby confiscated will pass, by means of State concessions, into the hands of the retainers of the Liberal party. The writer concludes his remarks thus:—

On the whole, the tenour of the new Constitution justifies the argument of the Opposition that its real purpose is to restrict the political power acquired by the mass of the people four years ago; and, secondly, to recover some economic power for the dispossessed land-owning class. In both cases, that is, the Liberals are trying to build a dam against the agrarian revolution. That is in keeping with their traditional policy. As the self-appointed protectors of Roumanian nationalism they have always laboured to create a genuine Roumanian middle class, and to that end they have favoured a system of political and economic privileges that is probably unique as a deliberate policy.

NOTES AND NEWS.

Tuesday Morning.

The B.I.F. and the Empire Exhibition.

In view of the fact that the British Empire Exhibition is to be held next year, the Federation of British Industries instituted an inquiry among its affiliated associations as to the advisability of also holding the British Industries Fair next year. The majority of the replies were in the negative, and the Federation has accordingly made representations to that effect to the Department of Overseas Trade, at the same time emphasising the desirability of maintaining the staff concerned with the Fair, as the Federation are of the opinion that the Fair is of great importance to British industry.

An Undesirable Clashing.

There cannot be two opinions as to the inadvisability of holding both events in one year. The only result will be that they will be bound to act adversely upon one another. A good many weeks ago I drew attention to this point, and suggested that it might be found desirable to hold them concurrently, when it would be possible for those who wished to visit both, but could not make two journeys, to do so. But it would obviously be much better from every point of view to concentrate on the Exhibition, and no doubt the representations of the Federation in this connection will have considerable weight with the authorities. It is very satisfactory at the same time to note the attitude of the Federation to the Fair as a medium of trade endeavour. There have been so many criticisms on the London section of this annual event that the average business man might well come to the conclusion that it was serving no useful purpose.

Egypt Promotion Association.

I have just received a copy of the very interesting report of the Egypt Promotion Association. On the whole, the past year was one of very considerable success. Of course, the discovery at Luxor did much towards the success of the season, and should have even more important results on the tourist traffic in the next few years. King Fuad is now patron of the association, and this notable development should do much to further its work, particularly in the direction of obtaining for it more widespread support among Egyptian firms. The work the association can do is naturally circumscribed by the support it receives, and up to the present it has certainly not been backed up to the extent it deserves, possibly because the invaluable character of its work has not been sufficiently understood.

The Next Yugoslav Fair.

I drew attention last week to the comments of our Liubliana Correspondent regarding the poor representation of British goods at the Zagreb Fair. British firms desiring to enter the market will be able to avail themselves of the publicity afforded by another fair shortly—that of Liubliana, which is being held from September 1 to 10. Those who desire to exhibit should bear in mind that entries, accompanied by the requisite fee of about 300 dinars, must be received by June 15. I shall be glad to give further information to any readers who may be interested.

India's New Loan.

It had been known for some time that another Indian Loan was on the tapis, and this week saw it materialise. The only feature that can be termed surprising about it is the amount (£20,000,000), which is somewhat larger than was expected. The last Indian Loan appeared in October, and, like the present issue, was a Four and a-Half per Cent. Loan; but the new loan is issued at 90, or five points higher than the price of the October issue. On the whole the terms are attractive, particularly when the graduated scale of instalments is borne in mind, while the payment of a full half-year's interest in November means a bonus of about a point. What the result of the loan will be remains to be seen. It may be pointed out, however, that while ten days ago it would have made its appearance at a time of buoyant markets, the Stock Exchange is now very dull, and, it may be added, the amount of the new loan has not helped the gilt-edged market.

Railway Development in India.

The new loan, like its predecessors, is for railway development. Provision has been made, it will be recalled, for the expenditure of £100,000,000 within five years, and, including the present issue, the amount raised will amount to £70,000,000. This extensive programme is due, of course, to the fact that any developments were out of the question during the War period. It is noteworthy that the series of loans have marked a gradual improvement in India's credit. The first loan was a Seven per Cent. issue, and it is a long way from that to the terms of the present loan. The fact that India's Budget has at last been made to balance has naturally been a most helpful factor.

Duties on Dried Fruits.

When the question of Empire preference comes to be discussed at the forthcoming Empire Conferences one of the matters that will inevitably be raised will be the question of preference for dried fruits produced within the Empire. Various proposals have already been put forward, and the latest which finds much favour is that a flat duty should be levied on all dried fruits imported into this country from foreign countries. That this cannot fail to affect certain regions in the Near East adversely would seem to be evident, but no country without very special facilities can expect to have a monopoly in regard to the growing of any particular product, and whatever the Empire can do in the way of producing dried fruits there will always be a market for Turkish and Greek produce—though the prices may not be what they were.

The Burma Corporation.

The announcement that the directors of the Burma Corporation have declared an interim dividend of four annas per share is of particular interest because this is the first distribution made by the company since its establishment as an English concern in 1906. The dividend is equal to a modest $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., but, in view of the company's vast ore reserves, it needs no particular optimism to suggest that it is merely the prelude to a series of much more substantial distributions. It will, at any rate, be surprising if that does not prove to be the case.

Sun Insurance.

The report of the Sun Insurance Office for the past year discloses very satisfactory results. The principal department of the company is the fire branch, and the balance of this department transferred to the profit and loss account is £232,963, which compares very favourably with the results of the previous year. Last year the total dividend paid was 18s. per share, and it is now proposed to pay a final dividend of 10s. per share, making the distribution for the year 19s. per share.

COMPANY NOTES AND REPORTS.

Egyptian Markets.

The report of the Egyptian Markets, Ltd., for the year ended December 31, states that during the first half of the year the company's markets, both cattle and general, were subjected to a boycott organised by political extremists. This boycott commenced in January and lasted five months, and at one time as many as forty-eight of the company's markets were affected which has resulted in a considerable loss of receipts. The gross receipts from the cattle markets, exclusive of slaughter houses, show a decrease of £6,609, as compared with the year 1921, the total being £59,903, against £66,512. This decrease is mainly due to the boycott of the company's markets referred to above. The gross receipts from the general markets for the year under review were £35,460, as compared with £39,639 for the year 1921, a decrease of £4,179. This decrease is also largely due to the boycott previously referred to. The net receipts from the slaughter-houses worked during the year were £1,085 against £1,236 during 1921, a decrease of £151. No slaughter-houses have been taken over by the Government during the year 1922. The expenses in the trading account show an increase of £394 under rents, salaries, and wages, and a decrease of £2,733 for cost of maintenance and repairs of markets. The net revenue from all sources for the year 1922 amounted to £49,168 10s. 3d., as compared with £59,292 18s. 7d. during the previous year, a decrease of £10,124 8s. 4d. After deduction of the amount of £20,545 6s. 5d., which it is estimated will be required to meet payment of the Government share of profits for 1922, a balance of £28,623 3s. 10d. remains, which, with the amount of £10,380 17s. 7d. brought forward from 1921, makes a total of £39,004 1s. 5d. to be dealt with. After meeting the fixed charges of the annual premia for the amortisation of the share capital and debentures, amounting to £3,743 11s. 6d., debenture interest £2,840, and carrying the sum of £1,000 to reserve, a balance of £31,420 9s. 11d. remains available for distribution. The directors recommend the payment of a final dividend (No. 37) on the ordinary shares for the year ended December 31, 1922, of 5 per cent., making, with the interim dividend of 5 per cent. paid in November, 1922, a total of 10 per cent. for the year, absorbing in all £17,470, and in accordance with the terms of the memorandum of association of the company, and subject to the settlement of the proportion of profits due to the Government and to such corporation profits tax as may be payable, the payment of a dividend (No. 13) on the deferred shares at the rate of £7 16s. 11 189-300d. per share for the year 1922, which will absorb £2,354 10s. 9d., and leave a balance of £11,595 19s. 2d. to be carried forward, which balance is also subject to the settlements above referred to. ALBANIA.

Tirana, May 4.

The Development of the Country.

The problem which occupies Albanian politicians to-day is the development of the country's resources. The authorities, after securing tranquillity in the country and establishing good relations with neighbouring States, are endeavouring to come to an understanding with various foreign companies with a view to the exploitation of the country.

Foreign capitalists have long been aware of the potentialities of Albania—practically an unexploited region—and if they have not hitherto come forward it has been because they considered that the existing conditions would render the utilisation of capital a hazardous procedure. The result of the establishment in Albania of a really national Government and the development of a stable state of affairs has been that many foreign groups have come forward and are competing for the different enterprises to be undertaken.

The problem of the day is the oil concession. The contract made between the Anglo-Persian Company and the Albanian Government is still under discussion by a joint committee of the Parliament. Opposition has been advanced to a clause in the agreement giving the company exclusive rights, and in view of this the company submitted another contract, in which that clause is replaced by one according to which the company reserves the right to choose any area or areas after the geological researches have been completed. It is generally believed that the joint committee will rather tend to favour what is known as the "open door" policy.

Next in importance to the oil question would appear to be the enterprise for general development of the so-called "Albanian Syndicate," established in Berlin by the following groups:—(1) Messrs. Lenz and Co., a company established by the Krupp firm and the Deutsche Bank; (2) Messrs. Huebner and Zeuner, of Hamburg, importers and exporters; (3) the establishment of Dr. Albrecht in Berlin and Dortmund dealing with the manufacturing of chemical products and exploitation of minerals and charcoal; (4) a London firm of importers and exporters.

The syndicate in question is represented in Tirana by Dr. Huebner and Consul Andreae. A provisional agreement for the following undertakings has been made between the latter and the Albanian Government:—(1) The construction of roads and narrow gauge railways as required by the Albanian Government; (2) the construction of various bridges and official buildings; (3) the exploitation of the forests of Diviaka, Mati Shkreli, Puka, Cukali, and Mirdita; (4) the concession and exploitation of charcoal; (5) the monopoly of matches and cigarette papers; (6) the drying of different swamps.

A group of engineers, under the supervision of Consul Andreae, is visiting all Albania with a view to carrying out the necessary investigations, at the end of which a definite contract dealing with the enterprises in question will be concluded between the Government and the syndicate.

Another interesting contract is one concerning more than one hundred State farms concluded between the Government and M. Leonardo Fabiano, representing the Adriatico Company. By this contract M. Fabiano, in the name of the company, undertakes to till the public domain farms extending from the River Shkumbi to the River Viosa. He gets this land for twenty-five years in return for a rental compensation of 500,000 francs in gold, to be increased by 50,000 each five years. He is subject to the laws of the Albanian State as an Albanian citizen. By way of guarantee, the Government will require from him 2,500,000 francs in gold as soon as Parliament approves the contract and he is ready to take over the farms in question.

A Marseilles building company has sent two representatives to Tirana to negotiate concerning the construction of a large hotel in the capital, as well as private houses.

A NEW ROUMANIAN BANK.

Towards the end of last year a committee was set up by the Government of Roumania to consider a project for the establishment of an industrial credit bank, to be known as the "Credit Industriel." Its object was to promote and facilitate the reconstruction and development of national industry, to furnish raw materials and machinery to manufacturers, to create new industries, and to encourage the "nationalisation" of existing industrial establishments, nationalisation being used, it would appear, to signify the control and conduct of industry by Roumanian nationals.

It was to be authorised:—(a) To advance loans to limited companies or private industrial enterprises, co-operative societies, and Roumanian manufacturers, against mortgage or securities; (b) to make advances to the above against shipping documents or other similar securities for periods not exceeding six months; (c) to support the study of industrial problems and finance public institutions with an industrial character; (d) to participate with capital in any enterprise of public interest; (e) to discount at a reduced rate all kinds of commercial paper payable in the country or abroad, advance money on warrants, etc.; (f) to effect payments either in the country or abroad, to open current accounts, and in general to transact any kind of banking business, exclusive of the right to participate in the subscription of foreign loans; (g) to establish bonded warehouses for raw materials and manufactured articles necessary, especially to small industries.

The Credit Industriel will finance only those industries the capital of which is 55 per cent. Roumanian, and which employ two-thirds Roumanian personnel. The Credit Industriel will establish one or several technical offices for the purpose of studying all questions regarding the exploitation of the natural resources of the country, the creation of new industries, etc.

H.M. Commercial Secretary at Bucharest (Mr. Alexander Adams) now reports that the draft law has been made public. According to this draft the new bank will be called the National Society of Industrial Credit. The company will have its principal seat in Bucharest, and the State will participate in the first instance to the extent of 40,000,000 lei. The Banca Nationala will take 60,000,000, whilst the first issue on a total authorised capital of 500,000,000 will be 200,000,000. This means that the State and the Banca Nationala between them will hold half the issued capital, and provision is made that the State will always participate to the extent of at least 5 per cent. of the capital, whilst the Banca Nationala must always hold not less than 10 per cent. The State will guarantee the payment of interest on the obligations issued by the company, whilst provision is made that these obligations, as well as industrial letters of credit issued by the bank, will be accepted by public administrations as well as the Banca Nationala as guarantee. The obligations are also made a trustee security, and they will enjoy all the privileges of Bonds of the Roumanian State debt.

The Egyptian Delta Land and Investment Company announces a dividend of 6d. per share, payable June 1.

Naradni Listy reports that a well-known Bohemian firm (Messrs. Bacher, of Roudnice) have received an order from Bulgaria for 6,000 ploughs.

A supplement to the Egyptian Journal Officiel contains a decree authorising the formation of a new ginning and cottonseed pressing company, with the title of "Usines Réunies d'Egrenage et d'Huileries." The company will have a capital of £E60,000 in £E4 shares, and its headquarters will be at Alexandria. The first directors are MM. Elie Toriel, Raphael Toriel, Jacques Richès, and Salvatore Salama.

Stock and Share Markets.

TONE STILL DULL.

Business on Small Scale.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

Throughout the week the markets have been in what can only be described as an extremely depressed state, as a result of the uncertainties in regard to the foreign political situation. It is not only the Reparations question that has had to be taken into account, though that has, of course, been the chief factor in influencing the markets. There has also been the adverse development in Belgium, while the uncertainty with regard to both Russia and Turkey has also not been without its effect.

It would seem probable that the spell of pronounced weakness in the markets is over, and that, failing any adverse development abroad, a steady tone should prevail. But beyond that it would be futile to look for anything until much more settled conditions prevail. It is curious that the depression should coincide with quite a flood of new issues, culminating in the £20,000,000 Indian Loan.

Gilt-Edged Decline.

Gilt-edged have reflected the prevailing trend, and in the absence of support, coupled with a certain amount of realisations, values have tended downwards. Consols at 58 have shed $1\frac{1}{4}$, War Loan Fives at $100\frac{1}{2}$ are $\frac{1}{4}$ lower, the Conversion Loan at $79\frac{3}{4}$ is 1 1-16 down, while Fundings are $\frac{3}{4}$ down at $2\frac{1}{4}$. Indian stocks are lower all round. The Three per Cent. Loan at $59\frac{1}{2}$ is $\frac{3}{8}$ lower, the Five and a-Half per Cent. Loan at 103 is also $\frac{3}{8}$ down, while the Seven per Cent. Loan at 119 has shed $\frac{3}{4}$. Some irregularity has been in evidence in the market for Foreign Government securities, though, in view of the lack of support, prices have kept up fairly well. French stocks are slightly lower, War Loan Fives at 29 being $\frac{1}{4}$ down, while the Four per Cents. are also $\frac{1}{4}$ down at 23. German Three per Cents. are again 1s. down at 13s., but Italian Rentes are unchanged at $22\frac{1}{2}$. In Near Eastern securities Turkish Unified have been fairly firm, and at 26 are $\frac{3}{8}$ up. Greek Monopolies have been a good spot, and close at $42\frac{1}{2}$, a gain on the week of 2, and they have been higher. Czecho-Slovak Eight per Cents. are $\frac{1}{2}$ down at $93\frac{1}{2}$, while the New Roumanian Loan is $1\frac{1}{4}$ discount.

Industrials Dull.

A very quiet and dull tone has ruled in the Industrial group, and prices have tended to ease off in many directions. Business, as usual in such conditions, has been on a very restricted scale, though there has been a certain amount of liquidation going on in some sections. There have been a few good features, and this market generally should be among the first to recover on any improvement in conditions.

Textiles have been very heavy. Coats have shed 6d. at 69s., while Courtaulds are 4s. lower at 68s. Iron and Steel shares have displayed an uncertain tendency. Vickers are 9d. down at 15s. 6d., Armstrongs at 18s. 9d. are 1s. 3d. lower, while Guest Keens are 1s. 9d. down at 42s. Tobaccos have been variable. Bats at 93s. are 1s. 6d. lower, while Imperial Tobaccos at 87s. are 4s. 6d. up.

Shipping securities have been fairly steady. P. and O. Deferred at 332 are 3 lower, Cunards are 1s. 3d. down at 20s., while Furness Withys are 6d. up at 36s. 3d. In Bank shares Chartered at 19 11-16 are 5-16 lower, National of India are $\frac{3}{4}$ down at $46\frac{3}{4}$, Imperial of Persia are unchanged at $7\frac{1}{4}$, Bank of British West Africa are 1-16 up at 5, while Westminster are unaltered at 18 11-16.

Oils Quiet.

The Oil market has been very quiet, the foreign political situation having the effect of restricting business, while a certain amount of liquidation has reduced values in a few directions. Anglo-Persian Ord. are unchanged at 4, while Burmahs at $5\frac{1}{4}$ are 5-32 down. Lobitos at 6 23-32 have shed 5-32, Mexican Eagles at $1\frac{1}{8}$ are 1-16 down, while Shell Transport at $4\frac{1}{8}$ are 1-32 up. Among Egyptians Anglo-Egyptian B at 1 17-32 are 1-32 down. In the Roumanian group, Phoenix at $1\frac{1}{4}$ are 1-16 down, Dacia Romanos at 31-32 are 1-16 down, Steaua Romanas are 3d. down at 8s. 6d., while Hamilton's Concessions are unchanged at 1s. 9d.

CZECHOSLOVAK COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

The commercial treaty between Czecho-Slovakia and Spain is to be revised at an early date, as is also that with Italy. A draft preliminary treaty with Norway has been drawn up, and will probably be signed in the course of this month. The treaty with England, which is still in the negotiation stage, will be based upon the most-favoured-nation clause, and will apply equally to the British colonies. The commercial treaty with Japan will be signed before long.

Material is also being prepared with a view to the conclusion of treaties with Belgium, Austria, and Denmark. The treaty with Holland will be presented to Parliament for ratification in the course of the present session. A preliminary protocol regulating exports to and imports from Hungary was signed last month, and will remain in force till the conclusion of a definite treaty.

A commercial treaty based upon the most-favoured-nation clause and upon general principles of reciprocity has been concluded between Czecho-Slovakia and Lithuania. The twenty clauses of the treaty, which follow the lines of the treaty concluded with Latvia, regulate the legal statute of individuals and companies in respect of trade, and deal with facilities for commercial travellers, questions of taxation, customs and similar fees, consular representation, communications and navigation.

FOREIGN EXCHANGES.

Sharp Rise in Drachmae.

The foreign exchanges have been rather irregular during the week. German marks have again fallen away, and at 210,000 are a trifle of 40,500 lower on the week. French francs, Belgian francs, and Italian lire have been quite steady. The feature of the Near Eastern exchanges has been the sudden rise of Greek drachmae, which at 235 are 95 points better on the week. Apart from this there have been no very notable changes. Roumanian lei have improved to 960, while Bulgarian leva are stronger at 570.

LONDON PRODUCE REPORT.

Good Business in Oranges.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday morning.

Sugar.—Home refined has been in fair demand. Tate's cubes are unaltered at 71s. 9d.; Lyle's granulated remains at 66s. 4½d.; while London granulated is unchanged at 66s. 1½d. Foreign descriptions have been steady. West Indian crystallised is unaltered at 61s. 3d., while white Java is 6d. up at 62s. 3d. Futures are:—August, 33s. 8d.; December, 27s.

Coffee.—A steady tone has prevailed. East Indian remains at 112s., Costa Rica is unchanged at 108s., Nairobi is unaltered at 93s., while Santos is the same at 73s.

Rice.—The market has been quiet. The demand for Spanish Japan has eased off, and quotations are lower on balance. In view of the general position it is unlikely that this tendency will continue.

Green Fruit.—Oranges have continued in excellent request, and the market has hardened appreciably. Quotations are:—Jaffas, 18s. 6d. box (144's); Denias and Valencias, 23s. to 50s. box (240's to 504's). A marked demand developed during the week for lemons, and prices have risen. Quotations are:—12s. 6d. to 22s. 6d. box (300's); 25s. to 42s. 6d. case (300's). The quality of the apples offered leaves nothing to be desired, and with an excellent demand the tendency of the market is to firmness. The demand for Egyptian onions noted in previous weeks continues to be well maintained.

Dried Fruit.—On the whole, good business has again been done in this market. The supply of currants available is very small, and the prices of this commodity are again harder. The demand for sultanas has eased off somewhat, but the market remains very firm owing to the short supply. Plums have been a strong spot, and the business done in all grades of this commodity has been a feature of the week. Almonds are in increasing request.

Oilseeds.—Linseed has been variable, but is closing harder, and Indian at 20s. 10½d. is 4d. up, while La Plata is 1½d. down at 19s. 1½d. Rapeseed has been weak, with Toria 4½d. down at 17s. 9d., and real bold Ferozapore 4½d. lower at 16s. 4½d. Cottonseed has been quiet. Indian is 1½d. down at 9s. 9d., Egyptian black is unchanged at 12s. 7½d., while Sakellarides is 4½d. down at 11s. 4½d.

Oils.—Linseed has been fairly steady, and at 46s. is 1s. down. Rape oil has been weak, crude being 1s. down at 44s., while technical refined is also 1s. down at 47s. Cotton oil has been dull. Refined common edible is unchanged at 47s., Egyptian crude remains at 43s., technical is unaltered at 46s., while deodorised is the same at 49s.

Oil Cakes.—The position is practically unchanged. Linseed cake remains at 210s., cotton meal cake is unaltered at 220s., coconut cake is the same at 140s., while cottonseed cake is 10s. up at 120s.

The Moniteur du Petrole Roumain reports that the position of the oil industry has been unchanged during the first half of the past month, the production being steady from 430 to 440 wagons per day. The output of crude petroleum in Roumania during the three months ended March 31 this year amounted to 381,421 tons, as against 321,826 tons for the corresponding period of 1922.

EGYPTIAN CROPS.

The bulletin of the Egyptian Ministry of Agriculture gives the following particulars of crop conditions in April:—

Cotton.—During the month under review, weather conditions were, on the whole, most unfavourable to cotton. Cold spells and wind have considerably retarded, and in some cases completely checked, the germination and growth of seedlings, necessitating a fairly large amount of resowing. Some early sown fields have had to be resown two or three times. Sowing has almost been completed. Very slight attacks of cut-worm, soreshin, wilt, and aphids were reported from some districts in Lower and Middle Egypt.

Wheat.—The condition of this crop has slightly improved since last month. Harvesting has already commenced in early sown crop, and is expected to be general early in May. Slight attacks of rust, smut, eel-worm (Tylenchus), and Pseudomonas tritici were reported. The yield is expected to be slightly above average.

Barley.—Harvesting has almost been completed in Middle and Upper Egypt, and is progressing in other provinces. The yield is expected to be slightly above normal.

Beans.—Harvesting has been completed almost everywhere. Owing to the attack of fungus diseases, the condition of the crop has very slightly declined since last month's bulletin was issued.

Lentils.—Harvesting was completed during the month under review. The yield is much below the average.

Helba.—Harvesting has almost been completed. The yield is below average.

Onions.—The condition of the crop is the same as last month. The harvesting is slow, owing probably to low prices prevailing. Since March 1 and up to April 28 the total arrivals at Alexandria amounted to only 175,000 kantars, as against 606,000 kantars during the same period last year.

Sugar-cane.—The weather was generally favourable, and the water supply on the whole ample, though not quite satisfactory in some localities. Cutting for factories will have finished early in May. Most of the new crop has already been sown.

Bersim.—The condition of the crop has very slightly improved. The last cutting is being taken.

ADVANCE IN RAW FUR PRICES.

The report of the London Fur Trade Association on the April-May raw fur skin sales states:—The annual spring sales terminated on May 7, and were characterised by a very crowded attendance of buyers from almost all countries. The demand for nearly all articles was extremely brisk, and the home trade was evidently anxious to secure supplies even at advanced prices. America and France bought large quantities, Belgium and Italy more than for some time past, and the Germans, although cautious, made large purchases. The result was that all the more fashionable furs advanced in price, and in some cases very considerably. Values being now stabilised for several months ahead the operations of the trade generally should tend to broaden out. The comparison of prices is with those of January last. American badger advanced 20 per cent.; Russian badger unaltered; black bear advanced 30 per cent.; brown bear advanced 30 per cent.; grizzly bear declined 25 per cent.; white bear unaltered; beaver advanced 5 per cent.; civet cat advanced 30 per cent.; chinchilla unaltered; ermine unaltered; fisher advanced 10 per cent.; fitch unaltered; blue fox advanced 25 per cent.; cross fox advanced 10 per cent.; grey fox advanced 20 per cent.; red fox advanced 20 per cent.; silver fox, very few good skins, which advanced 10 per cent.—poorer sorts 20 per cent. dearer; white fox unaltered; South American fox, poor collection, rather lower; white hare mostly withdrawn, prices unaltered; kolinsky firm at old prices; Persian lamb advanced 10 per cent.; broadtail lamb advanced 20 per cent.; lynx advanced 15 per cent.; American marten declined 10 per cent.; baum marten unaltered; stone marten declined 10 per cent.; mink advanced fully 30 per cent.; mole declined 15 per cent.; monkey declined 25 per cent.; black musquash advanced 10 per cent.; brown musquash advanced 15 per cent.; southern musquash unaltered; nutria unaltered; American opossum advanced 20 per cent.; otter advanced 20 per cent.; raccoon advanced 10 per cent. to 15 per cent.; Russian sable mostly withdrawn, few sold at slightly easier prices; skunk advanced on average 5 per cent. to 10 per cent.; squirrel advanced 10 per cent.; wolf, better sorts advanced 5 per cent., other kinds advanced 20 per cent.; wolverine advanced 10 per cent.; fur seals unaltered. Australian Furs.—Red Australian fox advanced 30 per cent. to 35 per cent.; Australian opossum advanced 5 per cent. to 10 per cent.;

wallaby furriers last prices, tanners declined 20 per cent. Chinese and Japanese Furs.—Civet cat, no demand, all withdrawn; red fox advanced 20 per cent.; goat rugs, very few sold at 10 per cent. decline; black goat skins, poor collection, declined 10 per cent.; grey goat skins, poor collection, unaltered; white goat skins unaltered; kid crosses and kid skins, a very small offering, prices unaltered; kolinsky mostly unsold, about last prices; slink lamb mostly unsold, declined 10 per cent.; Thibet lamb skins advanced 10 per cent.; Thibet lamb, robes and crosses, unaltered; leopard unaltered; marmot advanced 5 per cent.; mink or weasel (Chinese) unaltered; pahmi advanced 10 per cent.; white rabbit unaltered; raccoon all withdrawn, no demand; wolf, too few to quote; Japanese badger unaltered; Japanese fox best grades unaltered, lower sorts declined 12½ per cent.; Japanese marten unaltered, mostly withdrawn; Japanese mink mostly withdrawn, values unaltered; flying squirrel sold at high rates.

CATTLE DISEASE IN IRAK.

The following particulars are taken from the report of the Civil Veterinary Department, Irak, for February, which has just been received:—

Rinderpest "Abu Hadlan."—Outbreaks of this disease were widespread during the month. In the North Gate Dairy Farm, Baghdad, a few suspicious deaths of cattle took place. Although no clinical symptoms were visible, the result of post-mortem examination revealed the existence of rinderpest. All the cattle were inoculated, and mortality ceased. Only one cow died after inoculation, and a post-mortem confirmed that the animal was suffering from an acute attack of the disease. There were five casualties prior to inoculation.

The Medical Officer of Health, Basrah, reported that rinderpest had been prevalent in or near Abadan (Persia). As there was the possibility of this disease finding its way into Irak, an officer of this department visited the places lying on the Abadan-Basrah route to ascertain the existence of the disease or not. It is satisfactory that the Liwa was found entirely free. However, to obviate any possibilities of the disease filtering into Irak by animal trade, the Mutasarriif of Basrah was advised to issue instructions to all concerned of the threatened danger and the responsibilities of the people in the event of non-observance of the orders.

In the Liwa of Mosul, Nahiya Sulaifani, District Zakho, the disease continued to prevail, and it would have inflicted a serious loss on the stock owners but for the energetic action of the Civil Veterinary Officer, Mosul; 379 head of cattle were inoculated, and the sick ones treated with success. Diyala Liwa has again been visited with another outbreak. The affected localities were the village of Khalaf-Enzan and its environs. 387 head of cattle were saved by preventative inoculation, and the immediate risk of the disease spreading was eliminated. Twenty-three head died before veterinary aid could be rendered.

Report of cattle disease was received from Kirkuk. The veterinary officer who was detailed there discovered that rinderpest had been prevalent for a very long time. It need not be wondered that 248 deaths took place before his arrival. The localities affected were different parts of Nahiya of Tauq and Malha; 490 head of cattle were immunised against the disease. Nothing more can be expected until the necessity of prompt reporting and the benefits of inoculation are realised by the stock owners and the expansion of the veterinary service is undertaken.

An outbreak of hodel—as the people of Amara Liwa name rinderpest—was attended to in the villages of Sudan and Et-Fraijawi, on the Chahalal Canal; 550 head of cattle were inoculated with serum. Ten deaths took place before inoculation. It is noteworthy here that this outbreak was not reported, but was detected by the veterinary officer while on tour. If he had not visited the area it is highly probable that the people would not have invited veterinary assistance. In 1922 this locality was infected with the same disease. The people then made a determined stand not to have their herds inoculated, and when they were told that such opposition was punishable by the laws of the country a reluctant compromise was reached, but only a few cattle could be inoculated. The submission of the people this year may be due to their past sad experience, and it is hoped that the beneficial result of inoculation will produce a lasting effect.

In the town of Hilla and the villages of Querish, Jum-Jumah, and Ataij, 674 head of cattle were inoculated and immunised. The number of casualties before inoculation was five.

TURKEY'S TRADE IN 1922.

The following extracts are taken from a report from the office of the British Commercial Secretary, Constantinople, on Turkey's foreign trade in 1922:—

The statistics prepared by the Constantinople Customs Houses, which showed a decline in import values in 1921 as compared with the previous year, mark a further decrease in 1922, the total imports into Constantinople having decreased from £T85,258,260 during the first nine months of 1921 to £T59,341,571 for the corresponding period of 1922. Exports of native produce, on the other hand, show an increase in value from £T9,841,109 in 1921 to £T23,254,327 in 1922, and the adverse balance of trade has been reduced from £T75,417,151 to £T36,107,244.

Great Britain still heads the list of exporting countries, although her exports to Turkey declined from £T17,495,269 in January-September, 1921, to £T9,779,109 in the corresponding period of 1922. This decline is principally due to the lack of demand for textiles resulting from the state of war in Anatolia, and the further diminution of trade with South Russia. Imports of merchandise from the United States, which follow close behind those of Great Britain, decreased in value from £T13,168,920 in the first nine months of 1921 to £T9,724,877 in January-September, 1922. The United States' principal exports were, as in 1921, wheat, flour, petroleum, and cabots, and, as Constantinople is entirely dependent on foreign countries for these necessities, the United States' trade was not so adversely affected as Great Britain's as a result of the unfavourable political situation in the Near East. The recent quintuplement of the flour duties has had a very detrimental effect on the United States' flour trade with Turkey, and it is probable that, provided Bulgaria and Roumania can continue their present supplies, the United States' exports to Turkey will decline still further.

A notable feature is the increase in imports from Germany, which rose from £T369,219 in January-September, 1921, to £T4,242,556 in the same period of 1922. It is true, of course, that a considerable portion of the imports from the Netherlands in 1921, amounting in value to £T5,159,166, were in reality of German origin, but the sharp increase last year in German exports is nevertheless most marked. Germany has specialised principally in photographic apparatus and accessories, electrical machinery of all kinds, haberdashery, spirit lamps and stoves, hardware and agricultural implements and tools. Imports from France decreased in value during the nine months reviewed from £T9,136,079 to £T4,564,983, and a further shrinkage must be looked for since the introduction of the Customs regime which prohibits the importation of alcoholic beverages and discriminates against luxury articles in which France is particularly interested.

The imports of cotton textiles show a decrease in value from £T20,035,737 during the first nine months of 1921 to £T9,263,355 in the same period of 1922, and this is the chief factor in explanation of the serious decline in Great Britain's trade with Turkey. In addition, imports of woollen textiles dropped in value from £T7,167,828 to £T3,148,169. This phase is, however, only temporary, and it is probable that conditions will greatly improve after the conclusion of peace.

The marked increase in the value of exports is somewhat difficult to explain, as a state of war continued in Anatolia throughout the whole of this period, and neither in the Greek area of occupation nor in the Turkish area was there any systematic effort made to restore production and agriculture, and, in fact, producers were greatly discouraged owing to the unsettled conditions and the heavy requisitions made by both combatants. The increase is partially due, however, to the decline in the value of the lira, and marked advances in prices on the European and American markets of Turkey's chief exports also contributed. The demand from abroad, particularly for tobacco, mohair, opium, and silk, was especially heavy, and this led to the export not only of the season's normal output, but of all accumulated stocks in addition. Exports of Turkish tobacco increased in value from £T2,359,813 to £T4,936,778, the United States and Great Britain being the chief purchasers of higher grade qualities, Germany a heavy buyer of the lower grades, and Egypt, the Netherlands, and Italy also large purchasers.

Owing to lack of adequate communication with the interior it is extremely difficult to obtain any reliable appreciation of the present situation in regard to Turkish agriculture and production, but the large areas of land wasted during the Greek retreat and the exodus of the Greek and Armenian fruit, vine, and silk growers must have a very unfavourable effect on the immediate future.

Cotton and Cotton Goods.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Very Weak.

The Commercial Company of Egypt, in their report for the week ended May 4, state:—

Since our last report the futures market has been very weak. The factors which have contributed to this week's drop are: the severe reaction in the New York market, the scarcity of fresh orders from spinners and, finally, the heavy end-of-the-season arrivals from up-country. Little business has been passing and operations have been principally confined to transfers, mostly May to July, with a little speculative short selling. The declines for both Sakellarides and Ashmouni have been about equal; we consider the present difference between these two varieties very small and do not think a further narrowing probable. Up to yesterday Egyptian in Liverpool remained relatively firm, due, as for the past two weeks, to the fairly large daily spot sales and the consequent buying back of hedges in that market; at to-day's close, however, a severe break occurred on "stop loss" orders for account of Continental interests. The arrivals from up-country have been unexpectedly heavy this week, and the total since September 1 now exceeds 6,500 000 krs. Stocks show a slight increase and stand at 1,771,275 krs., against 1,723,819 krs. a week ago and 2,209,913 krs. last year.

Spot.—The Minet el Bassal market has been rather quiet this week, and sales amount to about 4,900 bales, of which we estimate 3,400 bales Sakel., 1,450 bales Uppers, 50 bales Brown, and a few bales of White. In spite of the sharp drop in contracts there is no pressure by holders to sell, and in many cases cotton has been withdrawn from the market.

Sakellarides.—All styles have been dealt in, but the medium and lower grades have predominated. With a rapidly falling contract market and many sellers withdrawing their cotton or refusing to follow the drop, it is difficult accurately to give the prices of spot against contracts.

Uppers.—Here again all styles have been dealt in. The same remarks as above with regard to prices apply equally here.

Brown and White.—A small business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are somewhat dearer than last week.

Crop 1923.—The weather has improved during the last few days, but a good long spell of normal conditions is necessary in order that the plant may recover the initial delay.

The report of the Alexandria General Produce Association for April reads as follows, and confirms almost to the letter the information which has been given in our recent reports.

Lower Egypt.—The favourable temperature which prevailed during February encouraged cultivators to sow their lands earlier than usual. Resowing has been necessary on a large scale, and in many cases two or three times. The area planted seems to be equal to that of last year. In several districts in the southern parts of the Delta more Zagora has been planted than last year. Pilon and white varieties also show a slight increase, all at the expense of Sakellarides. This latter variety, however, predominates, and is responsible for 80 to 85 per cent. of the area sown. Influenced by the unfavourable temperature—cold winds and damp nights—germination has suffered, and the young plants are distinctly backward in their development. Water for irrigation purposes is sufficient.

Upper Egypt.—Favoured by good weather, sowing has taken place several days in advance of the usual period. Resowing has been insignificant. The area planted is equal, if not superior, to that of last year. Zagora has been sown mainly, Ashmouni having been sown in much smaller quantities. The condition of the young plants is satisfactory. Water is sufficient.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Good Inquiry for Sudan Cotton.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended May 9:—

The week opened with a further decline in futures, which was intensified last Friday, when a drop of nearly a penny a pound was registered. This was not exactly an encouraging start, and it would not have been surprising if buyers had fought shy of our market. The reverse, however, proved to be the case, and during the last day or two, despite further declines, a growing feeling has become apparent that the bottom has been touched. Some steady buying has taken place, with the result that the week's sales have amounted to a very respectable total. The buying power has not always been represented in the daily inquiry, and it is probable that a certain amount of speculative buying has occurred, but on the whole there is no doubt that the greater part has been booked by the trade itself.

Generally speaking, spot prices have fought hard against the downward tendency displayed by futures, but yesterday the official quotations were reduced 75 points, the largest one-day reduction we have witnessed for a long time. As is usually the case on any marked decline, prices are now very irregular, but at the moment the tendency is for the basis to harden again, although quotations to-day were unchanged officially. Liverpool is still cheaper than Alexandria, but as time goes on it becomes more apparent that the "cheap" cotton, which at present is held in bulk by two or three firms only, will become less cheap.

F.G.F. Sakellaridis can be bought here to-day at 60 points on July contracts, or about 15.15d., and a fair business has taken place. Yesterday a line of 600 bales Uppers (F.G.F.) was reported to have been taken by the trade at the remarkably low price of 14½d. per lb. There has been quite an eager inquiry for Sudan cotton, but very little new crop is yet available. An improved business has taken place, nevertheless, and granted reasonable prices it seems likely that the early shipments now on their way should find a ready market here. Low cotton, down to 5d., has been in request and a moderate business has resulted. In c.i.f. business there has been rather more doing; in fact, there was a rumour current yesterday in Manchester that a considerable amount of business had been done on these terms.

Forwardings to spinners for week ending the 4th inst. were returned as 6,504 bales. Total sales, 5,300 bales (including 470 Sudan). Quotations of Sakellaridis are reduced to 135 points, with "Fair" exceptionally 125 points lower. Brown and Upper are reduced to 125 points. Fully Good Fair Sakellaridis to-day, 15.40d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Depression Continues.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended May 12 states:—

The depression in general trade reported last week continues, and the opinions of those who thought that the market had seen the worst are being falsified by the actual conditions prevailing. The further slump in raw cotton, both American and Egyptian, has justified the lack of confidence felt by those who refused to be influenced by the stiffer attitude which sellers adopted when American cotton was recovering last month. Satisfaction is expressed that a wages agreement has just been concluded with the cotton operatives. There is to be no change in the standard rates for a further period of nine months, and the workers' leaders have agreed that in any case they will not apply for an advance in wages before September, 1924.

Yarn.—With raw cotton fluctuations such as those reported above, it is not surprising that the yarn market has been very unsettled. Buyers are more than ever inclined to restrict their purchases to the absolute minimum. Whilst these conditions last every effort is being made to prevent an accumulation of stocks, and the policy regarding reduction of output is being rigidly observed. Prices of American yarns in general are ½d. to ¾d. per lb. lower than last week.

Cloth.—It is not unnatural that business should remain extremely quiet in this section. A slight variation from the general dullness may perhaps be mentioned for Egypt and the Levant, both of which markets have given some support for miscellaneous classes of goods. Such modest orders as have actually been booked for India and China are mostly for fancy goods as distinct from regular staple lines. Miscellaneous overseas markets have remained quiet, and the home trade may be best described as "patchy."

Raw Cotton.—As reported above, American cotton has slumped again during the week, with several violent fluctuations. Egyptian cotton has also continued the fall reported last week, the market having been considerably influenced by the acreage under cultivation having proved to be much bigger than was expected in spite of the Government's desire for restriction. Closing prices are as follows:—American fully middling, 14.18d.; Egyptian fully good fair, 15.40d.

Much damage is reported to have been done by forest fires on the hills between Skutari, opposite Constantinople, and the British front in the Ismid peninsula.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS

The following extracts are taken from recent reports received by the Imperial Ottoman Bank:—

Constantinople, April.

Manufactured Goods.—The continued demand from Anatolia and Persia has encouraged our merchants to pass relatively large orders in Europe.

Cabots.—No business with Roumania, which is at present getting supplies from America and Alexandria. Nevertheless, prices are firm, thanks to the demand from Anatolia and Persia.

Empty Sacks from Calcutta.—Owing to the stability in prices traders are maintaining a cautious reserve.

Sugar.—The markets of origin continue to register high prices. Our market is awaiting events. Nevertheless, our merchants have realised rather high profits in selling a portion of their stocks. Prices are everywhere lower than those of the countries of origin. Prices in transit: Crystallised American, £35½ to £36 per ton; Java, £35 to £35½ per ton; Dutch, £36 to £36½ per ton; stock, 1,000 to 1,200 tons.

Cube Sugar.—The same characteristics which we have just noted apply in the case of crystallised sugar. Price in transit £38½ to £39 per ton; stock, 400 to 500 tons.

Coffee.—Fluctuations in prices, more or less accentuated in countries of origin, with a tendency to fall. For lack of an outlet our market stock is about 3,500 sacks, which is being slowly consumed. Prices in transit, 56 to 64 piastres per oke, according to quality.

Rice.—No change in our market, but prices for Saigon have relaxed somewhat at Marseilles. Stock, 250/300 tons. Prices in transit: Rangoon, £15½ per ton; Siam, £15½ to £16 per ton.

Flour.—Prices remain firm, with a tendency to rise. As we had predicted, owing to the difficulties with which our merchants have been met in the importation of flour, the latter have passed large orders for wheat both in America and in the Argentine. Stock, 40,000 to 45,000 sacks.

Teheran, March 3.

During the last two months the price of opium (centre of industry Ispahan) has increased by 100 per cent., owing, it is believed, to heavy demand by China, probably on account of the International Opium Conference now sitting.

Jaffa, April 14.

The orange season is now almost at an end. On the whole, it has been a bad season, and most of the exporters will lose on the year's working.

Nablus, April 14.

The Government has just installed the principal Custom House for the district of Samaria in the place of Tulkeram, which has become the sub-agency. This change is of advantage to Nablus, and makes its market more active.

A deputation of soap manufacturers of Nablus has gone to Egypt this week with a view to examining on the spot the market for soap, and increasing their sales there at better prices. A rise in the price of Nablus soap is expected as a result of this step.

HARBOUR FACILITIES AT TRIPOLI.

The town of Tripoli, although no longer the capital of the Province of Northern Lebanon, remains, by its position and communications with the interior, undiminished in commercial importance (says the British Vice-Consul at Beyrout in a recent report). While Tripoli harbour is not deep enough for vessels of more than 1,000 tons cargo, there is excellent anchorage outside to the north during southerly winds, and a good deep-water anchorage is available during northerly winds. Passenger traffic is limited, most travellers finding it necessary to use Beyrout, situated on the coast, 95 kilometres farther south. Cargo boats can be loaded or discharged at rates varying between 400 and 800 tons per day. The depth of water alongside the quay being only about 10 to 11 ft., most ships discharge into or load from lighters. Ample lighterage, wharf, and storage accommodation exists at the port, and in the Customs and other sheds.

Tripoli enjoys a great advantage over Beyrout as an outlet for the produce of Homs, Hama, Damascus, and Aleppo, and as a distributing centre for the imports from these districts. Being connected by a broad-gauge railway to Homs, on the main line, and Beyrout having only a narrow-gauge railway which connects it with the main line at Rayak, Tripoli can ship the produce of the interior districts without the necessity of having this produce transferred from truck to truck, which is necessary in the case of goods passing through Beyrout. The advantages which should accrue, however, are for the present not enjoyed, owing to the high freight rates ruling on the railway.

REDUCED RATES TO EGYPT.

The London Office of the Italian State Railways and Steamship Lines announces that the Trieste Lloyd Line (Lloyd Triestino), in conjunction with the Marittima Italiana Line, put into force on May 1 for the summer season special reduced rate tickets from London to Alexandria, via Venice and Genoa, of £28 first and £20 10s. second class by their regular fortnightly service to Bombay and monthly sailing to the Far East. Similar rates will apply also in the reverse direction from July 1 to September 30.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Lausanne Conference.

Events at Lausanne during the past week have been overshadowed by the dispute between the Greeks and Turks on the subject of reparations. The original Turkish claim was for one hundred and sixty million Turkish pounds, and when the Greeks countered by advancing their claims for a still larger sum, the Allies proposed that both sides should forgo reparations. To this the Turks would not consent. In February the Greeks proposed that the whole question should be submitted to arbitration; but the Turks would accept arbitration only in regard to the amount that the Greeks should be required to pay. In the meantime the Turkish demand has been raised to £160,000,000 sterling. Greece roundly refuses to pay any indemnity at all, and, under the pressure of public restlessness at home, the Greek Foreign Minister has joined M. Venizelos at Lausanne in an effort to reach finality in the matter. It is feared that, unless the Greek delegation obtains satisfaction from the Turks at Lausanne, or is convinced that the Allies will support to the end their attitude and not the Turks', it will withdraw from the Conference, and that then a renewal of the war between Greeks and Turks will become inevitable.

Greco-Turkish Reparations.

The Allies will be very seriously to blame if they allow the question of reparations as between Greece and Turkey to pass out of their control. In its baldest outline the matter resolves itself into the following issue: The Turks claim reparations as a result of their victory over the Greeks in a war arising from the invasion of Turkish territory by Greek armies; the Greeks maintain that they are unable to pay any indemnity, and, as an offset to the Turkish claim, point out that they are also entitled to an indemnity from the Turks. The matter is, however, complicated by the fact that the war between the Greeks and the Turks arose from the occupation of Smyrna by Greek troops at the request of the Allies. It is true that the latter warned the Greeks at a certain moment that they would accept no responsibility for the consequences in the event of a renewal of hostilities, and that the subsequent advance of the Greeks against Angora was the direct cause of the Greek defeat. But the Allies have a moral responsibility that overrides quibbles and technicalities. The pitting of Greek against Turk was their own ill-omened action, and it is, consequently, their duty to liquidate it; in any case, they cannot allow the dispute to be settled by further hostilities.

The Case for Allied Mediation.

No doubt, Greece is not in a position to hand over any indemnity to Turkey; at the same time, it is not unnatural on the part of the Turks to attempt to keep their campaign with the Greeks distinct from the War against the Allies, and to demand reparation for damage done during the campaign. Moreover, there is something to be said for inculcating once and for all upon the Balkan States that promiscuous destruction of life and property which cannot be strictly justified by military necessity is an expensive indulgence. In all the circumstances, therefore, the only course for the Allies to adopt is to exercise pressure on the two disputants and to compel them by whatever means may be available to accept arbitration, the Turks having the assurance that their legitimate claims will receive dispassionate attention, and the Greeks knowing that, if they have to make good some of the wilful destruction that is attributed to their troops or to Greek irregulars in Asia Minor, they will be assisted by the Allies. That any claims that they may be able to bring against the Turks will also be carefully considered goes without saying. The whole question should be treated as outside the issue between the Allies and the Turks, and should not, therefore, be allowed to hold up the negotiations for the Treaty of Peace. The Treaty should embody a settlement of the Greco-Turkish question, but need not necessarily contain a reference to the precise amount of money that is to pass between Greece and Turkey in connection with that settlement.

Other Questions at Lausanne.

For the rest, the negotiations at Lausanne continue to confirm the supposition that the Turkish delegation still regards time as a useful ally. Whether it is that the Turkish elections play a part in the Nationalist plan of campaign, or whether some hopes are being built upon the separate negotiations between nationals of the Allied countries and the Turkish Government is not clear. In regard to the separate negotiations, the Turks, wittingly or unwittingly, are giving evidence of the wide gulf that divides them from European standards. They refused to allow the negotiations to be held in Constantinople, and insisted upon the business representatives going to Angora. There was neither reason nor justification for this step, and the stupidity of it has been exemplified by the fact that the arrival of the Allied business men in Angora has had to be postponed by the Turks because they have been unable to provide accommodation for them. Acts such as these, taken together with childish attempts to presume upon the Allies' ignorance in the Lausanne negotiations with a view to securing inequitable advantages, suggest that all Turkish shortcomings cannot be attributed to the backwoodsmen of Anatolia, but are representative of the highest standard of intelligence that Angora has so far produced.

The Anatolian Railways.

An important and welcome development of British interests in Turkey has been effected by the action of a British financial group in acquiring control of the Anatolian Railway. A majority of the shares of this railway (55 per cent., it is understood) were held by a German-Swiss bank, and were mortgaged to the debenture holders, who are exclusively Swiss. The potential advantages of holding these shares appear to have been appreciated in several quarters, and the British group has merely forestalled their purchase by one or other of a number of rival competitors. This particular group has been in existence for three years, and until last February formed with French and Italian groups the Société Tripartite d'Etudes. It then resolved to recover freedom of action for itself, with the satisfactory result that has now to be recorded. Both the French and the Italian group, however, have been informed that future co-operation will readily be considered. The importance of the transaction lies in the fact that British control will have been secured for the purpose of railway development in Asia Minor, to the consequent benefit of Turkey. The Anatolian Railway comprises the line from Haidar Pasha to Konia, with the Eskishehir-Angora branch. A considerable sum of money will have to be spent upon it if it is to be placed in satisfactory working order, and efficient management, under British auspices, offers the best security for the outlay. It is of interest to note that the report of the new control of the line has been received with considerable satisfaction in Angora.

Arab Independence.

It is generally agreed that the settlement of the Middle East is linked up with British pledges to the Arabs in the person of King Hussein of the Hejaz, and there is a tendency to take it for granted that these pledges are of such a nature that, in the face of other undertakings, they effectually rule a settlement out of court. Clearly, however, the one man who can throw most light on the pledges in question is King Hussein himself, and if he feels inclined to consolidate, as it were, the different promises made to him in a workable agreement that provides a reasonable settlement for the Arab world, no one can feel aggrieved. This, we may infer, is the purpose behind the negotiations that have recently taken place between the British Government and Dr. Naji el Assil, King Hussein's representative. As is known, a draft treaty was drawn up in London and was recently taken by Dr. Naji el Assil to Mecca. It would seem that King Hussein is so satisfied with this document that he has decided that, when its contents were made known, Bairam shall henceforth be recognised as the feast of the independence of the "Arabic nation." In the meantime the Emir Abdullah has been informed that Great Britain will recognise an independent Government of Transjordan, provided that such Government is constitutional and enables Great Britain to fulfil her international obligations by means of an agreement to be concluded between the two countries. The stipulation presumably covers reference to the League of Nations.

The Prospects of Arab Union.

One of the points in the Treaty with Great Britain on which King Hussein lays special stress in a message to the Moslem-Christian Association of Palestine is that Great Britain promises her active assistance for general Arab unity in Irak, Palestine, Transjordan, and the States in Arabia, except Aden. Arab unity depends entirely on the Arabs themselves, although in the early stages towards this goal British help may prove useful, particularly in connection with the Emir Ibn Saoud, whose relations with neighbouring States have not been in the past very cordial. This ruler is now on satisfactory terms with Irak as a result of the good offices of Sir Percy Cox. The report that King Faisal is about to visit the Emir Abdullah in Transjordan indicates that any friction or misunderstanding that has existed hitherto between the two brothers is to be removed. Thus the foundation for a working agreement between the chief Arab States has already been completed, and it should not prove impossible to erect a permanent edifice upon it. The Arab world, however, includes Palestine, and the action of King Hussein in sending a special message to the Moslem-Christian Association shows that Palestine has not been left out of the picture by the British-Arab Treaty.

The Palestine Problem.

In the course of a striking address on Palestine, of which a summary is given on another page, Sir Wyndham Deedes suggested that the realisation of the Arab ideal of a great federation of Arab States should simplify the Jewish-Arab problem. He does not admit that the true ideals of the two peoples are irreconcilable. Arab hostility is due more to apprehension than to actuality, and he hoped that what now appears to the Arabs as a Jewish menace would assume less formidable proportions in their eyes when it was found that the Jewish ideal concerned itself with a small portion of a single State in the Arab Federation. As it is of vital interest to the British Government to have the relations between Jews and Arabs placed on a satisfactory footing, it is to be hoped that the present opportunity afforded by the negotiations with the Hejaz and Transjordan will be used for a settlement of the Palestine question as a whole. The leaders of the Arab movement are to be found in the Moslem-Christian Association; but it may be doubted whether any single member of that body considers himself to occupy a strong enough position to justify an independent attitude. For this reason it would be well if the Arabs could look to a single leader, be it the Emir Abdullah or another, who would have the courage of his convictions and would openly support a policy offering some solution of the Palestine problem rather than the purely negative policy which the Moslem-Christian Association has felt obliged to adopt. The Balfour Declaration is not going to be repealed; but it does not carry the interpretation placed upon it by Zionist extremists, and it should not pass the wit of the Arabs to discover how it can be made to fit in with the realisation of their own aims. Irak has no wish to be rid of the Jews in its midst, and Transjordan, which has none, is known to be anxious to secure Jewish co-operation. The Palestine Arabs, therefore, should not find their good fortune in commanding the special solicitude of the Jewish world an insuperable obstacle to their welfare.

Middle East Communications.

An important development of the communications of the Middle East is promised in the autumn with the opening of a weekly motor service between Haifa and Baghdad. The project is in the hands of the Nairn Transport Corporation, which for the last year has been responsible for the mail between Syria and Egypt. A contract, it is stated, has been signed with the Irak Post Office for the delivery of mail-bags at Port Said within sixty hours of the time of departure from Baghdad. If this be correct, it will say much for the efficiency of a service, covering 590 miles of desert between Damascus and Baghdad, that finds it unnecessary to leave more than a few hours' margin for contingencies. Other proposals for linking Baghdad with Palestine have been made since the fortnightly air-mail between Cairo and Baghdad started the "conquest" of the Arabian Desert; but the difficulty of making the undertaking a commercial success has prevented them from materialising. The new scheme, it is to be hoped, will receive sufficient support to ensure its rapid development.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

Whitsuntide.

In the Whitsuntide weather there was not much fun until Monday, at all events near London, though the capital, of course, overcame the sunless gloom and emptied itself upon the country. One did not see many people without mackintoshes or games where the players went unsweated. But to-day some sort of grudging apology was made, and as the sun trickled tantalisingly through it brought the townsfolk out literally in their thousands. The advantage now taken of holidays is quite one of the features of our time; whereas before the War many were content during week-end holidays merely to rest at home, they to-day are out and about everywhere. Our modern democrats certainly enjoy life in intenser, busier ways than their forefathers used; they have their hectic day, and then at night tranquilly await their transport home. The patience of the queues as they stand for their trams and buses is really a remarkable phenomenon.

The Premier's Resignation.

Whitsun, as I say, emptied London, so that the news this morning of Mr. Bonar Law's resignation fell to some extent on the air. It was expected, because of the precarious state of his health, but no one, I think, expected it so soon, especially as the House was up for the Whitsuntide recess. Some newspapers, especially the more reckless sheets, had been trying to make capital out of rumours of the resignation; only on Saturday, for example, the Daily Chronicle had had a shot at July as the date. So that really both the intelligent and the non-intelligent were taken by surprise. The first thing to be said on this occasion is apparently, to lament the Premier's enforced disappearance; as a whole, the public thinks he had had very bad luck, and is genuinely sorry for him. But with some people such profession of grief is rather a duty than a pleasure, and it is these chiefly who are intriguing on behalf of Mr. Bonar Law's successor. To their own satisfaction, they have boiled the issue down to two names: Lord Curzon and Mr. Baldwin. Personally, I cannot see the first statesman helpfully holding the country from the House of Lords; the second might—he certainly has courage enough.

Mr. Bonar Law has gone down fighting hard, with abundant manifestations of the public's admiration of his struggle. But the odds were rather long against him, and the honesty of his administration could little more prevail against the international and national difficulties than could the trickery of Mr. Lloyd George's. What sort of place in history he will occupy it is rather rash to prophesy—it always is of one whose claims are rather on our hearts than on our heads—but it can scarcely be a prominent one.

Parliamentary Affairs.

The Government got well into the trouble that they must have anticipated over Lord Curzon's Note to the Soviet Government. From practically all sections of opinion opposition was forthcoming, and, in view of the nature of Russia's reply, which in essentials was conciliatory, the Government has virtually had to climb down from the very lofty plane which it had chosen. Lord Curzon has had interviews with M. Krassin, who, incidentally, does not appear to be the back number that several of our anti-Russian papers had made him out, and though nothing has yet been published concerning them, a break with Russia is not now thought probable.

There will be, quite apart from the question of the new Premier, much to occupy Parliament when it reassembles after the Whitsuntide recess. Especially will there be liveliness over the Indemnity Bill for the Home Secretary, for opposition to the preservation of D.O.R.A. in any form is coming from all quarters. It is over this question of the powers of the Executive, probably, that the Die-Hard section of the Administration will have to tread more carefully than anywhere else, because, though the country may stand a certain amount of reaction, it will not in its present mood stand autocracy.

The Broadcasting War.

A pretty little war is being maintained between the Broadcasting Company and certain theatrical and musical interests. These interests have decided definitely to prevent artists from performing for the company, on the ground that, as matters now stand, such performance injures their business. The whole question is an intricate one, because there is not much doubt that, whereas wireless does help some productions in the form of increased numbers of audiences, it does also keep some people away. Generally speaking, however, one is on the side of the broadcasting people, not because they inevitably must win, but because of the nature of the other people's entertainments. Heaven knows that at the moment there is enough cheap and worthless stuff in the programmes of the Broadcasting Company, but one can usually find some jewel among all the dross; while at a ballad concert at Queen's Hall, for instance, one can find literally nothing but sugar. So that of these two commercial institutions choose the less bad.

It is said that one development of all this affair may be the organisation of a body of entertainers working specially for broadcasting. They would have to be artists indeed who could continually put forth their best without contact with humanity. But a new Shakespearean company has actually been formed to produce for wireless alone; it is giving "Twelfth Night" on May 28. Obviously we must face the prospect, and as calmly as possible, of a wireless play with special technique, so that action can be expressed from the dialogue. For there is no limit to the possibilities of the broadcasting invention.

The Walker Cup.

Those Americans have done it again. At St. Andrews on Saturday they snatched from us the Walker Cup, after being, to most appearances, a beaten team. In the foursomes, indeed, they were well beaten, but by the greatest display of what in the papers is called "pertinacity" and everywhere else is called "guts," they were three points up on the singles, and so won the Cup by a point. This team of theirs was a fine, sporting side, who were something besides mere golfers, and though there are tales enough of their strict concentration on the game that they are in this country to play, to the exclusion of other of England's delights, they have certainly won the warmest esteem of the British people.

This amateur golf it was that was followed with the keener interest, and it was in no way as a compensation that in the professional tournament at Headingley H. C. Tolley beat Walter Hagen. Still, one must record the victory, if only to give a handle to those people who love to talk of "the upholding of our national prestige."

Labour v. Tory.

As if in mockery of Mr. Churchill's horrid picture of the Red Spectre and his talk of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald as Premier comes the delightful news that the Labour Party in Parliament have challenged the Tory Party to a cricket match. Details are not yet out, though it is said that Sir Rowland Blades will skipper the Tories. Undoubtedly the match will become historical, and may well be worth seeing for its own sake. One would imagine that the greater skill reposes with the Die-Hards—how often does prowess in games thrive on lack of intelligence! but who knows what wily googlies and stolid defences may not lie under the stupidity of the Labour people?

It is excellent that such a thing is possible, and one rather to be proud of. Probably there is no other country where such fraternisation would be permitted or even dreamed of; assuredly there is no game other than cricket in which to see the fact that human virtues easily outweigh political vices. Perhaps one should hope for a victory for Labour, and the consequent burial of Moscow's hopes in this country.

Imperium in Imperio.

In the report that has just been presented to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland the penetration of the industrial area of North Britain is remarked in somewhat alarming terms. During the last forty years, it appears, the Irish population in Scotland has nearly doubled, and the cry of the preservation of "Scotland for the Scottish race" has already gone forth. It is, moreover, fairly well established that the Scottish and Irish races cannot live happily together; and there is not really much sense in the argument that, whereas years ago Scotsmen were forcibly dumped upon Ulster, the present generation of Irishmen in Scotland are there perfectly lawfully. The problem is, therefore, an actual one. For the Scots still in industrial Scotland who are jealous of their beautiful country one can feel sympathy; but perhaps it is a little doubtful whether such men exist in any large numbers. It is possible to suspect, indeed, that the alarm is chiefly felt among Scots Churchmen.

ALTER EGO.

BULGARIA AND GLADSTONE.

On Saturday morning, the twenty-fifth anniversary of Mr. Gladstone's death, M. Stancioff, the Bulgarian Minister in London, placed, in the name of the Bulgarian Government, a wreath on the Liberal statesman's tomb. The Bulgarian Minister, who was accompanied by Mme. Stancioff and family, said that the ceremony was meant to express the deep and reverent tribute of the Bulgarian people to the memory of the great Gladstone. His name would always be associated with the birth of the Bulgarian State. The grateful Bulgarian people venerated the memory of the British statesman, whose life was consecrated to the noblest purposes, and whose work left such a beneficent influence on the political and social thought of his generation.

Sir Edward Boyle, the hon. secretary of the Balkan Committee, in placing a wreath, on behalf of the Committee, on the tomb, said that not only the Bulgarian people, but also the whole of the peoples of the Balkans, remembered Mr. Gladstone with gratitude.

The Bulgarian Government's wreath was of white lilies and deep red carnations, and bore the following inscription: "To the memory of Gladstone, from the grateful Bulgarian people." Among those present were Lady Boyle, representatives of Lord Morley, of Lord Gladstone, of Lord Fitzmaurice, of the Balkan Committee, and of the Near East Association, the full staff of the Bulgarian Legation, and the Secretary of the National Liberal Club.

Ramadan Party at the Residency.

A very enjoyable evening party was given at the end of last week at the Residency, where Lord and Lady Allenby entertained about fifty religious dignitaries and Ulema. The guests were received in the beautiful garden, which had been very tastefully decorated with Chinese lanterns, and where an excellent cold buffet had been prepared. To help entertain their guests Lord and Lady Allenby had invited a number of Englishmen, proficient in classical Arabic, and the innovation which this Ramadan party constituted proved a tremendous success, if one may judge by the animated manner in which, after the first introductions, the guests conversed amongst themselves and with their hosts, and by the unsolicited expressions of appreciation which have since reached me indirectly.

Bombing Outrages.

Two more outrages were committed this week, both on the same day and at the same hour. In the one instance, as three soldiers were walking down Sharia Nubar—the street leading from the main station to Shepherd's Hotel—two Egyptians placed on the pavement behind them a bomb having a time-fuse. The soldiers, hearing a whirring noise, got clear by the time the bomb exploded. In the other instance a similar bomb was placed by an Egyptian in a tramcar by which British soldiers were travelling, but it went off without injuring any of them. In each instance the bombers managed to make good their escape without, as far as is known, anyone being able to give any description of them.

These two outrages, after this long period of quiet, have come as somewhat of a shock to everyone, particularly as the recent constitutional reforms had seemed to have had generally a calming effect on the whole situation. From the manner in which these attempts were made and from the nature of the bombs used it would, however, appear that the object was more minatory than homicidal. Indeed, the general opinion is that these two attempts were made in order to create the impression that the authorities have not yet laid their hands on the gang responsible for the more recent bombing attempts, and thus set up in the minds of the Military Court an atmosphere more favourable to those who are at present under arrest for their participation in the criminal organisation which has been directing the outrages of the past two years.

A Question of Extradition.

Very slow progress is being made by the authorities in bringing to trial the men accused of the murder of Tewfik Bey Karam, which took place early this year in Alexandria in somewhat brutal circumstances. The delay is, however, not their fault, but is due to the formalities necessary for the extradition of the two men who are Germans, and who managed to make good their escape from Egypt before their connection with the case was ascertained. One of them escaped to India, and the Indian authorities sent him back, but, on arrival, he turned out to be the wrong man, although he bore the same name, and the right man is now on his way here. The second German took refuge in Italy, and the difficulties of the situation have been increased by the fact that the German Government does not recognise the right of the Italian Government to extradite criminals to a foreign country, but insists on their being handed over for trial in Germany. Negotiations have been proceeding in this connection for some time between the Egyptian and the Italian Governments, but it is quite uncertain what the latter's action will be, although qualified authorities are of opinion that the man can be handed over to the Egyptian Courts.

The Ex-Sultan of Turkey.

On Sunday last the ex-Sultan of Turkey arrived at Suez from the Hejaz, where for a short time he had been the guest of King Hussein. He proceeded by special train to Alexandria, where he stayed three days in the villa in the Antoniadès Gardens. The ex-Sultan, who was accompanied by his son and seemed far from well, has left by the Esperia for Genoa en route for Switzerland, where it is said that he intends to take up his residence. During his stay here the ex-Sultan was the guest of King Fuad. He and his entourage persistently refused to receive any correspondents, and all statements reporting interviews with him or any of his suite should be regarded as without foundation.

The Plague Rumours.

There has been much talk during the past few weeks of a plague epidemic in Egypt, but these rumours are very much exaggerated. It must always be remembered that in Eastern countries like Egypt diseases like plague, smallpox, and cholera are always endemic, and that periodically there is an increase in their incidence. This is what has now taken place, and the origin of the alarming rumours which have been telegraphed to Europe is the fact that in two provinces in Upper Egypt there has been a sudden increase in the number of cases of bubonic plague. The Public Health authorities are always on the lookout for such occurrences. The usual steps were at once taken, and the situation is completely under control. There is at the present moment no cause for anxiety, but this local outbreak and the alarm which appears to have been created abroad will have served a useful purpose if they bring home to the Egyptian authorities their responsibility vis-à-vis the world in general, and the absolute necessity for the permanent maintenance of an "epidemic" staff, with a generous leavening of Englishmen to ensure efficiency.

A Thunderstorm.

Cairo was visited this week by a terrific storm, which did a considerable amount of damage. The torrential downpour, which was accompanied by a heavy thunderstorm, completely swamped the lower quarters and the better-class districts as well. All traffic was suspended, and the Metropolitan line to Heliopolis was completely flooded out, and will be unworkable for about a month. A certain amount of damage was done to cultivation in the Delta, but whether and to what extent the cotton crop has suffered it is impossible at present to say.

GREECE.

Athens, May 12.

The Political Situation.

Angry war clouds are once more beginning to darken the blue horizon of Hellas. An admirably trained and well-disciplined army of about 150,000 bayonets is camped on the right banks of the Maritza, and is awaiting but the order to advance. Whether this order will ever be given or not depends entirely on the deliberations at Lausanne, and principally on the future attitude of the Angora delegates. Should Ismet Pasha continue his irreconcilable tactics and thus plunge the Conference into yet another impasse, the Greeks and, more especially, the Commander-in-Chief, General Pangalos, are determined to invade Eastern Thrace.

Greece can no longer stand this state of awful suspense. The enormous expenditure entailed by the maintenance of so large a force, and the upkeep of nearly a million refugees have taxed the country's resources to their very utmost, and each day that goes by increases the financial plight of this unhappy land. The possibility of separate peace negotiations between Greece and Turkey should not be excluded. Greece is not prepared, however, to make any further sacrifices, and any fresh unreasonable demands of the Turks, or another deadlock at Lausanne, would inevitably lead to the resumption of hostilities. M. Alexandris' rather hurried departure for Lausanne is widely commented upon here. Although the true nature of the Foreign Minister's mission is being kept secret, it is generally believed that he is the bearer of very important and concise instructions from the Greek Government to the Hellenic delegation at Lausanne. I hear that the meeting which was held at the offices of the Revolutionary Committee on the eve of M. Alexandris' departure, and at which the chiefs of the army, the navy, and staff were present, was extremely lively owing to the fact that the views of certain members of the Cabinet did not coincide with General Pangalos' rather bellicose ideas. But what caused considerable surprise in Athens was the fact that M. Alexandris was also empowered to represent Greece at the Conference and, if need be, himself sign the peace treaty. This has, naturally, given rise to many wild rumours, one of them being that M. Venizelos, not favouring a fresh war, had announced his intention of withdrawing from the Hellenic delegation, and was being replaced by the Greek Foreign Minister. Whether this rumour has any foundation or not is difficult to say. To those, however, living in Greece it is quite evident that, with the exception of a few fanatical anti-Venizelists, who would rather see Mustapha Kemal in Athens than M. Venizelos back to power, everybody sincerely and honestly trusts that Greece's first delegate at Lausanne will not abandon his country in this hour of need.

America and Greece.

The visit to Greece of Governor Henry J. Allen, of the American State of Kansas, has been one of the interesting events of the past week. Governor Allen, in a semi-official capacity, is making a survey of conditions throughout the Near East, and arrived in Athens after a long tour in Turkey, Asia Minor, South Russia, and the Caucasus. He has the reputation of being one of the foremost orators in America, and his addresses at a variety of public and private functions in Athens more than justified that reputation. The keynote of his addresses was an expression of profound faith in the future of Greece, praise of Greek patriotism, and a belief that the men now in charge of the Government of Greece were actuated by honest and patriotic motives. During his stay here he met and conferred with all shades of public opinion, including the King, as well as the members of the Revolutionary Committee. He made several excursions into the provinces, including a visit to the Cyclades with Colonel Plastiras and three of the members of the Cabinet.

Although Governor Allen gave no definite hint as to the tenor of the report which he will prepare for the American State Department, it is generally believed that he will recommend that the American immigration law be modified so as to make it possible to admit a larger quota of Greek refugees to the United States. It is expected that Governor Allen will make some statement of his observations and conclusions on his arrival in London at the end of this month. His programme includes visits to Syria, Palestine, and Egypt, and he expects to spend several days at Lausanne, where he will meet M. Venizelos.

The Salonika Free Zone.

That veritable Gordian knot—the question of the Serbian free zone at Salonika—is now nearly untied, and Greek official circles are confident that the signing of the treaty is but a question of a few weeks, if not days. In her reply to Serbia's last counter-proposals Greece agreed to the Serbian demand as regards the Customs officials to be employed in the zone, namely, that these be appointed by the Yugoslav Government. On the other hand, however, Greece strongly objected to the appointment of a Serbian harbourmaster, and, although the Serbs declared that that official would in any case be under the orders of the Greek harbourmaster of Salonika, the Greeks maintained that two such officials would be de trop. Serbia finally agreed to this. A few remaining points of a secondary importance will be discussed at Belgrade between the Yugoslav Foreign Minister and M. Alexandris, who will break off his journey at the Serbian capital.

The Drachma.

After remaining in the neighbourhood of 400 to the pound for over four months, the drachma has at last begun to appreciate steadily. A week ago as a result of a small panic caused at the Bourse by the announcement that France was on the verge of declaring war on Turkey the pound in the space of a few hours lost 87 points, dropping from 397 to 310. But when on the following day it was realised that France had no intention of embarking upon a new war in the Near East without sufficient reason, the pound rapidly recovered, reaching 355 drs. This improvement, however, did not last long. The three successive Councils of Ministers, the hurried despatch of M. Alexandris to Lausanne on a "mysterious mission," and the news that the League of Nations had approved of the granting of a loan to Greece, seriously affected the exchange, and the drachma, gaining steadily from five to eight points each day, is now once again quoted at 310 to the pound. Rumours of war have been very persistent since last night, and financial circles maintain that should these prove true and the Greek army cross the Maritza the drachma will improve still further, probably reaching 250. Not a single bank in Athens would buy sterling to-day.

The Refugee Loan.

Colonel James Procter, representing the League of Nations, has arrived in Athens in connection with the proposed international loan to Greece, and in order to ascertain the exact requirements of the country and submit a report to the League Council. Speaking to journalists, Colonel Procter stated that the proposal for the loan was put before the League of Nations by the Belgian delegate, and was seconded by France's representative. The proposal has also the full support of the British delegate. Colonel Procter, who has had a long interview with the Prime Minister, Colonel Gonatas, will forward his report to Geneva in the course of the next few days, and the matter is expected to be discussed at the next meeting of the League of Nations, which will be held on June 25. It is understood that the United States will also contribute towards the raising of the loan, the American Chargé d'Affaires in Athens, Mr. Caffrey, having already left for Geneva in order to talk matters over with Sir Eric Drummond.

PERSIA.

Teheran, March 31.
(Delayed in transmission.)

The Cabinet.

The Cabinet was completed a few days ago. The Ministry of Public Works, which had remained unallotted, has been entrusted to Mokhber es Saltaneh, who was recently Governor-General of Azerbaijan and prior to that Minister of Finance; and the other vacant Ministry, of Posts and Telegraphs, has been filled by the transfer from the Ministry of Finance of Nasr ul Mulk, whose place is taken by Baha ul Mulk. The Prime Minister, Mustaufi el Mumalik, who had also taken the portfolio of the Interior at the formation of the Cabinet, has relinquished this, and Adib es Saltaneh, who has previously held office as Minister of Public Works, has been appointed Acting Minister of the Interior.

A National Exhibition.

Great efforts are being made to encourage home industries in order to improve the economic situation of the country, and a prospectus just issued announces a National Exhibition to be held next September in Teheran with a view to "intensifying the manufacture of national products, to make known the diversity of native industries, and to protect and encourage the merchants and artisans." This Exhibition, which will be open for two months or longer, if it be sufficiently well patronised, will be the first of its kind to be held here, and active steps are being taken by the Minister of Public Instruction, Mohtashem es Saltaneh, who initiated the idea and will be President, to make it a success. The Council of the Exhibition will consist of four advisers, three members of the Ministry of Public Works, Agriculture, and Commerce, four Europeans in the service of the Persian Government, and three merchants. Gold, silver, and bronze medals will be struck and awarded to commemorate this first Persian National Exhibition, at which no articles of foreign origin will be allowed to be exhibited. Machinery for the various industries, however, will be admitted, and, in fact, welcomed, as well as agricultural implements, and will be allowed to be imported free of duty by the Government. The scheme is an ambitious one, and it is to be hoped that it will meet with the success it deserves.

Home Products.

The Bill presented to the Mejliss, making compulsory the wearing by the Army and all Government employees of outer garments and footwear made in the country from native-produced material, has been passed by the Parliament, and comes into force next September, to coincide with the General News.

Business has been practically at a standstill for several days during the recent Norooz holidays on the occasion of the Persian New Year, which commenced on the evening of the 21st instant, and the best part of the following week was devoted to the festivities in this connection. The Shah held a "Salaam" on Thursday, the 22nd, to receive the congratulations of his Ministers of State and other subjects, and the following day he held an audience for members of the Diplomatic Corps.

The Government, at the order of the Shah, is preparing a journey for the Valiahd to Azerbaijan, the province which has always hitherto been the residence of the Crown Princes.

Advices from the Persian representative at Moscow, Mushaver el Mumalik, report the satisfactory progress of the negotiations between the Russian and Persian Commissioners for the conclusion of a commercial treaty, which it is hoped will shortly be signed.

The Government expedition against rebellious Shahseven and Khalkhali chieftains in the region of Ardebil has resulted in the capture of several prisoners and a considerable number of rifles, and the army has thus once more proved its worth for the suppression of internal disturbances.

Plentiful rains have fallen recently throughout the country, and an excellent harvest seems assured.

EASTERN STUDENTS IN ENGLAND.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—I should like to support the admirable suggestion regarding the encouragement of Near and Middle Eastern students in England which you make in your issue of May 17. The example set by other countries is even more striking than you show it to be. In addition to the Afghan students in France, I understand that the French Government have recently founded twelve Bourses a year for Turkish students at French Universities, and about half that number of Bourses in French Lycées. In America, too, a number of Turkish students is being maintained by the generosity of Mr. Charles R. Crane, who will be known to students of Near Eastern affairs as one of the American Commissioners who visited Syria, Palestine, and Constantinople on President Wilson's behalf in 1919.

In England the financial question is more difficult. We are not so rich as America in philanthropic millionaires, and our Universities have not Government funds to draw upon. But it is obvious that we can surmount these financial difficulties if we want to, and, considering the magnitude of our stake in the East, compared with the stake of France or America, it is surely worth our while to make the effort.

There could be no better way of strengthening the personal relations between ourselves and the Oriental peoples; and at the present time, when political relations are peculiarly difficult, individual friendships and understandings become of greater importance than ever. It is arguable, indeed, that political relationships are never stable or enduring unless they are based upon a broad foundation of personal friendships. It is certain, in any case, that when political relationships become precarious, the path of statesmanship lies in promoting these others.—I am, etc.,

ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES IN CYPRUS

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—It now seems that the contemplated administrative changes in the Kyrenia district are not to be of so sweeping a character as at first sight appeared. The post of Commissioner is to be abolished. It may, of course, be maintained that this will effect a saving of, say, £800 a year. The personal influence of such an official, moving about among the people, is an undoubted asset to Government. Recognition of this fact seems to be proved by the memorial presented to the High Commissioner signed by the Muktars, Church and School Committees, Mayors, and by numerous individuals, protesting against the change. On the 6th instant a mass meeting of the inhabitants of the district was held in the town of Kyrenia.

Let it be granted for a moment that the sum of £800 a year will be saved, it is yet not unreasonable to inquire whether that sum could not have been obtained from other sources. There is, for instance, a reserve body of Zaptiehs maintained at considerable expense. The public has a very shrewd suspicion of why it was created, and an equally strong impression that its strength might be reduced without danger to the peace of the island.

To revert: On the assumption that the change was necessary, which is certainly open to argument, it should have been done after consultation with those principally affected, and it should have been done by and with the advice of the Executive Council.—I am, etc.,

GREAT BRITAIN AND PALESTINE.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—The British Government has recognised Irak as fit both to manage its own affairs and to become a member of the League of Nations. But the Arabs of Palestine are certainly as capable as those of Irak for self-government and admission to the League. Their only disqualification, indeed, is that the British Government in 1917 promised their country as a National Home for the Jews. That promise has hitherto deprived the Arabs of Palestine of the representative government and local administrative advantages formerly enjoyed under the Ottoman Empire, and since 1918 has entailed their subjection by British armed force. The Balfour Declaration of November 2, 1917, and the Allied Declaration of November 8, 1918, are self-contradictory. The former has been maintained, while the latter (promising autonomy to the Arabs) has been disregarded. The Balfour Declaration violates the doctrine of "self-determination," to which the Coalition Government adhered, our promises to the Arabs, and the fundamental principles of British justice and government. Because the word of Britain was pledged to an injustice under the dictatorship of Mr. Lloyd George, the present Government need not perpetuate it. Let us terminate that ill-omened pact, or request the League of Nations to relieve us of the Palestine Mandate.—I am, etc.,

A BALKAN LEAGUE.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—To-day, the twenty-fifth anniversary of the death of Mr. Gladstone, the representatives of the Greek and Bulgarian Governments placed wreaths on the tomb of the statesman in Westminster Abbey as a token of gratitude for the efforts made on their behalf by the great Liberal leader. Is it not a suitable moment to express the hope that the directors of the two nations' destinies will make serious and sincere efforts to arrive at a better understanding? That there are many subjects at issue between them cannot, unfortunately, be denied. But the Balkans have so often been plunged into strife by the ambitions of politicians, with so little advantage to their peoples, that one may hope that the new régime in Greece and the Agrarian Government in Bulgaria may realise that permanent friction is only harmful to their best interests. M. Stambolisky's Government has already perceptibly improved the relations between his country with Yugoslavia and Roumania, and if the Greek Government discontinues the oppression by over-zealous subordinates of the Bulgarians in Western Thrace, and makes Bulgaria a generous offer of a corridor to Dedeagatch, we shall see the Balkan League re-established, but not for purposes of aggression. Neither Greece, Yugoslavia, nor Roumania, with their external foes and internal preoccupations, can afford to lack the friendship of Bulgaria. And if the "Little Entente" were so enlarged as to admit both Greece and Bulgaria, the other States would have nothing to fear from Soviet Russia, Turkey, or the "Awakening Magyars." They could then reduce their armies to a more reasonable footing and secure financial solvency and the restoration of their countries' internal position. The present mutual mistrust will only make them what they have been invariably in the past, save in 1912, the catspaws of selfish and unscrupulous Great Powers.—I am, etc.,

THE CLASH OF IDEALS IN PALESTINE

An address on Palestine, under the auspices of the Central Asian Society, was given on May 17 at the Royal United Service Institution by Lieut.-Colonel Sir Wyndham Deedes, D.S.O., until recently Chief Civil Secretary to the Palestine Government. The chair was taken by Lord Carnock. A summary of the address appears on page 531. Interrupting his main thesis of the Palestine ideal, the lecturer dealt with certain specific points which he thought that his audience might wish to raise. He held that there had been no going back by Great Britain on her pledges to the Arabs. With regard to our legal status in Palestine, we were there as the result of conquest and military occupation, the position being subsequently regularised by the mandate. British prestige, in spite of the admitted unpopularity of Zionism, he maintained, stands as high to-day as it did three or four years ago, and this fact was in no small measure due to Sir Herbert Samuel, the High Commissioner. With regard to the statement that the Zionist organisation is the power behind the throne, he asked his audience to accept his assurance, without further amplification, that there was not a word of truth in it. As for the cost of the Palestine Administration, it does not involve the expenditure of one penny by the British Exchequer. Great Britain, however, had to pay for the upkeep of the garrison, now reduced to £1,500,000 per annum. In this connection it might be pointed out that troops would have had to be kept in Palestine, Zionism or no Zionism.

In the subsequent discussion Sir Charles Yate, M.P., said he could not follow the lecturer in his idealism. Not only had the relative importance of the British, Arab, and Jewish points of view in this problem of Palestine been badly observed—Sir Wyndham having dwelt with much the most emphasis upon the Jewish aspect—but the actual character of the Jewish immigrants into Palestine had been mal-described. That these people were not Bolsheviks he could not see; had they not, for example, caused the Jaffa riots and smuggled arms into the country? If the British Administration had been acting in what he thought was the pro-Zionist spirit of the lecturer, then all he could say was "God help the Arabs." Such a policy as this could not possibly lead to the pacification of the Holy Land.

Sir Martin Conway, who has recently returned from Palestine, first of all paid tribute to the work achieved by, and the reputation in Palestine of, Sir Wyndham Deedes as Chief Secretary. He had talked with nearly all the leading Arabs, and they without exception, had nothing but the highest praise for the impartiality of Sir Wyndham. He himself would descend from the lofty plane on which the lecturer had discussed the matter, and would consider it from a geographical point of view. Palestine was, and always must be, the meeting ground of the East and the West; people would continue to come to it, from the East by land, from the West by sea. There such people must live in harmony, and he did not think harmony could be obtained unless some third external power protected and overlooked the place. Through the exigencies of war Great Britain now held that duty and privilege in her keeping.

Miss Broadhurst thought that, despite the excellence of Sir Herbert Samuel's administration in Palestine, nothing could gainsay the fact that we were imposing upon an unwilling people an alien race and cult. Great Britain's mandate had never been formally ratified by the League of Nations, which, indeed, would stultify its own fundamental principle were it to give us such ratification. Our position there was, therefore, illegal and irregular, and the finest government possible could not make it otherwise.

Sir Michael O'Dwyer brought the discussion back to the question of broken pledges to the Arabs. That we had broken them he had no doubt, but to make his point he would rely merely upon the Anglo-French Proclamation of November, 1918, which definitely promised freedom to the Arab peoples.

MUSLIM FESTIVAL AT WOKING.

On May 18, at the Mosque, Woking, the Muslim Festival of Eed-ul-Fitr, marking the end of the month of fast, was observed by Mohammedans. Prayers were said on the lawn near the mosque, and the Imam (Khwaja Kamal-ud-din) gave an address. He said Hindus wanted them to sever relations with the non-Indian Muslim world. He wished the demand came from pure motives, but he thought it came from a sordid political desire to weaken Muslims and manipulate them against the present rule in India. The political aspect in India was entirely new, and not favourable to British rule. The company included Prince Abdul Aziz, Sir A. Ali Baig, and members of the Afghan Legation.

PRIVATE BUSINESS AND PUBLIC FINANCE.

Circumstances have of late brought the business man into closer contact with the administration of the public finances than was usual in the days before the War, when the burden of taxation was comparatively light, and Finance Ministers were content as a rule to exchange compliments with captains of industry at occasional banquets or meetings of a more or less formal character. Adversity, however, brings together strange bed-fellows, and while public officials have gone into business with varying results, business men have been called in to help officials out of the troubles that have come upon them. The contact of these different elements has, as commonly happens, generated both heat and light. At the moment we are not concerned with the former phenomenon, which is of merely temporary interest, but we wish to direct the attention of our readers to the light which has recently been thrown on the difference in standpoint of the two classes, a matter which is of permanent importance to both of them, as well as to the general public. A noteworthy illumination of this difference is to be found in the report of the Inchcape Committee, which was appointed to suggest economies in the Indian budget. The members of the Committee did their work thoroughly, and their report has already served its immediate purpose. It cannot be recommended for general reading, and even to the devotee of blue-books it is an uncommonly tough morsel; but underlying almost every chapter of it is the clash of which we speak, the men of business discovering traces of doctrines and practices hitherto unfamiliar, and testing them by standards which the pure administrator would in many cases describe as irrelevant. At bottom, the difference is a question of time. To make money under modern conditions, it is necessary to concentrate attention on the present and the immediate future; the next balance-sheet is the thing that matters most, and a vision of profit ten years hence is of no interest if a prospect of early bankruptcy intervenes. To take profits and cut losses, to be flexible, to adapt oneself immediately to each successive change of circumstances, these are the qualities which lead most surely to success, and committees of successful business men inevitably look at public enterprises largely from this standpoint. To the administrator, on the other hand, temporary fluctuations are merely nuisances. His eyes are fixed on a distant goal. What would be bankruptcy for a private undertaking is at most an annoying disturbance to his tranquillity. He uses a small-scale map, which shows the road far ahead, but ignores many of the obstacles on the way, and in India, in particular, where the national mentality pushes all doctrines to extremes, this attitude is conspicuous. Standard plans are prepared with such elaboration that they may be obsolete before final sanction is achieved. Administrative codes aim at theoretical completeness, but yet require quarterly supplements. In order to be protected against all possible emergencies, experts determine the average life of every administrative implement, from a clerk to a locomotive, and then perhaps the individual locomotive or the individual clerk is scrapped on reaching the limit appropriate to the class. The whole tendency is to work for an unattainable finality, and to neglect just those circumstances which the business man turns to the most profitable account.

The justice of this contrast may be illustrated from various sections of the Inchcape Report. The most permanently valuable criticism in it is directed towards those administrative departments which work under approximately business conditions, particularly those which deal with the supply of stores. We read of enormous superfluous stocks, with the inevitable wastage and cost of storage, of unnecessary renewals made according to plans fixed long ago, and, speaking generally, of a tendency to look much further ahead than is either necessary or financially wise. The Committee, working in a hurry, may have made technical mistakes in regard to some of these matters; but the general effect of their labours is to bring to light a real and very costly defect in Indian administration, a defect, it may be added, which has a most important bearing on the question of State management of railways. In dealing with research, on the other hand, the drawbacks of the Committee's standpoint are conspicuous. The economies they suggest in this direction are trifling, because the total provision for genuine research is pitifully small, but we gather that the test they applied was "whether India could afford to spend so much." In our judgment the real question is whether India can afford to spend so little, and we will illustrate the difference of standpoint from a branch of science in regard to which the Committee suggested, we think, no reductions. In the middle of the last century Gregor Mendel discovered the facts essential to scientific plant-breeding. His work was temporarily lost to sight, perhaps the greatest economic tragedy of the period; but it was rediscovered in the year 1900, and about 1906 it began to be applied in India. For six or eight years there were no visible results, and perhaps in all a few lakhs of rupees were spent. To-day the direct increase in the annual national income resulting from these experiments is measured by many crores of rupees, or, say, some thousands per cent. on the expenditure incurred in the initial experiments. On these facts it is surely obvious that India could not have afforded to economise on the early work, yet an Economy Committee sitting in 1909 would probably have marked it for retrenchment, just as the Inchcape Committee have recommended the curtailment in other departments of research which has not yet begun to pay. In such matters as these the business man's point of view cannot by itself serve as a safe guide to the Administration, even on its purely financial side. He is at home in the store-yard, but not in the laboratory. He will recognise the value of work which has reached, or is approaching, the remunerative stage, but the men who are responsible for national development must look further ahead, and while, in hard times like the present, they must be prepared to dispense with all luxuries and many comforts, they will be well advised to find, somehow or other, the funds required for the essential preliminary work, tedious and disappointing as it often is, without which the great, cumulative processes of development cannot be set in motion. It could, indeed, be wished that this preliminary work should be undertaken by individuals or private corporations, as has been the practice until recently in England; but where, as in India, this practice has not been established, the State must fill the gap, and in doing so it must take a much longer view than is commercially possible for ordinary men of business. The solution of the problem of Indian poverty must be sought primarily in the laboratory, and the more money spent there now, the sooner will the country be able to pay for the high position it aspires to occupy.

THE PALESTINE IDEAL.

Sir Wyndham Deedes, who has recently resigned the post of Chief Civil Secretary to the Palestine Government, is taking advantage of his return to England to endeavour to place the Palestine discussion on a higher level than it usually occupies. Alike in the Jewish, the Arab, and the British aspect of the Palestine problem, he recognises three great ideals, and he believes that the three are capable of being reconciled and carried out together in harmony. He elaborated this theory in an address to the Central Asian Society last week, the substance of which is embodied in the following summary :—

The Jewish Aspect.

It is often declared that the Jews themselves are opposed to Zionism. There cannot be the least doubt that the majority of Jews are Zionist in sympathy. The Jews of Eastern Europe, the birthplace of Zionism, were the most interested, because they were the most persecuted; in the rest of Jewry there is a small minority against it, comprising those who fear that in the realisation of the Zionist ideal they are in danger of losing present national advantages, and those who oppose it on Orthodox grounds. Of the fifteen millions of Jewry there is a preponderating majority in agreement with the British Government's policy. In talking of a National Home for the Jews, it is essential that it should be made clear what is meant by the phrase. Undoubtedly Zionist extremists had interpreted it to mean a Jewish State, but the British Government, although late in the day, has now given its own official interpretation of the phrase, and that stands to-day. In this connection it is permissible to sympathise with the Zionists. If a friend sees fit to promise to build you a castle, and after three years, during which there has been much talk of architects' plans and builders' activities, takes you down to the place and presents you with a cottage, it may be perfectly true that a cottage is better for you, and is all that you are entitled to; but the fact remains that disappointment on your part is legitimate, and that you are deserving of sympathy.

The idea of a Home, as it appeals to the Jews, is of a place where their religion, the national language, and the national culture can find means of expression. In connection with the first of these three features, it may be said at once, Sir Wyndham Deedes declared, that the Jews have no intention of building a synagogue on the site of the Mosque of Omar. It is to be hoped that in Palestine they will pay particular attention to their religion and will find it possible to bring it into accord with the times in which we live in order that Judaism, in common with Mohammedanism and Christianity, may work to promote the spiritual welfare of mankind. There has been much misplaced and ignorant criticism on the subject of the revival of the Hebrew language. It is obvious, however, that the Jews must have their own means of expressing their ideals, in the same way as the Irish, Welsh, and others insist on using their own language. The third feature of the Home idea is represented by national culture, by which may be understood Jewish traditions and customs and whatever is peculiar to the life of the people. The potential wealth of Zionism was connected with literary, moral, artistic, and scientific developments. The Jews wish to establish in Palestine a model institution, for the benefits of which they would see their children repatriating to the Holy Land. In this connection Sir Wyndham Deedes expressed the hope that the day would come when the Jews will regard a pilgrimage to Palestine as a self-imposed duty, and that there a brief association with some of the Jewish colonies would send them back spiritually recharged to their brethren at home. Thus the appeal of the National Home would be not so much for those who had the good fortune to live there, but for the remainder of the fifteen millions. To achieve this there must be a careful selection of the Jews who are admitted to Palestine, for the end in view should be not to establish a numerical or political predominance, but the spread of Jewish culture, which the Arabs may in turn adopt. In regard to the immigrants, although much has been said and written about them by those who have never seen them, it is a fact that, judged by ethical and moral standards, as well as physically, they compare favourably with other peoples. They are for the most part young people, and although, coming as they do from Eastern Europe, they are largely Russian in origin, they are Jews first and Russian a long way after. Sir Wyndham Deedes attached no importance to the Bolshevik bogey. The charge of irreligion has been brought against them. It is true that they come from countries where they have been subjected to the bonds of extreme orthodoxy, and, consequently, are inclined to feel the need of shaking themselves free from such bonds; but it is at least probable that the atmosphere of Palestine will bring them back to the religion of their forefathers.

Whether this immigration is economically sound is another matter. Against it is urged that the people can never make a living. Zionist money will be used for reclaiming the waste places. There may be no return on the capital for many years, if ever; but the Jews are not going to Palestine to make a fortune. They can, however, count on making sufficient income in terms of moral values.

The Arab Aspect.

It may safely be said that the relations between Jews and Arabs would be very good, if there were no politicians. Blame attaches to leaders on both sides. Although a small number of Arabs accept the British Government's policy in Palestine, the large majority do not; but it is a mistake to accept as the views of all the people all those that are attributed to them by their leaders. For all practical purposes, however, we have to reckon with a majority opposed to the Government's policy, and yet not to the policy actually carried out, but to the policy of extreme Zionism which they fear may be carried out. Thus Arab opposition is due more to apprehension than to actuality. A tribute is due to the decency and gentlemanly manners with which most Arabs conduct this opposition. The majority are sincere and genuine in their views and in fighting, as they imagine, on behalf of their own people. In view, however, of the advantages that they have over the Jews—in point of numbers, 530,000 Arabs to 83,000 Jews, in their established position, in Arabic being the language of the country—the lecturer considered it strange that they do not pull together and organise themselves more. As between Jews and Arabs, the Palestine Administration shows no partiality, as may be proved in the history of education, and in its land policy. Its immigration policy, moreover, constitutes no danger to the Arabs, hedged about, as it is, with so many restrictions.

In addition to this negative opposition to Zionism, the Arabs can point to a positive side. They also have aims and aspirations which centre in an Arab kingdom and an Arab culture. Internally, they are anxious to have more power in the Legislative Council; externally, they want to link up with their brethren of Transjordan, the Hejaz, and Irak. In regard to the former point, the Palestine Administration takes up the attitude that so long as the Arabs attack Zionism and demand the withdrawal of the Balfour Declaration, there can be no "deal," and Sir Wyndham Deedes was personally of opinion that the analogies of surrounding countries are inept, as the Palestine Arab would not appreciate changing his own conditions of existence for theirs. Towards the conception of a large Arab entity Great Britain must naturally be sympathetic; but it may legitimately point out that the greater success that project meets with, the more pronounced is the dog-in-the-manger attitude which would deny a small district in a small section of the great Arab world for the establishment of a great ideal. Arab and Jewish interests do not conflict. Both peoples can do much to help one another, and the Arabs will find Jewish brains and money useful in the realisation of the Arab Nationalist movement.

The British Aspect.

Turning next to the British connection with Zionism, Sir Wyndham Deedes reminded his audience that the Jews were the People of the Book, and that it was no small thing that Great Britain, in the providence of God, should be playing her part in the fulfilment of prophecy. He regarded the establishment of a Jewish National Home as a righting of the wrong which had been visited on Jews by Christians for nearly two thousand years. The Zionist ideal was part of a great ideal which would make Palestine the home of the three great religions—Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism. An opportunity was afforded Great Britain of carrying out this great work, if we could succeed in getting the three religions to work together and the leaders to co-operate in promoting the spiritual welfare of mankind. Jerusalem ought to be regarded as the capital of the Christian Empire. Palestine belongs to the world, and not to any particular people, and it is given to Great Britain to hold it in trust for the world.

PRESS ON THE NEAR EAST.

The New Turkey.

In the Nation and Athenæum of May 12 Professor Arnold J. Toynbee sums up his impressions of Angora, whence he has recently returned to this country. He begins by saying that the Turk of Angora to-day is both an old and a new Turk, but that he is, nevertheless, unmistakably revolutionary. He proceeds to explain how Angora has upset the plans of London, and the ignorance on the part of Britain of the Kemalist state of mind:

This is where Angora is strongest and we are weakest. The leaders of the Turkish National Movement have studied the West. They all speak one or more Western languages; most of them have been educated in Western Europe or the United States; and their finishing school has been a year or two of internment at Malta or of inter-Allied military occupation at Constantinople. They have been probing the mysteries of Frankistan and speculating whether Samson, though he looks as brawny as ever, may possibly not be quite the man he used to be. Is he, when you meet him at close quarters, really so wise, so magnanimous, so incorruptible, or so grave as legend depicts him? Most Turks with whom I have discussed their investigations regarding our noble selves have arrived at unfavourable conclusions. They may be right or wrong. Time alone can test their discernment. But at least they have been trying to learn about us, while we have been making no corresponding effort to learn about them. What, in fact, is the general attitude of educated Western society towards the Oriental Revolution of the last dozen years? For the most part we are crassly indifferent to it, though it is intrinsically interesting as an historical phenomenon, and though the destinies of our Empire are bound up with its issue. And when we are compelled to take notice, our judgments and actions are governed by the pettier motives of pride and prejudice rather than by the breadth and objectivity of vision which are the essentials of statesmanship.

He goes on to remark that the apparent difference between the respective powers of London and of Angora is fallacious, because—

This revolutionary movement is not an isolated earthquake on the plateau of Anatolia. It is an upheaval which is stirring the entire Muslim East through its length and breadth. "Look what splendid fellows our soldiers are," said an Indian revolutionary to me, as he pointed to a detachment of Turkish troops defiling through the streets of Angora. The "our" dropped out unconsciously; but I remembered it again when the diplomatic representative of a friendly Muslim Power told me how he had longed, during the Battle of the Sakkaria, to send in his resignation and enlist as a Turkish trooper. Indians, Afghans and Egyptians, Kretes and Arabians, they are all represented at Angora, and there they are listening to a new gospel: that the tide has turned; that the West is not invincible; that the gates of hell shall not prevail against Islam; and that peace shall not be made with the Franks except upon terms of equality. This is what the British Empire is "up against" in the East; and when we have realised it we shall have to decide whether it is to be peace or war. It is no use pretending that peace can be purchased without sacrifices. We must be prepared for a rapid liquidation of our political ascendancy, not only in Turkey and Afghanistan, where it has always been incomplete, but in countries where it has been long and thoroughly established.

Nor, says Mr. Toynbee, can we, by surrendering our administration, safeguard our trade, for the insistence by the revolutionary Turks upon equality of status will cause economic depression throughout the Middle East. But this economic decline, inevitable though it is, is not likely to be permanent, because of the tendency in Turkey to crave for Western comfort and efficiency. Eventually, therefore, the New Turkey will probably prove far more remunerative to the West than was the Old, since, "if the Oriental peoples realise their ambition, they will become an economically progressive society instead of a backward one."

The Kurd.

Writing in Blackwood's of April, on "Kurdish Memories," "E. J. R." gives a delightful picture of Kurdistan and of its inhabitants. After briefly describing Rowanduz, the desolation of the open valleys in the vicinity, the bitter memory in which the Russian invaders are held, and the consequent difficulty of the Christian British in directing the country, the writer goes on to describe a typical incident with the Kurds:—

The Kurd is a very fiery gentleman, and old feuds have a knack of flaring up quite suddenly over the most trivial incidents. In this connection the writer will not soon forget his first official dinner-party in Kurdistan. With the idea of producing an early millennium, all the local chiefs had been asked to a banquet. Each guest, to emphasise his own importance, had brought with him a tail of every fighting-man he could raise. The dinner went well enough for the first eight or ten courses, and each chief in turn made an impassioned speech, setting forth what a magnificent thing it was that at last, under the benign British Government, all the land was at peace, old feuds dead, and the Kurds all brothers. But just as the most eloquent of the potential brethren was half-way through his speech, one of the Political Officer's followers arrived breathless with the news that trouble was brewing in the main street of the town. As he doubled up the hill, the Political Officer noticed women disappearing, shops closing like magic, and, most ominous sign of all, men diving into their houses and reappearing fully armed on the roofs.

In the middle of the street were standing two fierce-looking clansmen of different tribes with their rifles pointed at each other across a forlorn and mangy donkey—the cause of all the trouble. For it was a playful allusion from one of the disputants to the resemblance borne by this miserable moke to one which had disappeared some time before under mysterious circumstances which had provoked the other to righteous fury. And in a moment both tribes were up in arms with their rifles loaded and ready. The whole street was crowded with angry tribesmen, so there was all the making of a singularly bloody scrap: one shot and the thing would have started.

Fortunately, an intelligent gendarme was with the Political Officer, and our clansmen were collared and disarmed before they quite knew what had hit them. They were tied to two trees, and even-handed justice was dispensed to them alternately with a heavy riding whip.

So all seemed well—till the tribal spirit again cropped up. For a nasty man on one side shouted, "See how bravely our man takes his punishment: the other is no better than a woman, and will cry out first." And again rifles were brought to the ready, for the tribe whose man shamed it meant to wipe out the disgrace in blood. As luck would have it, neither of the men were particularly brave, and at about the sixth stroke both gave it best, and raised a simultaneous wail. Then the Kurd's saving sense of humour came to the rescue, and both sides collapsed with laughter at their tearful champions. The crisis was past.

Now, all this time things were not going too well with the dinner-party, for news of the trouble had reached the chiefs of the opposing tribes down at the Political Officer's house, and when he returned he found the two of them wrestling on the ground amongst the dishes, each doing his best to knife the other, while in the gentleman momentarily on the top he recognised the most eloquent speaker on Kurdish brotherhood. They were soon disentangled, however, and the meal proceeded as before, except that the Political Officer now sat between the two and dispensed polite conversation. But the entertainment never became really cheerful, although the guests said afterwards that they had enjoyed every moment of it.

Other interesting accounts, of meals, hunting, and so on, follow, and it is obvious that the human qualities of the Kurd appealed strongly to "E. J. R." He ends by speculating on their future, now that both we and the Turks have left the Kurds:—

It may be that some of the more powerful chiefs can combine to produce order out of the present chaos. One hopes so. The Kurd may be ignorant, treacherous, and a savage. He is at least a man, and a brave and hardy one. Fiery-tempered, quick to resent an injury to his pride, but impulsive in friendship and intensely hospitable, there is something particularly attractive about him. One only hopes that our abandonment of him will leave him some other future than murder, disorder, and eventual starvation.

The Arab Question.

"Arab Nationalism," says Mr. Chisholm Dunbar Brunton, in the Fortnightly Review for May, "next to Turkish Nationalism, and perhaps in conjunction with it, is the most serious threat to European domination in the Near East." He examines this perplexing fact, and explains it by saying that after the War the Arabs found they had not obtained independence, but had merely changed masters. When, he says, the Arab State of Syria was overthrown by the French, when British rule in Irak led to insurrection, and when it was realised what a National Home for the Jews in Palestine meant, bitter resentment was felt against the Allies, and distrust of the ability and intentions of the Sherifian family occupied the minds of many Arabs. At the psychological moment came the victory of the Turks at the Sakaria, with the consequence that the Arabs now tend to see in Angora, rather than in Mecca, the Kiblah to which they must look for help. Mr. Brunton proceeds to disentangle the Franco-Arab-British knot which was tied subsequent to the Armistice, and he thinks British policy, or lack of it, badly to blame. Officially or not, he says, we encouraged the Arabs against the French; and he is certain that it is not French "imperialism," but our own mistakes, which are the cause of the present unsatisfactory state of the Arab Question. He is not without hope that British policy will revert to its former high traditions, and concludes by emphasising the statement that neither King Faisal nor Emir Abdullah represents the present trend of Arab opinion outside the purely tribal elements, and also the potential importance of the Wahabi movement.

LORD CARNARVON'S WILL.

The Earl of Carnarvon, of Highclere Castle, Hants, who died at Cairo on April 5 last, aged 56 years, left property in his own disposition of the gross value of £398,925, with net personalty £274,376. Probate of his will, dated October 29, 1919, with two codicils, has been granted to General the Right Hon. Sir John Grenfell Maxwell, G.C.B., of Lancaster Gate, W., and Major-General Sir Robert Hutchison, K.C.M.G., of 57, Catherine Street, Buckingham Gate, S.W., and Mr. Arthur Fitzhardinge Berkeley Portman, of 29, Montague Square, W. His Egyptian collection is dealt with in the first codicil, made on the same day as his will, but written in his own hand. He leaves this collection to his wife, adding:—"I would like her to give one object to the British Museum, one object to the Ashmolean, and a fragment cup of blue glass (Thotmes III.) to the Metropolitan Museum, New York. The first two bequests need not be capital objects. Should she find it necessary to sell the collection, I suggest that the nation—i.e., the British Museum—be given the first refusal at £20,000, far below its value; such sum, however, to be absolutely hers, free of all duties. Otherwise I would suggest that the collection be offered to the Metropolitan, New York, Mr. Carter to have charge of the negotiations and to fix the price. Should my wife decide to keep the collection, I leave it absolutely to her whether she leaves it to my son or to the nation or to Evelyn Herbert. I suggest, however, that she consult Dr. Gardiner and Mr. Carter on the subject.—Written entirely by me."

The second codicil was made a few days before his death, and was written out by Dr. Alan H. Gardiner at his request on a cable form of the Eastern Telegraph Co. It is dated April 3 last, and reads, "Give all my bearer bonds to my dear daughter." Affidavits were required as to the circumstances of the execution of this codicil, but it was admitted to probate as a valid document.

He stated that he wished to be buried if possible on Beacon Hill, and he directed his executors to erect on Beacon Hill a mound of earth with trees or stone, which, however, is not to cost more than £50. If this burial were not possible, he desired to be buried in Highclere Churchyard, next to his mother. He expressly desired that there should be no black horses or any sort of mourning used at his funeral, or any mourning afterwards, that the funeral should be exceedingly simple, and that two doctors should view his body before burial to make sure that life was extinct. Among the sums that he left were:—

£500 to Mr. Howard Carter (described as of Luxor, Egypt),

£100 to Dr. Budge, of the British Museum; £100 each to Dr. Alan Gardiner and Dr. T. S. Bruce.

To his wife the emerald ring he always wore, hoping that she will always wear it after his death, and the pearl pin which was her gift, and which he hoped she would have mounted, and wear herself, all his racehorses and any of his jewellery and furniture, pictures, statuary, plate, articles of vertu, etc., that she might select.

To his daughter Evelyn, his pearl stud, with £200, to have it mounted, his gold cigarette-case, and £1,000, as well as all his bearer bonds, mentioned above.

He left £2,000 each to his sister, Lady Burghclere, and Richard C. Dawson, of Whatcombe; £1,000 to each of his sisters, Lady Margaret Duckworth and Lady Victoria Herbert, and George Herbert Duckworth; £500 and his 20 bore Purley guns to his brother-in-law, Lord Burghclere; £500 to each executor and to Marcus Johnson, of Henrietta Street; £200 to each of his half-brothers, Aubrey and Mervyn Molyneux Herbert; and he left all his real estate (except the Highclere and other settled estates) to his wife for life, with remainder to his son and his heirs in tail male. He appointed the Highclere estate to his son and heirs. Subject to the right of selection of his wife mentioned above, he left his jewellery, pictures, statuary, articles of vertu, furniture, etc., to devolve as heirlooms with his property. All other his personal estate he left to his wife.

GIFT TO SIR PERCY COX.

The gift of the British Chamber of Commerce at Baghdad to Sir Percy Cox takes the form of a replica of "The Ship of Good Fortune" in bronze and silver-gilt, executed by Mr. Omar Ramsden, of Kensington. It bears the following inscription:—"Sir P. Z. Cox, G.C.M.G., G.C.I.E., K.C.S.I., qui per XX. annos maxima cum prudentia inter gentes orientales tam in pace quam in bello res patriae preclare direxit mercatores Britannici haud immemores DD."

A year ago, on the grant of independence, it was suggested that the Egyptian flag should be a field of green with three white stars and a crescent. The question has now been again raised, says The Times, but no decision has been reached.

NOTES AND NEWS.

Anatolian Railway Deal.

Information was forthcoming late last week of one of the most notable business deals since the Armistice—the acquisition by a British group of the control of the Anatolian Railway which runs from Haidar Pasha to Konia, with a branch line to Angora. The line was a German enterprise, and was operated through a Turkish company, and about twenty years ago the shares giving the control of the undertaking were transferred to a Swiss bank, from which they have been acquired by the British group, which is understood to consist of Messrs. Rothschilds, Messrs. Schroeders, and the National Provincial, Westminster, and Lloyds Banks. Following the Armistice, financial groups of the Triple Entente were instituted with a view to obtaining the control of the railways in Turkey; but when the Tripartite Agreement ended this financial understanding also terminated, since when there has been keen competition to obtain the shares from the Swiss bank. The successful British group was associated with what may not inaptly be called the Tripartite Financial Agreement, and the Allied groups have been invited to participate in the deal, an offer which is reported to have been accepted by the Italian group, and no doubt will be by the remaining group.

Some Aspects of the Undertaking.

The conditions in the regions in which the Anatolian Railway operates preclude speculation regarding the immediate results of this development. Obviously, everything depends on the conclusion of peace with Turkey. When that happy issue is reached, the first thing to be done will be to put the railway in order, and this is likely to be no light undertaking, seeing that the line was in the area of operations. Expenditure on a very considerable scale will doubtless be entailed, but the raising of the necessary capital is, of course, assured in view of the standing of the British group. One of the most interesting features of the enterprise is the association in it of three of the great joint-stock institutions. To participate in a deal of this character is in the nature of a new departure so far as they are concerned, and it is one on which our banking institutions are to be heartily congratulated, for nothing could do more to conduce to the success of British enterprise overseas than the whole-hearted support of the great banks. In this respect we have evidently learnt a helpful lesson from our former enemy, for the secret of Germany's overwhelming commercial success before the war was the support unhesitatingly given to her business men by the banking institutions.

Greece's Financial Position.

The recent rise in the drachma, which now stands round about 240, has served to draw further attention to the marked improvement in Greece's economic position in the last few months. The ill-fated adventure in Asia Minor imposed an unsupportable financial strain on Greece, and it would not have been surprising if it had had the most serious results on the general situation in the country. At one time, indeed, the exchange (which is, however, not always an accurate barometer of financial conditions) seemed likely to follow the course of the lev and the leu, but the success of the restrictive measures that have been taken is shown by its rapid recovery, while the Customs returns—to say nothing of the excellent dividends paid by the Greek banks—afford unmistakable evidence that the financial position of the country is certainly on the upgrade. Given freedom from external and internal troubles, there would seem to be no reason why Greece should not soon be in as good a position as she was before the Great War. In this connection it must be remembered that the events in Asia Minor have not wholly spelt loss for Greece, for the refugees from Asia Minor include among their number many who should be a valuable economic asset to the country, notably those engaged in the carpet industry, which Greece is now trying to develop.

Trade with Great Britain.

In view of the improvement in the outlook in Greece, it would be eminently satisfactory to be able to state that British trade was at least holding its own in that country. Unfortunately that is not so. British enterprise in Greece after the Armistice left little to be desired, and our traders were undoubtedly making headway when the short-lived "boom" ended. The result of the "slump" and other factors has been that all the work that has been done has gone for nothing, and now that the market is reviving we are not in a position to take advantage of it. Admittedly the position is not now favourable, as it was in 1919, for instance. Restrictions for one thing, and the competition of Continental countries for another (the latter a factor which will have to be reckoned with to an increasing degree), greatly limit the possible scope for enterprise, but, despite these handicaps, there are undoubted opportunities for trade development in Greece, and it is to be hoped that our merchants and manufacturers will not be behindhand in investigating the possibilities that exist.

The Indian Loan.

In view of the prevailing conditions, it was only to be expected that a considerable proportion of the Indian loan of £20,000,000 would go to the underwriters. As a matter of fact, the subscriptions totalled just over 50 per cent. of the amount asked for, which was much better than was anticipated, and, all things considered, must be regarded as quite satisfactory. It is significant that, instead of being quoted at a discount of a point or two, the loan is actually at a small premium, which speaks volumes for the market support for Indian issues. Incidentally, the result of the loan had a favourable effect on the other Indian issues and on the gilt-edged market as a whole.

Roumanian Bonds.

A feature of the recent Roumanian Five per Cent. Loan was the arrangement for the redemption of the bonds by half-yearly drawings at par—commencing on June 1. As the price of issue of the loan was 67, it will be realised that holders are given a piquant interest to life twice yearly, seeing that they stand to gain at each drawing a premium of about 50 per cent. on the purchase price, and they have the satisfaction (which is denied to more speculatively inclined mortals, always curiously numerous in the late spring) of knowing that ultimately they are certain to draw a "runner." Last week saw the issue of the bonds drawn for redemption on June 1, so that subscribers have not had long to wait for the result of the first event.

Rubber and the Restriction Scheme.

At a superficial glance it is quite possible to find grounds for the view that the rubber restriction scheme has not been a success. For a time the price of rubber mounted steadily until it was over 1s. 6d., but it is now little better than it was in November, and while the present price of about 1s. 1d. might enable the companies to pay their way, it certainly holds out no prospects of the substantial dividends for which shareholders are looking. It has to be borne in mind, however, that the fall in price followed directly upon, and is in the main (though there are other causes) to be attributed to, the increased exports permitted under the scheme after the price of the raw commodity has been maintained at a certain figure for a definite period. And if the price of rubber has gone back again, it is no less certain that in the last few months there has been a great decrease in visible stocks of the commodity, and this factor and the gradual development in the demand for the commodity should tend at a not distant date to raise the price again, though there must, of course, be fluctuations until we have reached the stage when export is once more unrestricted.

THE TOBACCO EXHIBITION.

Near Eastern Exhibits.

The annual Tobacco Exhibition, which was concluded on Saturday last after a most successful week's run at Olympia, London, if not as fully representative of the tobacco industry as one would hope to see, had many exhibits of unusual interest both to the trade and to the public. It is pleasing to note that foremost amongst these were the stands of Near Eastern exhibitors. Undoubtedly the most attractive and interesting exhibit in the hall was that of Messrs. Albert Weinburg, manufacturers of the well-known "Balkan Sobranie" cigarettes. This included a working exhibit of the old-fashioned, but still the only perfect, method of cutting tobacco by hand and making up the cigarettes by hand one at a time, the workers being in native costume, and the background scenic effects of Macedonia making an admirable setting to everyday life in a Balkan tobacco factory.

Another exhibit which claimed more than the average share of attention was that of Messrs. C. L. Constantinides' Sons, specialists in Turkish leaf and cut tobaccos. Here were to be seen specimens of the various Oriental leaf tobaccos, samples of ready-blended and cut Turkish tobaccos, and a distinct novelty in the shape of a popular-priced (6d.) packet of ten really excellent Turkish cigarettes. We understand that these are shortly to be placed on the market under the name of "The Ramadan Turkish Gold Flake, and it would appear that once this cigarette becomes more widely known, some of the more popular Virginia brands will have a serious competitor. Models depicting various scenes in the handling and cultivation of Turkish cigarette tobacco gave added interest to this exhibit, and both trade and public were continually around the stand.

Greece was represented by the exhibit of Mr. N. De Mayo, United Kingdom agent for Messrs. D. J. Arditti, of Xanthi and the Société Anonyme des Tabacs d'Orient et d'Outre Mer de Cavalla. "Arditti" brand Turkish cigarettes, made in Iskedje (Xanthi) were displayed, also leaf tobaccos from Cavalla.

One of the most imposing stands was that of "Matossian's" Egyptian cigarettes. This well-known Cairo house exhibited samples of their different brands, and made the most of the recent Tutankhamen discoveries by exhibiting in a glass case specimens of Matossian cigarettes found in the tomb! One had only to listen to the observations of different visitors to this stand to marvel at the credulity of the public.

The directors of the Bombay, Baroda, and Central India Railway propose the payment, in addition to the half-year's guaranteed interest of 1½ per cent., of a final dividend for the year to March 31 last of 1½ per cent., less tax, making 6 per cent. for the year, less tax.

H.M. Commercial Secretary at Constantinople reports that the Customs authorities of that city have received instructions from Angora that duty will no longer have to be paid in Anatolia on goods shipped from Constantinople, provided that such goods are accompanied by an official declaration certifying that duty has already been paid at that port.

Interesting Power Reliability Trial.

I think my readers will be interested with a brief account of a seventy-two hours' continuous full-power run which the Parsons Motor Company, Ltd., have just completed with one of their four-cylinder 28-h.p. engines. The engine selected was a standard 28-h.p. marine unit manufactured by the company, having four cylinders, 4½-in. bore by 6-in. stroke and running at 850/900 r.p.m.

The test was carried out to demonstrate the suitability of this type of engine for full-power work over extended periods, though it is by no means the first occasion that such performances have been given, and in the present instance no special preparations were made. The engine had just completed the usual four hours' official trial, and after a brief inspection of fuel strainers, etc., it was re-started on a Friday afternoon, being direct coupled to a Froude dynamometer, the power being transmitted through the Parsons standard metal to metal clutch and means being provided to show the speed and total number of revolutions, as well as the exact amount of fuel and lubricating oil consumed.

The test was carried out under the supervision of the Admiralty Overseer. Being started on the Friday at four o'clock, the engine was run right through the week-end, and finally shut down at four o'clock on the Monday. During this period the engine was under constant observation, and was untouched except for replenishment of fuel and lubricating oil and no trouble of any sort was experienced.

It might be pointed out that during the run the counter registered no less than 3,621,000 revolutions, which would mean that each engine piston travelled a linear distance in its cylinder of about 700 miles, almost equivalent to a straight line drawn from London to Vienna. This run is equivalent to a non-stop full-power sea passage of about 720 miles. The total fuel consumption was 195 gallons and 11 gallons of lubricating oil. The full data for this interesting three days' test are being collated for publication in due course.

The Market for Agricultural Machinery.

While British agricultural machinery firms have been able to record some improvement in business of late, it has been mainly due to orders from this country, and they are still labouring under the serious handicap of having their two principal markets of the pre-war era—Russia and the Near East—practically closed to them. It had been hoped that peace with Turkey would at least have the effect of opening one of the most important markets in the Near East, and would lead to substantial business, but that prospect has, of course, been largely damped by the Chester concession, which, if it should be carried into effect, would give America practically a monopoly of the supply of agricultural machinery to Turkey. Whether the concession will materialise into anything practical is now becoming rather doubtful, if one is to judge by recent reports. In the most favourable circumstances so comprehensive a scheme would be very difficult to carry into effect, and it is at least open to doubt in the prevailing conditions whether the American syndicate will in the end be able to command the requisite support in an enterprise which, whatever its promise, has certain elements of hazard about it. If the concession should lapse, then the market will be open, and British firms would be well advised not to allow any question of the concession to interfere with their plans for entering the Turkish market. According to present intentions, an exhibition of agricultural machinery is to be held in Turkey in a few months' time, and it is to be hoped that advantage will be taken of the opportunity thus afforded for illustrating the potentialities of British machines, for it may be taken for granted that, concession or no concession, like or dislike for British goods, the best machinery will ultimately win the day, and in a competition British manufacturers have nothing to fear from American manufacturers or those of any other country.

FOREIGN EXCHANGES.

The exchanges have presented a comparatively steady aspect during the past week, a significant exception being German marks, which have fallen to 229,500. French francs are fractionally better at 69,47½, while Belgian francs have also improved to 80.70. There have been no movements in the Near Eastern exchanges of exceptional interest. Greek drachmæ are five points lower at 240, Turkish piastres have risen to 245, while Roumanian lei are rather better at 925.

Stock and Share Markets.

TONE BETTER: BUSINESS RESTRICTED.

Coming Oil Dividends.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Friday Night.

It is a noteworthy fact that the markets generally improve at the approach of the periodical holiday periods, and this time the same phenomenon has been observed, the markets closing to-night on an almost cheerful note—that is, compared with the conditions that have obtained during the past fortnight. For all that, business has been on a very restricted scale, and this is likely to remain the case until most of the unsettling factors have disappeared.

The extremely uncertain foreign political situation, of course, has been, and unfortunately, so far as can be seen, will continue to be, the principal adverse influence. So far there is no great encouragement to believe that the advent of stable conditions is within sight, but it is unthinkable that the present state of things can continue for long, and any perceptible improvement will very quickly be reflected in the markets. After the holidays I suppose the markets, temporarily, at any rate, will be depressed by the development in the home political situation, for a change of Prime Minister must always cause some degree of uncertainty, and under Mr. Bonar Law's Administration things at home were beginning unmistakably to improve.

The Indian Loan—and Others.

The large Indian loan, reference to which is made in another column, met with a much better response than I anticipated. For, roughly, 50 per cent. to be taken up is really quite a good result, and the fact that the loan has gone to a premium indicates very plainly that the view is held that there will be no difficulty in disposing of the remainder in due course. A number of other interesting loans are on the tapis, notably one for China, while before the year is out it is possible that a further and substantial Czecho-Slovak loan will make its appearance. Excellent progress has been made by Czecho-Slovakia during the last year or two, so that there should be no difficulty with regard to the issue. Then there is a possibility of a further Roumanian loan, but I am inclined to doubt whether this will materialise until developments in Roumania have led to a very marked improvement in the exchange, which at the present time is one of the anomalies in the table of foreign exchanges. If drachmæ are round about 240, lei at nearly four figures is an almost unthinkable proposition. Yet that is the case as a result of the ill-considered policy of the Roumanian authorities, who have imposed restriction after restriction until they have succeeded in handicapping trade to an extraordinary extent.

Gilt-Edged Better.

Compared with the previous week, gilt-edged make a much better showing. Consols at 58½ are ½ up, War Loan Fives at 101½ have gained ½, the Conversion Loan has recovered 7-16 at 80 3-16, while Fundings are ¼ up at 92½. Indian stocks have improved, largely as a result of the relatively favourable reception of the new loan. The Three per Cent. Loan at 60¾ is ¾ up, the Five and a Half per Cent. Loan at 103½ has gained ½, while the Seven per Cent. Loan at 120½ is 1½ up.

As usual in recent weeks, there has been a certain amount of irregularity in the market in Foreign Government securities. French stocks have firmed up somewhat, War Loan Fives at 30 showing a gain of a point, while the Four per Cents. are a similar amount up at 24. Once again German Three per Cents. have shed 1s., closing at 12s., while Italian Rentes have been steady at 22½. In Near Eastern securities Turkish Unified have been fairly steady, and at 26½ are ½ up. Greek securities have been uniformly good, and a very firm tendency has been in evidence. Czecho-Slovak Eight per Cents. have firmed up a point to 94½, while the new Roumanian Loan is unchanged at 1½ discount.

Industrial Steady.

A rather better tone has ruled in the Industrial group, and a few really good features have been in evidence. Business, however, has been on the most restricted scale, as is invariably the case at holiday periods. The settlement suggests that the market position in general is much stronger than before the recent decline in prices, and, as I indicated last week, very little will be required to bring about an advance in this group literally all along the line.

Textiles have been quite firm, and the leading stocks have mostly improved. Coats are unchanged at 69s., while Courtaulds are 2s. up at 70s. Iron and Steel shares have made a better showing. Vickers at 15s. 7½d. are 1½d. up, Armstrongs have gained 1s. 3d. at 20s., while Guest Keens are 2s. up at 44s. Tobaccos have hardened. Bats are 1s. 6d. up at 94s. 6d., while Imperial Tobaccos have gained 2s. 6d. at 89s. 6d.

Oils Firmer.

The 50 per cent. distribution of Lobitos has imparted firmness to this market, indicating, as it does, that the dividends of the other leading oil companies that will shortly be forthcoming, such as the Burmah and Shell companies, will also be of a satisfactory character. It is expected that the distribution of the former company will be maintained at last year's figure.

Anglo-Persian Ord. at 4½ are ½ up, while Burmahs at 5 11-32 have gained 3-32. Lobitos are 3-16 up at 6 29-32, Mexican Eagles are 3-32 down at 1 17-32, while Shell Transport are 1-16 up at 4 3-16. Among Egyptians, Anglo-Egyptian B are 1-16 up at 1 19-32. In the Roumanian group Phoenix are 25s. 7½d., a gain of 7½d., Dacia Romanos at 18s. 6d. are 3d. lower, while Steaua Romanas are unchanged at 8s. 6d.

The progress report of the Phoenix Oil and Transport Company, Ltd., and allied companies (including the Roumanian Consolidated Oilfields) for April shows that the crude oil production for the month was 4,833 tons, and the throughput of the refinery 4,746 tons.

London, Saturday Morning.

Sugar.—Home refined has continued in fair request. Tate's cubes are unchanged at 71s. 9d., Lyle's granulated has been done round about 66s. 3d., while London granulated has come to business at 66s. Foreign descriptions have been steady. West Indian crystallised is unchanged at 61s. 3d., while white Java has been done at about 62s. The latest reports with regard to sugar beet cultivation on the Continent are encouraging, France, Belgium, and Czecho-Slovakia having largely extended the area under this crop. Futures are: August 32s. 4½d., December 26s. 1½d.

Coffee.—A weak tone has developed. East Indian has shed 2s. at 110s., Costa Rica is also 2s. down at 106s., Nairobi is 3s. lower at 90s., while Santos is 1s. down at 72s. Futures are: July 61s., September 59s. 10½d., December 57s.

Rice.—The market has been quiet. Spanish Japan has been in fair request, but quotations are about the same as before. There is no change to be noted in regard to the general market position.

Oilseeds.—Linseed has again been variable, but the tendency has been upwards, and Indian at 21s. is 1½d. up, while La Plata has gained 7½d. at 19s. 9d. Rapeseed has been rather variable, Toria being 4½d. down at 17s. 4½d., while real bold Ferozepore at 16s. 7½d. is 3d. up. Cottonseed has been inactive. Dried Fruit.—Despite the short week, good business is again to be reported in this market. Currants have again moved off well at firmer prices. As in the case of currants, supplies of sultanas are very small, and the market is very firm. Plums have continued in excellent request, and the sustained demand for this commodity has been one of the features of the season. Almonds have again been in increasing request.

CZECHO-SLOVAK WINE.

The Madrid Convention, which Czecho-Slovakia recently joined, exacts that the name "champagne" be exclusively reserved for ordinary champagne wines. It has been decided, therefore, that manufacturers of sparkling wines in Czecho-Slovakia will utilise the word "sekt" (a word of Italian origin) in place of champagne, as hitherto employed, on account of such native sparkling wines being made after the same processes as those of champagne. The quantity of wine produced during 1922 was 594,952 hectolitres (one hectolitre equals 22 gallons). Four-fifths of this wine was white, the remainder red. The vineyards cover an area of 14,879 hectares (one hectare equals about 2½ acres).

THE TRADE OF TRIPOLI IN SYRIA.

Tripoli is the outlet for the products of large tracts of country as far distant as Aleppo and Damascus (says the British Vice-Consul at Beyrout in a recent report). Silk, olives, olive oil, and native olive oil soap, oranges, lemons, beans, peas, lentils, wool, eggs, and small quantities of wheat and barley are exported; though, properly speaking, many of the cereals mentioned above leave Tripoli only to re-enter Syria at Beyrout or other ports for local consumption. The chief exports are to France, Egypt, the United Kingdom, the United States, Constantinople, and Italy; but when Anatolia and Russia open up, a large expansion, particularly of the fruit and olive oil soap export trade, is anticipated.

Manufactured cotton goods and piece-goods, hardware, woollens, and preserves and provisions, etc., are imported from the United Kingdom, and distributed in various districts in the interior. Woollens and a certain quantity of cotton textiles and leather goods come from Italy; cereals from Australia, Egypt, and the United States; petroleum and benzine from the United States and a little from Roumania; sugar from the United States; silk manufactured goods, provisions, and fancy goods from France, and in a lesser degree from Italy; machinery from Belgium, Sweden, and Germany; cutlery, clocks, and cheap hardware and ironmongery from Germany and Austria form the chief imports into Tripoli.

British goods are fairly firmly established on the market, and in spite of their higher prices (owing to the exchange) are frequently preferred to goods from other sources. Possible markets exist for British woollens, agricultural and other machinery, and cement, as other brands of foreign manufacture are at present holding a fairly open market. As the Syrian peasant and labourer, who form the largest part of the country's population, is uneducated in the matter of taste for clothes, a good market might be found for cheap ready-made suits and clothes for men and women. To encourage trade openings and to compete successfully with foreigners, some form of credit to buyers purchasing British goods is essential. The system, largely insisted upon by British sellers, of demanding cash with order, or a large percentage of the cash with order, has the serious effect of driving trade into the hands of foreign competitors. Satisfactory bank guarantees and credits should be sufficient except where unusually large orders are placed. Several agents of sound financial standing are available in various lines of business. The visits of British firms' representatives would do much to assist in obtaining orders.

Tripoli does not manufacture many articles or goods for export, but several factories exist for making olive oil soap, which is chiefly used for home consumption, although fair quantities are exported to Turkey and Egypt. Smaller factories where silk cocoons are boiled and silk is spun are fairly numerous, but are run on primitive lines, as also are the majority of the flour mills in and around Tripoli, which obtain their power from the Abu Ali River, flowing from the mountains of the Lebanon into the sea at Tripoli. Hides and leather are tanned and used for the local manufacture of native boots and shoes, which are all hand-made and hardly suitable for export. There are no other manufactures of any importance found there, the town relying on its export and import transit business, and on the agricultural richness of its surrounding hinterland for its comparative prosperity.

The town, though showing in some ways a progressive tendency, is backward in the respect that it has no water,

GREEN FRUIT REPORT.

Messrs. J. C. Houghton and Co., of Liverpool, report as follows for the week ended May 16:—

Oranges (Valencia).—The spell of wintry weather has been all against this fruit, and after a decline on Monday prices to-day were only just about sustained, notwithstanding the approach of the Whitsun holidays. Jaffa—The balance of "Syrian Prince" had to be disposed of at lower rates than for the initial portion. With the arrival of "Sitra" the season will be brought to a close. Valencia—Half-case (300): I., 17s. 6d., 19s. 6d.; II., 16s., 17s. 6d.; III., 15s., 16s. (360): I., 19s. 3d., 21s.; II., 18s. 3d., 19s. 6d.; III., 16s., 18s. Lemons (Sicilian).—Fair supplies are available and some difficulty is experienced in keeping prices up to their recently enhanced level. A little seasonable weather would no doubt give a fillip to the demand. Palermo and Messina—Case: 8s., 18s. 6d. Box: 5s., 10s.

Onions (Egyptian).—The "Assiout's" cargo of 40,000 is being dealt with, and with the aid of some export demand values compare well with those of a week ago. Valencia doing rather badly, this being largely due to the prevalence of growth in many samples. Egyptian—Bag: 7s. 6d., 8s. 6d. Picklers: 11s. 6d., 12s. 6d. Valencia—4's: 4s., 5s. 6d. 5's: 5s. 6d., 8s. 6d.

SUDAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

The Annual Meeting.

A number of questions of interest were dealt with by the President of the Sudan Chamber of Commerce, Mr. C. P. L. Birch, in his report at the recent annual meeting of the Chamber. We give the following extracts from his speech:—

Dura and Sesame Standards.

As a result of a meeting with Government representatives in May last, a system was agreed upon of obtaining samples of dura and sesame and their periodical despatch to London, where they are deposited with the London Corn Trade Association and the Incorporated Oil Seed Association respectively. The result of sending these samples, so far, has been disappointing in the case of dura, but it has forcibly drawn our attention to the fact that our grain at present compares very unfavourably with the fair average quality standards of millet from other countries of the London Corn Trade Association. This is chiefly due to the presence of smutty or red grain, and a remedy is now being sought for very seriously. Our thanks are due to the Director, Commercial Intelligence Branch of the Central Economic Board, Sudan Government, for the valuable help he has given us, and is still giving us, in this difficult question. I am glad to be able to report that the Government have made important concessions with a view to improving the dura export trade. They have allotted sites at Hassa Hissa and Wad Medani, adjacent to the dura morada in each case, and have given permits to a private concern to erect cleaning machines thereon. In addition, they are granting special preferential rates for dura cleaned at these machines and destined for export via Port Sudan, which will come to less than the present rates for dura passing through the Moghren cleaning plant. This will not only reduce the cost of the grain, but would-be buyers will be able to view their possible purchases in a more convenient manner than hitherto.

Gum Arabic.

In view of the decided success of the gum auctions at Nahud, the Chamber was asked its opinion as to the advisability of introducing similar measures in El Obeid. The question was very fully discussed at many meetings of the merchants interested, and at various interviews with the Government authorities. In spite of a considerable amount of opposition, it was finally agreed that the Government be recommended to give the system of auction sales a trial at El Obeid, with the result that all reports that have reached me are unanimous that the experiment has proved an unqualified success. It is hoped that this system will be extended to Tendelti, Rahad, and other out-stations. Your committee also very strongly recommended the adoption of a fixed scale of royalty. This was refused at first by the Government, but after the matter had been very fully explained to the authorities they agreed that a trial of a fixed scale of royalty should be made for this season, and the system is now in force. It has always been the Chamber's policy to endeavour to place the gum trade on a sounder footing by eliminating as far as possible all elements of uncertainty and possibilities of speculation, and I think that these measures in particular will go far towards bringing about the required effect.

Trade During 1922.

The Customs statistics show a considerable diminution in the volume of trade during 1922. The total values of imports and exports last year are given as £E3,991,815, and £E1,975,069 respectively, as compared with £E5,600,759 and £E2,035,773 in the year 1921. The main imports are less all round, with the sole exception of sugar, of which 10,159 tons, value £E450,387, are shown as received in 1922, as against 6,720 tons, value £E413,773, in 1921. The exports are more satisfactory; skins and hides, ivory, dura and gum show encouraging progress, although exports of live stock and cotton are considerably lower. The most noticeable advance is that of the dura trade, 43,928 tons value £E240,150, having gone out in 1922.

Future Prospects.

Without being unduly optimistic, I think that we may consider that our really black times are behind us. The prospects this year are very much brighter than they have been for some considerable period. It would be absurd to prophesy an immediate all-round improvement, but there is no doubt that, with the completion of the Blue Nile Dam in 1925 and the construction of the Kassala Railway next year, a new era of prosperity and steady development is clearly indicated. To those of you who have borne the heat and burden of the day and suffered the disappointments and despair of the 1920—1921 crisis, I would advocate just a little more patience, as I firmly believe that the Sudan will come into its own within a period of five years from now.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Fluctuations in Futures.

The Commercial Company of Egypt, in their report for the week ended May 11, state:—

Since our last report the futures market has been subjected to wide fluctuations. The break in prices in the New York market caused great disappointment to the local bull operators, and their heavy hurried liquidations are responsible for the severe drop witnessed this week. As a matter of fact, the depression in our market has even been more pronounced than in America, although, in view of the existing small difference between Americans and Egyptians, it would have been quite natural to expect the contrary to occur. Owing to a certain amount of speculation, Ashmouni has not followed the decline to the same extent as Sakellaridis. The difference between these two varieties is now only $1.62 against $2.25 last week and $11.15 a year ago; it is a most extraordinary position. The relative firmness of November Sakellaridis (New Crop) is chiefly due to the transfer of speculative old crop long commitments to this position; further, we understand that some moderate-sized orders have been recently booked for new crop shipments. Egyptians in Liverpool, after last Friday's severe break, have been firmer and prices on the week show but little change; the daily spot sales in that market have again been exceptionally large. Contrary to spinners' usual habit of withdrawing from a falling market, we have this week had a more active demand from abroad, which has been reflected in the good sales at Minet-el-Bassal. The receipts from the interior now amount to 6,560,323 krs. Stocks show a fair decrease and stand at 1,717,640 krs., against 1,771,275 krs. a week ago and 2,197,814 krs. a year ago.

Spot.—The Minet-el-Bassal market, though far from active, has shown a better tone this week, and we have experienced a much better inquiry from abroad. Sales amount to about 7,800 B/s, of which we estimate Sakellaridis 5,800 B/s, Uppers 2,000 B/s, and a few bales of Brown. The drop in prices has attracted a little better demand from spinners, whilst some holders have sold a little more freely.

Sakellaridis.—All styles have been dealt in and rather more attention has been paid to Good and above. Prices of spot against contracts are firm and inclined to harden, especially for the high grades.

Uppers.—All grades have been traded in. Prices of spot against contracts are unchanged except for Fair and Fully Fair, which are a little dearer. Low grades are practically swept clean.

Brown and White.—Are neglected and only a retail business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are without change for Brown except Fair and Fully Fair, which are rather dearer; for White they are unchanged.

Crop 1923.—Sowing has now been completed even in the extreme Northern districts of the Delta. It may be said that, on an average, the preparation of the soil and sowing were carried out about fifteen days earlier than last year; subsequent unfavourable weather has, however, more or less nullified the advantage so gained. The weather, after being quite good for about ten days, has changed and has become rather too cold for the young plants. Although water supply prospects are better than last year, the fact that further permits for the cultivation of rice have recently been granted may mean that the summer irrigation rotations for cotton will be no better than they were last year.

The Ministry of Agriculture has this week published the following report on the cotton crop for the month of April: "During the month under review weather conditions were, on the whole, most unfavourable to cotton. Cold spells and wind have considerably retarded, and in some cases completely checked, the germination and growth of seedlings, necessitating a fairly large amount of re-sowing. Some early-sown fields have had to be re-sown two or three times. Sowing has almost been completed. Very slight attacks of cut-worm, soreshin, wilt and aphids were reported from some districts in Lower and Middle Egypt."

The April report of the Ministry of Public Works on irrigation reads as follows:—

Lower Egypt.—During the first half of the month the demands for cotton sowings were at their greatest, and much difficulty was experienced throughout that time. In the last half of the month the difficulties were all in the North of the Delta and were enhanced by re-sowings due to the cold weather and berseem waterings in the South.

Middle Egypt.—The summer rotations started from April 1, at the rate of eight days working and 8 days stopping in Fayoum circle. In all other circles the rotations were at the rate of 6 days working and 18 days stopping.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Fair Inquiry for Egyptian.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended May 16:—

The inquiry for Egyptian cotton has again been on a very fair scale, and, as in previous weeks, a steady business of about 1,000 bales per diem has resulted, in spite of futures markets, which showed considerable fluctuations. Sakellaridis, 15½d. to 17½d., has claimed the greater part of the inquiry, and on one day only was the latter figure exceeded by purchasers. F.G.F. Sakellariadis to-day is fetching about 85 on contracts, but as we pointed out last week, it is highly probable that this basis will harden as time goes on.

Uppers have been in fair request, but with little business resulting. There appears to be practically nothing in the market under 15½d. per lb., and would-be buyers are not tempted at this price. An inquiry frequently met with nowadays is that for "short staple Sakel and Uppers," coming presumably from the American section of the trade. Consignments of Tokar Sakellaridis have now arrived and are being offered. The cotton appears to be fully up to last year's crop, and should find ready buyers, provided, of course, that prices are kept within reasonable bounds. At present the prices asked vary considerably, and it is difficult to find out what exactly is the correct market value, particularly as spinners are showing themselves to be very conservative in their purchasing, and up to the present have hardly proceeded beyond the "testing" stage.

Brown cotton and Nubari have been in moderate request with the customary limited selection and off-take. Here again prices have been somewhat irregular. Other growths have been neglected. Crop news from Egypt early in the week included reports of cold and heavy rains in the Delta, but apparently little damage was done. Forwardings to spinners for the week ended 11th instant were returned as 12,400 bales, or nearly double the two previous weeks' totals. Sales 5,200 (includes 640 Sudan).

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Larger Inquiry: Tone Better.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended May 19 states:—

General.—There has been possibly a rather larger inquiry during the past week, and the "tone" may, perhaps, be described as a little better, but the amount of business actually passing is still far short of what is required. Discussion proceeds as to the best means of rescuing the trade from its present deplorable condition, but there is not unanimity as to the measures necessary, and two mass meetings have been held this week, called by separate parties, to discuss the matter. It is to be feared, however, that until, by one means or another, the demand for Lancashire's productions becomes sufficient to absorb the whole output on a full-time basis the industry cannot be in anything but an unsatisfactory state, and whatever measures may be adopted can only operate to reduce to a certain extent the losses which seem inevitable. Next week, being Whit-week, Manchester will be virtually closed down.

Yarn.—Buying continues to be of small dimensions, and apparently purchasers are determined to restrict their operations to the minimum. Prices are nominally a little higher on the week in accord with the movement in raw cotton. Shipments during the month of April amounted to 10,895,400 lb., against 13,030,200 in March, and 21,327,800 lb. in April last year.

Cloth.—As in the case of yarn, buyers are apparently purchasing only from hand to mouth. India does little, but there has been some improvement in the demand for China. Egypt and the Levant have fallen off as compared with the last week or two. Shipments during April amounted to 316,278,700 square yards, against 337,411,500 square yards in March, and 302,598,200 square yards in April, 1922.

Raw Cotton.—There have again been considerable fluctuations, although these have not been so violent as in recent weeks. The weather news from the United States has, generally speaking, been unfavourable.

IMPERIAL OTTOMAN BANK

FOUNDED 1863.

Haiifa, April 28.

The market for cereals and sesame remains in the same favourable condition as in the previous week. Transactions have been numerous and important, and rates have been well maintained.

Jaffa.

The report for April states:—

Cereals.—A marked reaction in prices has been the result of the favourable rains at the end of the season, and some imports of barley and wheat from Syria and the Hauran. Consequently the market is restricted to the needs of local consumption, and there have been no transactions. At the same time it may be noted that about 300 tons. of lupins have been consigned to Marseilles, which has brought about a rise in the price of this commodity from P.E. 22 to P.E. 32 per kilo of 9 rotoles.

As regards the new crop the forecasts for wheat are very good, indicating double the yield of the preceding year. The barley crop leaves much to be desired, and it is to be expected that Palestine will import barley from Syria and abroad.

Oranges.—Despite the good prices obtained during the month of February, the season is ending with losses for orange growers. The losses are not very considerable, but the financial position makes them very serious in view of the approaching season. About 900,000 cases of oranges have been consigned to Great Britain, and the mean price obtained is about 12s. 6d.

ALLIANCE BANK OF SIMLA

The Imperial Bank of India, says a Calcutta Reuter telegram, announces that the arrangements for the payment to the Alliance Bank depositors of 50 per cent. of their deposits are now well in hand, and that it will be possible to make the payments immediately after the meeting of the Alliance Bank creditors, to be held on June 1, provided, of course, that this meeting confirms the liquidation arrangement made at the shareholders' meeting held on May 9. Such payments will cover all unsecured creditors.

SUEZ CANAL TRAFFIC.

A return which has just been issued of the shipping and tonnage passing through the Suez Canal in 1922 shows that the transits totalled 4,345, the vessels having a gross tonnage of 28,610,922, and a net tonnage of 20,743,245. The receipts totalled 168,856,537 francs. The British flag was easily predominant, vessels flying it numbering 2,736, or 63 per cent., the gross tonnage of the vessels being 18,423,942. Holland was second with 455 vessels, or 10.5 per cent., and Italy was third with 225 vessels, or 5.2 per cent.

The sixth international Mining Exhibition will be opened at the Royal Agricultural Hall on June 1. Among the Governments officially taking part in the exhibition is that of Roumania.

Major Frank Holmes states that he has obtained from the Sultan Ibn Saud for the Eastern and General Syndicate, Ltd., London, a valuable oil concession covering an area of forty thousand square miles in the Hasa Province of Nejd, Arabia (says the Baghdad correspondent of the Times in a message dated May 14).

SUMMER IN EGYPT.

P. and O. Enterprise.

One of the chief problems with which shipping companies have to cope is the variation in the volume of traffic due to the seasons. Obviously the P. and O. Company is particularly affected by this factor, for the bulk of the Indian traffic is confined to a very definite period, while the Egyptian season begins in the autumn and ends in the spring. How to even things up so that the summer traffic is, at any rate, of reasonable dimensions is not a matter capable of easy solution by a passenger department. The P. and O. Line is now endeavouring to popularise the idea of visiting Egypt in the summer, and in an attractive little brochure they make out a very good case for a trip to the land of the Pharaohs at a time when the average Englishman is well content with the home climate. It is a common saying among permanent residents in Egypt, it is pointed out, that the summer is on the whole the most desirable season in the year. The heat is considerable, but never unbearable to those who are prepared to take their pleasures quietly. It would be folly, of course, to rush about in the afternoon, but in the morning and evening there are cooling breezes; and when the heat is decreasing in the late afternoon it is possible to play such games as tennis and golf, etc., or make excursions to points of interest. The up-country attractions, such as Thebes and Luxor are out of the question, but it is not necessary to see them to obtain an intimate glimpse of the real Egypt—the Egypt freed from the unrealities inseparable from swarms of tourists. There are many other advantages. Prices are lower all round. Passenger rates are reduced, hotel prices are down, and—a factor that will appeal perhaps at least as much as anything else—there is the certainty of travel throughout in conditions of absolute comfort free from “the madding crowd.” These are the main inducements: others will be found set out in the brochure in question. How far this attempt to develop a passenger traffic to Egypt in summer will succeed must remain to be seen. Of its possibilities there is no doubt, but it is also at least probable that the number of those who can be induced to make the experiment will be at least limited, for the call of England in summer is not a negligible factor. But the tour will undoubtedly prove attractive to the large section who are not tied to a summer in England by links of games (one of the closest ties of all), society, or the varied forms of sport that cannot be classified as games.

BLACK SEA GRAIN.

I Near (says the London correspondent of the Journal of Commerce) that there is a good prospect for a large crop of grain from the Black Sea area which the Russians are hoping to export. Presumably it will be done by the State, as private enterprise as regards exporting would not be permitted and the countryside is still under martial law. Added to which the Black Sea is not yet clear of mines, so that even if the rumour should come to anything, it would be a risky business to send steamers to load in that part of the world.

The Mercantile Bank of India, Ltd., will shortly open a branch in Simla.

The Land and Mortgage Company of Egypt recommends a dividend of 6 per cent., less tax, for the year.

The Prince Line is organising a new service of steamers between the North-West American ports and Newcastle.

The quantity of gold extracted from the mines in India during February amounted to 35,692 oz., valued at Rs. 21,01,721.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Lausanne Conference.

With the settlement of the Greco-Turkish question, a spirit of optimism prevails at Lausanne, and estimates of the time now required for the signature of the peace treaty vary from a week to a fortnight. Apart from the possibility of misunderstandings in the Council chamber, however, the proceedings at Angora, where representatives of Allied business interests are negotiating with the Turkish Government, introduce an unknown factor into the situation. In the course of a statement, issued by the British delegation, on the progress made by the Conference it is pointed out that the Allied Governments are hopeful that the final settlement of the question of the concessions will not seriously delay the conclusion of peace. There the matter must be left for the moment. The Turks, it is satisfactory to note, are credited with a more accommodating spirit than they showed at the beginning of the Conference, the reason for which may be either a clearer understanding on their part of the subjects under discussion or the fact that Ismet Pasha has been accorded by Angora a wider discretion than he appeared to have during the first Conference. Now that it has recovered from the first shock of finding out what Turkish independence is to entail, the world is interested to note every tendency on the part of the Turks to conform to Western standards in matters political or economic.

Bulgaria and Karagatch.

The actual territory to be ceded by Greece to Turkey in the place of reparations is a sector on the right bank of the Maritza stretching from just north of Bosnakeui to a point above the junction of the Arda and Maritza, and comprising a little over seven miles of railway line on either side of Karagatch station. The break in the running powers over the railway between Bulgaria and Dedeagatch is, therefore, complete, unless special arrangements are made to obviate the anomaly of a short section of railway belonging to Greece from the Bulgarian frontier to the Arda, then a Turkish section, followed by a Greek section to Kuleli Burgas and beyond to Dedeagatch. It is hardly to be wondered in the circumstances that Bulgaria has protested against this solution of the Greco-Turkish question, in laying stress on the fact that what was Bulgarian territory at the end of the War has been given to her ally.

Bulgarian Political Trials.

The arrangements for the trial of the Ministers of the Gueshoff, Daneff, and Malinoff Cabinets, it is announced from Bulgaria, are now completed. The accused Ministers are shortly to be brought to Sofia to learn the details of the indictment against them, and will then be allowed two weeks in which to prepare their defence. It is possible for M. Stambolisky's Government to urge in justification of this trial that it has been forced upon it not only by the verdict of a referendum and a special vote in Parliament, but also by the distinct pledge of a former Minister, when intervening to save the lives of several of the accused from a hostile crowd. The plea can hold good in the special circumstances of the case, although it will never carry with it, at least in the West, exoneration for the policy that has brought about this persecution of political opponents who did not belong to the one Cabinet actually to blame for Bulgaria's entry into the War. In Western eyes it is likely to be regarded as unfortunate that M. Stambolisky, who has shown strength of character and determination in so many other directions, has not tried to deter his followers from plunging Bulgaria into the maelstrom of a political vendetta. The personal factor does not enter into the question, as far as the British public is concerned. It seems merely a trait in Bulgaria's political life which, if encouraged by an adverse verdict against the accused Ministers, will undermine the unity of the country and seriously impair abroad the reputation of the Government that has been so successful hitherto in raising Bulgaria in the estimation of the world.

Croatia and Serbia.

Elsewhere in this issue we publish a letter from M. Raditch, the Croatian Agrarian leader, in which he sets out to explain "the real political situation in Croatia." The one thing that does emerge from his letter is the bitter hostility that exists between the Croats and the Serbs, and it will be a disappointment to many people outside Yugoslavia, who are eager to welcome any sign of statesmanship in the Balkans, from whatever party it may come, to find that M. Raditch makes little attempt to leave the well-worn theories of Republicanism in order to expound a definitely practical policy. The true and unshakable resolve of the Croats, we are assured, is to have a republic of their own. In the Yugoslav Federation a nucleus is to be provided by a Republican Croatia and a militarist, centralist Serbia; the other communities are to be free to decide whether they wish to join as federal units or as part of a Great Serbia. As far as can be judged from M. Raditch's tactics in holding his party aloof from Parliament, because he finds himself in a minority, the policy of his Republican Croatia is always to be negative. He stands for pacifism and neutrality; by the latter term he implies an attitude that will relieve Italy of all anxiety in regard to the eastern coast of the Adriatic. Here is an admirable programme in outline; but to be effective it must be endorsed by Yugoslavia as a whole, and until M. Raditch and his followers are prepared to play their part in Parliament with the object of leavening the militarist lump it is not difficult to understand why he is accused of separatism and défaitisme, and why other parties in Yugoslavia hesitate to throw in their lot with the Croats. If M. Raditch could bring himself to discard the word "republic," which gives offence to the great majority of Southern Slavs, and were to be content with identically the same political status under the name of autonomy, Croatia would detect no difference in her political system, but would have some chance of securing the adoption by the whole of Yugoslavia of the pacific and neutral policy favoured by the Croats.

Irak and the Kurds.

The report that the Kurdish leader, Sheikh Mahmoud, has offered his submission to the Irak Government, and is to be pardoned on condition that he resides at Baghdad, taken in conjunction with the reception accorded to King Faisal at Mosul, suggests that conditions on Irak's northern frontiers have materially improved, in spite of Turkish claims. If Sheikh Mahmoud should be brought to Baghdad, it is to be hoped that the mistaken policy which once before restored to him his liberty will not be repeated. He was the instigator of the Kurdish rising in Suleimaniyah in May, 1919, when the British in the town were seized and imprisoned. Towards the end of last year it was reported that he had returned from captivity and had again been installed at Suleimaniyah with a British officer as adviser. Sheikh Mahmoud, however, had no intention apparently of "running straight," and not the least of his offences is that he has succeeded in misleading the authorities in Irak at the expense of Kurdish leaders whose loyalty was above suspicion. Recent operations in the Kurdish mountains appear to have convinced him that the British are easier to get on with than to oppose, but it remains to be seen whether his promise of good behaviour implies willingness to be under Arab watch and ward in Baghdad.

Excavations in Afghanistan.

It is satisfactory to learn that the French have no intention of interpreting in any selfish spirit the "exclusive rights of archaeological research" in Afghanistan that have recently been accorded to them by the Amir. The monopoly may have been intended as nothing more than a personal tribute to M. K. Foucher, the distinguished French scholar and authority on Buddhism, who is carrying out excavations in Afghanistan under the auspices of the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles Lettres; but, coinciding, as it did, with a determined effort on the part of France to insist upon the closeness of the ties binding France to Afghanistan, it could not fail to engender misgivings in Great Britain. Quite apart from political considerations, which, after all, would not affect the British archaeologists, there was the legitimate anxiety lest, as a result of the French "monopoly," Afghanistan should be virtually closed to archaeological research. The extent to which Frenchmen are likely to be able to carry out excavations in the country is necessarily limited, and there could be no justification for closing the whole of Afghanistan to all other excavators. The French Government appears to have recognised the force of the argument, and it is announced that British archaeologists are to be asked to co-operate. In a letter to The Times, Sir Thomas Holdich points out that it is desirable that excavations should not be confined to Kabul, and suggests that Afghan Turkestan and Badakshan offer far more favourable sites. "The existence of pre-Alexandrian Greek colonies within the Oxus basin might be confirmed," he adds, "and the secrets hidden by that most ancient city Balkh (mother of all cities, according to local tradition) might at length be given to the world of history."

India and the New Ministry.

India played a very unimportant part in last week's ministerial crisis, if it was a crisis, and her affairs remain in the safe hands of Viscount Peel and Lord Winterton. The new Prime Minister has, we think, no record in regard to Indian affairs—at least, we cannot recall any occasion on which he has referred to them in public, and he ought to be less unwelcome to advanced politicians in India than Lord Curzon would have been, but we anticipate that they will find little difficulty in writing him off in advance as a reactionary. Is he not a "die-hard"? And is he not related to Mr. Kipling, whom they do not in the least appreciate? Speaking for ourselves, we think it is well for India at the present juncture that the Prime Minister has no past to live down. An English gentleman, familiar with modern big business, and at the same time devoted to country life, is in the best position to see Indian problems in a clear light and to contribute to their solution the steadiness of purpose which the conditions of the moment most require.

The Frontier Criminals.

It is not very easy to understand the actual position with regard to the criminals who perpetrated the recent outrage at Kohat. On the one hand, an "authority" has told us that they fled to Afghanistan because they were sure of finding a ready welcome at the hands of the Amir, but, on the other hand, statements emanating from official sources encourage the hope that the Amir will hand them over to British justice. It would be futile to speculate on the eventual result. The murderers have obviously become pawns in the never-ending game of Asiatic diplomacy, and their ultimate fate will be determined not by their deserts, but by the balance of interests and sentiments which it is the business of the diplomatists to strike. Abuse of the Amir such as may be read in some of the papers just now strikes us as peculiarly irrelevant. It is surely better to recognise that his position is exceedingly difficult, and that, since our interests lead us to desire friendly relations with his country, we must take him for what he is—a young despot who has made a good start, but who is not yet master of his environment.

The Burden of the Salt Tax.

The cable has furnished no recent information regarding the progress of the agitation against the increased salt tax, while the latest mail news shows that, except in Bombay and Karachi, its start was not very impressive. The weather, of course, has been against it, and it would be premature to speak of failure; but for the moment the North, East, and South of India have many topics of greater urgency. Meanwhile, it is more interesting to know the actual extent of the burden than the volume of talk to which it has given rise. The last number of the Bombay Labour Gazette, which we are glad to see has so far escaped the axe of the economist, shows that a family spending a pound a month, and most families in Bombay city now have more than that, will pay something less than a halfpenny monthly as the result of the new duty. It is not a very large item on which to build an agitation, but, judging from the Indian papers, it is the nearest approach to a popular grievance which exists, and something can no doubt be made of it by the men with whom agitation is a business or a pleasure.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

The New Ministry.

The choice of Mr. Stanley Baldwin as Prime Minister was an extremely popular one, and has aroused no criticism from impartial sources. Much sympathy, it is true, has been expressed on behalf of Lord Curzon, who missed the chief post by apparently so narrow a margin, but it cannot be doubted that the actual selection coincided better with the present temper of the nation. Of the new Prime Minister little is known, except that he is a business man who both knows his own mind and is not likely to meddle in other people's affairs; and for such a reverse of Mr. Lloyd George the electorate was perfectly prepared. Naturally, much has been made of the tremendous difficulties which he has to face, of the colossal incubus of trouble that he has inherited, and so on; but that is said nowadays of all our Prime Ministers when they take office.

One very welcome sign that Mr. Baldwin understands the psychology of our time aright is his request to Mr. McKenna to be Chancellor of the Exchequer. This ex-Liberal Minister has temporarily refused the offer on the ground of ill-health, and the Premier will, for the time being, carry out the two functions. This move of his has disappointed sadly the party-mongers, who are still full of their stupid parrot-cries of "reunion"; but by the mass of the people it has been hailed with delight, for it means that the Prime Minister will seek ability where he can find it, and that he places the nation above the party.

The new Ministry does not dazzle one with its brilliance, but perhaps it is none the worse for that. It contains only two new names, of which that of Lord Robert Cecil is the more notable. Lord Robert, who is by no means the quixotic pilgrim that both sentimentalists and cynics love to paint him, has joined the Cabinet as Lord Privy Seal, but one would not be surprised if some more substantial post were soon found for him. He is an extremely able man; who, when he approaches any particular problem very nearly, infuses into his idealism much shrewd common sense. One need think only of a recent speech of his upon the Ruhr question, when he confounded those of his admirers who were expecting an unqualified attack upon the policy of the French. That he will one day become Foreign Secretary is a far safer thing to say than are most political prophecies.

It is felt, then, that the new Ministry is vital and alert; that it is likely to accord well with the nation's contemporary sentiment; in short, that it has a great and deserved chance of success. Above all, it is its obvious straightness and "non-political" character that appeal to the people. If it can steer clear of party intrigues and disregard the captious criticism which it is patently destined for, its tenure of office should be secure and long. The reconstruction that is promised at the end of the summer may involve the addition of one or two famous names; but it should not radically disturb the simple nature of the Government.

The Political Wilderness.

Mr. Austen Chamberlain further emphasised the aridity and barrenness of that "wilderness" to which he and his friends betook themselves in pursuit of the hardy pilgrim, Mr. Lloyd George, by publishing in the papers this morning a dismal letter, in which he bemoans the fact that Mr. Baldwin's Ministry was constructed before he and his colleagues were consulted. Quite definitely this letter has done him harm, and though excuses are being made for him on the ground that Lord Birkenhead and others inspired the writing of the letter, it would appear that the die of these men, as far as party advancement is concerned, is cast.

Somewhat naturally, Lord Birkenhead and Mr. Churchill were absent from the Conservative meeting at the Hotel Cecil to-day, when Mr. Stanley Baldwin was unanimously elected leader of the party. Lord Curzon is said in eloquent magnanimity to have appealed for party unity, and Mr. Baldwin, in director fashion, said that he for his part would throw no more faggots on the fire. All of which is extremely satisfactory.

Newspaper Prices.

To anyone inside the newspaper world the recent announcement by The Times and the Daily Telegraph that their price in future would be twopence instead of a penny-halfpenny caused little surprise. These two papers fourteen months ago made what was admittedly a shot in the dark; they described their descent to a penny-halfpenny as a step "in advance of economic conditions." Now they find that the costs of newspaper production are still almost as high as they have been at any time since the War, and have reverted to the price of two-pence. The Times is, I should say, worth that sum, for, quite apart from its news value, which is still high, it has advanced particularly in its sports and literary pages. Its sporting comments are, in fact, among the best in modern journalism. How the rise in price will affect the circulation of these two papers it is difficult to say; that it will have some effect is certain—one will surely not see it so often in third-class railway carriages—and the fact that the Morning Post lost few readers through maintaining through all this time its price at two-pence is not quite relevant. There would always be readers of the Post, even though its price were sixpence; for to it there attaches a loyalty of which no other paper can boast. You may hear a man drily dilate on the sectional advantages of the Telegraph; you may even, if you go far enough in club-land, find men who have read to the end the leaders of The Times; but you will never hear the opinions of these two papers repeated as if they were the speaker's own. But a Post reader you can always tell, generally by the sincerity, and occasionally by the futility, of his utterances.

'Mariage a la Mode.'

It is very curious how ignorant beliefs about contemporary manners arise. If, for instance, you asked the average person whether people nowadays were marrying less and later in life than they used, the answer would certainly be in the affirmative. We had undoubtedly come to think that the growing independence of women, the general precariousness of the financial outlook for men, and, of course, the enormously increased wisdom of both sexes, had all helped to make modern marriage remoter and scarcer. But we now learn that we were all wrong. For the Registrar-General, in his Statistical Review of England and Wales for the year 1921, states that there were in that year only 59,130 fewer marriages than in 1920, which was a record year for this country. Not since 1874, in fact, when discretion was a vice unknown and marriage regarded as an inevitable duty, has there been such an outburst of devotion as there was two years ago—the War years, of course, being excluded. Another surprise which the Registrar-General springs on us lies in his disclosure of the ages at which the pairs in 1921 most usually blossomed forth; they were 24 for men and 21 for women. So nothing, it seems, really does change, and that which has the most appearance of change, human nature, least of all.

The Sulks of May.

Eights Week is here, May Week is on us, Ascot approaches, and still the weather shows no sign of relenting. After a thoroughly upright and sunny childhood, May has simply gone to the dogs, and sulks nowadays under the greyest of skies and the wettest of clouds. Bowlers have literally gathered wickets to their bosoms, though this cannot be said of the frozen fielders. One tries quite vainly to remember on which day the sun was last seen, and doubtfully hopes that June will compensate for this month's miserable niggardliness. Facetious folk—this country breeds them—are rather hoping that the bad weather will last out this month, in order, apparently, that some sort of "record" (such people do not mind whether a thing is bad or good, so long as it is a record) may be established. But all good people say a plague on these weather connoisseurs; let us save our coal bills and have another century from Hobbs. I can well imagine what the team from the West Indies is saying about our weather; for a short time during the War I served with them, and can easily understand how, unless they brought something strong and comforting from Jamaica, they were able to vanquish Sussex, which is by no means without a reputation for the vigour of its oaths.

The People's Theatre.

The People's Theatre, to the plans for which I referred some months ago, began at the Pavilion Theatre, Whitechapel, to-day with John Masefield's translation of the Norwegian play "The Witch." The scheme is to give one play a week, and an idea of the quality of the plays can be obtained from the first month's programme, which contains Shaw's "You Never Can Tell," Ibsen's "Ghosts," and Zola's "Thérèse Raquin." There seems no reason that this mixture of the best British and foreign modern plays should not succeed, but so many schemes with the noblest motives have been started in this country and have miserably collapsed that one can build but scanty hopes. But the effort deserves to be recorded, if only as a sign that the ways of escape from that commercial swamp of the theatres of which at the present we are hearing over-much are more than one and are still being pursued.

Street Nomenclature.

A proposal to rename Old and New Bond Street simply Bond Street has ripped deep into the traditions of Londoners. The Westminster City Council has suggested not only that the two Bond Streets should be so merged, but that that part of Regent Street which lies south of Piccadilly Circus should be incorporated in Waterloo Place. The Regent Street proposal is not apparently causing much offence; in fact, it is by many regarded as sensible. No one, I think, minds very much what goes on south of the Circus; but to meddle with the Bond Streets is really sacrilege. We have Holborn and High Holborn, Oxford Street and New Oxford Street; why on earth not New and Old Bond Street? It is, one knows, frequently pointed out how difficult it is for foreigners to find their way amid all these complications; but there is no great harm, after all, in preserving London for the Londoners. Sufficient is being done to standardise and make uniform the buildings in our big streets: must we also in our names for them submit to this hustling cry of efficiency? Some nations would by this time have called a street in the West End after Mussolini, and one in the East End after Lenin; but we do not so lightly conduct our affairs, and cling to the old names merely but also more purely because they are old.

The Bairam Receptions.

This week the Ramadan fast came to an end, and the four-day feast of Bairam took place. On the first day the King held his usual reception at Abdin Palace, and it was well attended by the Egyptians, but not by the European element. Government offices will only reopen for business tomorrow morning. A happy forerunner of the feast was the release two days previously of the members of the Wafd Committee, who were sentenced last year by a Military Court and condemned to seven years' penal servitude and £E5,000 fine each. For some time now Yehia Pasha Ibrahim, the Prime Minister, has been negotiating with the British authorities for the release of these seven Egyptians, and their fines having been paid, the British Government consented to commute the rest of their term.

There was an interesting little ceremony on Abdin Square this week when a parade of British Army machine gun sections took place before King Fuad. The display attracted a large crowd, and gave rise to some most extraordinary rumours, but the explanation was that His Majesty had expressed his great interest in the smaller form of artillery now used by the British Army, and at his request a demonstration was made with machine guns—Lewis and Hotchkiss—in the garden within the Palace.

The Turf Club Secretary.

All Anglo-Egyptians, both those who have retired from Egypt as well as those who are still resident here, will have learned with the deepest regret of the impending retirement of Mr. Harry Aspinall. For over thirty years, as secretary, he has watched over the destinies of the Turf Club, and from its somewhat precarious infancy he has brought it through many vicissitudes to its present relatively prosperous state. During the war years Harry Aspinall more than did his "bit," for he carried on, without any assistance and without any leave, the work which had been rendered additionally heavy by the fact that the club had thrown open its doors to all who held His Majesty's Commission. It is undoubtedly as a result of that strain that his health is no longer equal to the task, and I am sure I am but echoing the sentiments of all who have at any time been or are at present members of the Turf Club, when I say that no pension and honorary life membership were ever better earned than those voted to him by the committee, and that no feature in Egypt's social life will be more missed than the urbane and charming personality of Harry Aspinall.

The Tutankhamen Find.

The objects from the tomb of King Tutankhamen were transported this week from the Valley of the Kings to the river. It was an exceedingly arduous and difficult piece of work, owing to the size and weight of the cases, the bad state of the road, and the difficult gradients, but Mr. Howard Carter and his staff achieved wonders, and the entire transport took place without any untoward incident. From Luxor the objects are being brought down under a strong police guard by water to Cairo, where they will be stored in the Museum until accommodation has become available for the display of such of the objects as are now in a condition to be exhibited.

Mr. Carter and his two trusted companions, Messrs. Mace and Callender, leave the valley this week for good, and will not return until the autumn, by which time it is to be hoped they will have had a good rest—which they more than deserve—and will be ready to cope with the very great problems of removal from the inner chambers of the tomb which still confront them.

The Public Works.

The Ministry of Public Works has just issued its latest report. It deals with the work done in the year 1919-1920, so that, apart from its value as a document of reference, it has little topical interest. Admittedly data for such reports are more difficult to collect than in the case of reports of other administrations; but it should surely be possible to publish more quickly than has hitherto been the case. The information contained in the present document is already three years old. Two subsequent reports—those for 1920-1921 and 1921-1922—are already overdue, and the working year 1922-1923 is approaching its end. It is to be hoped that, in view of the great interest taken in its activities, the Ministry will speed up its publication office and in future not allow its reports to get so seriously in arrears.

The Education of the Poor.

A munificent donation has just been made to the Islamic Benevolent Society by a notable of Alexandria named Khalil Bey Ibrahim. His donation has taken the form of a block of first-class shares valued at over £E10,000; the revenue from which he lays down shall be devoted to the education of poor Moslems. This is a noteworthy action, for in the past Egyptians as a whole have shown themselves remarkably lacking in public spirit and especially neglectful of their duties to their poorer brethren in matters of education.

The last notable donation in this respect took place two years ago, when Aly Bey Fahmy Kamel gave a wakf of £E4,000 for scholarships for deserving Egyptians, but, so far, nothing has ever

BULGARIA.

Sofia, May 21.

The New Sobranye.

To-day the new Sobranye will be formally opened, and 200 Agrarian Deputies will make their first acquaintance with Parliamentary life. The Opposition benches will be very empty, as it is not certain whether the fifteen Bourgeois members will attend the Chamber. If they abstain, sixteen Communists and two Social-Democrats will be the only non-Agrarian elements.

The Sobranye's session will be of comparatively short duration, as it is a well-known fact that Agrarian Deputies do not like to be away from home at harvest-time. For this reason only four measures will be discussed. They are: The Reparations Convention, the Bill providing for the suppression of Communism, the Bill regulating payment by Bulgarian Nationals to France and Belgium, and the modification of the Constitution.

Macedonian Autonomists.

During this month a lively exchange of hostilities, both wordy and bloody, has occurred between the Government and the Macedonian autonomists. The latter took the somewhat ill-advised course of presenting an ultimatum to M. Stambolisky regarding the latter's policy in Macedonia. M. Stambolisky's reply was to mobilise his Agrarian guards and inform M. Todor Alexandroff, the Chief Autonomist, that if any Agrarian was maltreated, severe reprisals would ensue. At the present moment both sides are watching each other as a cat watches a dog. Neither side is willing to open hostilities, as it is realised that the consequences thereof may well be terrible. Nevertheless the Agrarians are preparing for all emergencies, and their Ministers are most jealously guarded. M. Stambolisky himself has been living at his native village, Slavovitza, for the past three weeks, and even now it is not certain whether he will attend the opening of the Sobranye this afternoon.

Conciliatory Greece.

Greek policy, which, since the Armistice, has been continuously hostile to Bulgaria, is undergoing a change. From Lausanne it is announced that M. Venizelos, acting through a British channel, has approached the Bulgarian Delegate, M. Kosta Theodoroff, with a view to the unconditional cession of the port of Dedeagatch. M. Venizelos specifies that the corridor between the Bulgarian frontier and the Aegean Sea should be put under the administration of the League of Nations, while the railway should be internationalised. This offer, although not strictly official, has created a good impression in Bulgaria, and additional details are eagerly awaited. Not content with this offer, however, Greece's Foreign Minister, M. Alexandris, has signified his intention of coming to Sofia in order to discuss with M. Stambolisky the general question of Greco-Bulgarian relations. M. Stambolisky has said that he will be glad to see M. Alexandris, but no definite date has been fixed for his arrival. A third coincidence is that there has been a change in Greek diplomatic representation at Sofia. M. Raphael, who for the last year has acted as Chargé d'Affaires, has been recalled to Athens, where he will occupy a post at the Foreign Ministry. M. Marchetti will for the moment act as Chargé d'Affaires.

These facts show that Greece has at last realised that it will not be wise to become totally estranged from Bulgaria. Foreigners who are real friends of Greece have constantly warned her that no lasting good can come out of an anti-Bulgarian policy, and it would now appear that their advice has been regarded.

Refugee Settlement.

A telegram from Athens announces that the League of Nations are contemplating the issue of an international loan in aid of Greek refugees. The telegram goes on to say that nearly a million refugees are stranded in Greece without work and without food. From a humanitarian point of view everyone will agree that the League should do its utmost to help these unhappy people. At the same time, it is not without interest to see what Bulgaria has done with her three-quarter of a million refugees. She received half a million in 1919, mostly from Macedonia, Thrace, and the Dobruja. Beyond granting them land and certain facilities for building houses, she has left them severely alone. The consequence has been that, although suffering a good deal of hardship, the people in question have succeeded in installing themselves, and are now self-supporting citizens. At the end of 1920 a second batch of refugees arrived. They consisted of fifty thousand Russians, and they were followed in 1921-1922 by about two hundred thousand Turks, Armenians, and even Greeks. These refugees received little more attention than their predecessors, but they have also for the most part become self-supporting. In Bulgaria charitable organisations are the exception rather than the rule. The Shade of Dr. Johnson: "As Boswell has recorded, I told Ogilvie that 'the noblest prospect which a Scotchman ever sees is the high road that leads him' out of Scotland! You, Johnnie Walker, have made it equally pleasant to the rest of the world."

refugee is left to look after himself, and in the majority of cases he is all the better for this treatment.

There is, however, just one more side to the question. If the League of Nations succeed in floating a refugee loan, the claims of refugees in Bulgaria should certainly not be neglected. Greece's financial position is always described as desperate, but the drachma is worth two and a-half levas, and the Greeks have no reparations to pay. Bulgaria, unfortunately for herself, lacks the means of advertising her needs in England and other European countries. She has no influential colonies or bankers, but as her refugees number almost as many as Greece's, surely she has right to a certain amount of financial assistance.

The Voluntary Army.

Bulgaria was deprived of her conscript army by the Neuilly Peace Treaty, and a voluntary system providing for twelve years' service was substituted. In spite of the fact that the duration of service has been reduced to six years, the voluntary system was always looked on askance by Bulgarians. Since M. Mouravieff, the Premier's nephew, became War Minister, things have, however, begun to take a turn for the better. M. Mouravieff, who is an ex-artillery officer, understands how to deal with the army. He is anxious that it should maintain its prestige, and he has not been slow in demanding the necessary credits from the Ministry of Finance. In addition, he has made several changes among the higher ranks, of which the most notable is the nomination of Colonel Noikoff as Chief of Staff vice Colonel Topaljikoff. Colonel Noikoff bears the reputation of a good soldier, and is also something of a diplomat.

Among the rank and file the effect of the new régime is beginning to make itself felt. Raw recruits, commonly regarded as "good-for-nothings," have now a smart air about them. The regimental officers, although very inexperienced, are keen young men who, while realising that their profession is passing through lean years, hope that the future may open up brighter prospects. In general, the army shows signs of gradual rebirth, and, with the splendid traditions that it possesses, it should not be difficult to build up a proper fighting force.

General News.

Bishop Gore, former Bishop of Oxford, has been spending a few days in Sofia.

M. de Rincquesin, Financial Adviser to the Inter-Allied Commission, has been appointed chief of the French Financial Mission in London, and will leave Sofia early in June to take up his new post.

The newspapers Slovo and Epocha are still suspended.

The Ministers of the Gueshoff, Daneff, and Malinoff Cabinets will be brought to Sofia this week in order that the accusations levied against them may be read out.

PALESTINE.

Jerusalem, May 11.

An Anglo-Jewish Colony.

Gezer, "the Mound of Many Cities," seems destined to receive yet another stratum of civilisation. Last Tuesday an interesting ceremony took place when the High Commissioner "cut the first sod" of what is hoped to become a new Jewish settlement in Judæa, near the village Abu Shusheh (Why will our local authorities perpetuate the unsatisfactory and misleading French transliteration "Abou Chucho" in the face of their own transliteration rules?), to the north of Ramleh on the way to Jerusalem, a site identified fifty years ago by the French archæologist Clermont-Ganneau with ancient Gezer. Many other Jewish settlements have, of course, been inaugurated up and down Palestine during the last few years; but the particular interest in this case is that the proposed colony is to be Anglo-Jewish. This is a new feature in the Jewish National Home. English Jews have been much in evidence in the political manoeuvres bearing on the future of Palestine, but, having quite comfortable quarters in England, they have had little or no share in the actual digging the soil and piling up the bricks of their "Home" (and the rest of Jewry is even convinced that English Jewry has not done anything like its share in raising money for the various funds which are to build up Jewish Palestine).

There exists a body of Jews in England, oddly named "The Ancient Maccabæans." In pre-War days these people formed themselves into a company for acquiring land-holdings in Palestine "either for personal occupation or for profitable development." Not till the past year did they find it possible to carry out their intentions, and then they acquired a tract of land (a little more than a square mile) from some Siberian Jews, who had previously worked it and found it unprofitable. The intention, or hope, is that some fifty or a hundred families from the British Dominions will settle there. The moving spirit is Mr. Herbert Bentwich, father of our Attorney-General, Mr. Norman Bentwich.

The Opening Ceremony.

This opening ceremony was carried through with much aplomb; most of the higher officials of the Government, local "notables," including a sprinkling of Arabs, Jerusalem "Girl Guides," and the military band, paraded. Mr. Herbert Bentwich gave the opening speech, describing the history and efforts of the "Ancient Maccabæans" and how they had chosen this site as being historic Maccabæan country and containing the remains of a real Maccabæan stronghold—the foundations of the very house built by Simon Maccabæus, with Modin, the home of the Maccabees, not far away. The High Commissioner replied with a succinct summary of the history of the spot and warm hopes for the success of the undertaking.

The Elections.

Not much is heard at the moment of the Palestine elections. The Jews will tell you that the boycott by the Arabs was a failure, and the Arabs are convinced that it was an unqualified success, and that it has effectually baulked the prospects of the Legislative Council. The Arabs who took part in the elections are protesting against the persecutions to which they have been subjected owing to their loyalty. Otherwise there is perfect quiet.

Palestine at the Empire Exhibition.

Preparations are going ahead for a Palestine Pavilion at the British Empire Exhibition next year. Colonel Solomon, Director of the Department of Commerce and Industry, has been the leader in whipping up enthusiasm for the project. Unfortunately he is now on the point of leaving the country and the Administration, and this is, indeed, a serious loss to Palestine. He is one of the small number of Jewish higher officials, yet it is true to say that, beyond increasing the total number of Jewish Government officials by one, he has never incurred any hostile criticism from non-Jewish sources. I have never heard from Arab quarters anything but gratitude for the encouragement and direct or indirect help he has always held out to budding commercial enterprises. Colonel Solomon may well leave the country content with the reputation he has left behind him. What is to happen, however, to his department, his "Society for the Promotion of Travel in Palestine," and his various committees to prepare for the Palestinian representation in the coming exhibition, is more doubtful. In all probability they will be merged, on grounds of economy, into the Department of Customs and Revenue, and placed in the care of Mr. Barron, and, in the absence of their own creator, they could not have fallen into better hands.

The scheme for representing Palestine in the British Empire Exhibition is meeting with opposition in certain Arab circles. Thus the Jaffa Arab Bureau of Commerce has just issued a statement to the effect that it is convinced that the whole thing is nothing but Zionist propaganda, and that Palestine will get no good out of it, that the Bureau of Commerce refuses to have anything to do with the idea, and advises all other Arabs to follow its example.

None the less, Colonel Solomon has secured on his various committees the help of several of the wiser and more level-headed of the Arab business men.

Palestine Journals.

The last few months have seen the birth of one newspaper and the deaths of two. As noticed in these columns towards the end of last year, Ha-Aretz, the "Russian-Jewish" Hebrew daily paper, finished its life as a Jerusalem paper and took refuge in the suburbs of Jaffa. Its management did not work happily together, and one section of them tried to stir up once more former supporters in Jerusalem, and succeeded in producing a new paper, Eretz Israel, with much the same general policy and appeal as the original Ha-Aretz. Six weeks, however, were sufficient to use up their resources.

The other paper to disappear is the New Jerusalem, a daily sheet in English (and American), published and edited by an American lady, who, day after day, for a space of six months, turned out her paper (usually with an Arabic and a Hebrew edition also), courageously promulgating strong, though unpopular, views to the Palestine public, who willingly read the paper so long as it came to them gratis; but there proved to be no call for a daily paper preaching Christian Science, Prohibition, Saxon-Israelitism (or whatever the proper name may be), and giving a daily sermon of a bowdlerised Christian tone instead of an editorial along the conventional lines. This lady must have sunk some hundred thousand dollars in the country, for which Palestine may well be grateful, however much it has disregarded the lady's message.

Constantinople, May 15.

The Lausanne Conference.

The main topic of interest here still is, of course, the Conference at Lausanne, and although now and again the Turkish Press has a sabre-rattling fit and threatens the whole world with dire consequences unless peace is concluded with a stroke of the pen to-morrow, the general atmosphere is that of interested patience, for everyone knows that whatever the result achieved—if anything be achieved—nothing can be done in a hurry. There are even some Philistines who boldly say that nobody wants to hurry over the peace negotiations—not even the Turks. It is quite conceivable that the Philistines are right. It is very awkward for a constitutional government to conduct such important negotiations when it is in the middle of a general election, especially when the single assembly performs both legislative and executive functions, and, strictly speaking, as one of their wise men has rashly said, no act performed by any executive functionary is valid unless the Grand National Assembly, "which will be permanently in session," ratifies it.

Turkish Precautions.

Meanwhile, things are happening, if not at Lausanne, at any rate in Turkey. The closing of the Bank of Athens in Constantinople, and an apparently indefensible curiosity as to the contents of the safes rented by Greeks and Armenians in the Smyrna banks, have not increased public confidence. No one knows where this kind of thing is going to stop. The technical reason that the Bank of Athens is an enemy bank looks sound enough, and can be supported by numerous precedents, but—

The Turkish Government is greatly perturbed about the concentration of Greek troops along the Maritza, and considers that at the present moment offensive action by the Greeks is extremely probable. They are also much worried about reported Greek and Circassian bands on the islands off the Anatolian coast, and are daily repulsing "by their concentrated fire attempts of motor-boats and sailing craft to approach their coasts and land parties." Hence they are hitting out and trying to draw first blood. That would appear to be the inner significance of the offensive against the Bank of Athens.

The Chester Scheme.

All is not well with the Chester scheme. There appears to be a quarrel between the two protagonists, Mr. Arthur Chester and Mr. Clayton Kennedy. One of them has dismissed the other from his post in the combine, and it would be rash at the moment to say which is the dismitter and which the dismissee. In any case, such bickering at the outset does not augur well for the success of the scheme, hedged about, as it is, with quite enough awkward provisions, such as the proportion of Turkish personnel, the use of the Turkish language, and so on. One does not need to be a cynic to suggest that "there's many a slip 'twixt cup and lip," and that until we actually see these beautiful new railways running—and paying—and until we see Angora magnificently equipped as a modern capital city, we shall not join in the pæans of joy with which certain Turkish circles greeted the ratification of the project.

The Concessions Fever.

Concessions are very much in the air at present, and somebody in Lausanne has been telegraphing to the Ikdam that a powerful American group, anxious not to be outdone by their compatriots, is sending representatives to Angora with the object of securing the monopoly of the culture and export of Angora cats. Let us hope that the representatives will be competent to distinguish the youth of the genus cat from that of the genus dog.

Various plenipotentiary delegates representing important French interests have arrived with the object of negotiating with the Government concerning the future status of their companies. Also Signor De Nari, for the Italian interests, has left for Angora on a similar mission for his compatriots. Rumour has it that the French representatives were somewhat chagrined to find that the preparations for discussion on the Turkish side were in an inchoate condition, and that Frenchmen are not relishing the protracted stay in Angora which appears inevitable. Nothing at all is likely to happen until after Bairam—i.e., May 24.

Turkey and Persia.

The foreign relations of the Turkish Government are marked by an increasing tendency to cultivate the Persians and other Eastern Moslem nations. Muheddin Pasha, the Turkish Ambassador in Teheran, is reported to have done his country good service in bringing within the realm of practical politics a commercial treaty between Persia and Turkey. There have been several questions of a thorny nature in suspense between Turkey and Persia for some time, such as the alleged protection accorded by Turkey to turbulent bandits "wanted" by Teheran; but the unwelcome pressure exerted by Russia appears to have caused a rapprochement between the two Moslem countries.

Angora and Moscow.

Turkey's relations with the Bolsheviks have reached a rather acute phase, and Angora has been at some pains to emphasise its dislike of Communist agitation by laying hands upon all the Communist agitators which it can catch in flagrante delicto. There were the makings of a first-class incident just before May 1, when wild rumours began to circulate concerning a great Communist plot in Constantinople. It resolved itself into a rather commonplace police incident. A number of local Communist Labour agitators, a certain Turk Kiazim, a Greek named Stavridi, some Armenians, Bedros and Agop, were arrested with copies of various inflammatory appeals in the usual style appropriate to May 1. Since then a few more associates of these humble workers have been placed under lock and key, and it is said that their connection with Moscow has been definitely established from their papers and their confessions. The more prominent representatives of Moscow and all it stands for have, however, been left in peace; but they are said to be rather unhappy, especially as the departure of Araloff and staff from Angora appears to them to bode no good for their cause. The traditional hostility between Russian and Turk is undoubtedly gaining the upper hand over the somewhat factitious friendship which has been the mot d'ordre ever since Angora has been in need of Russian gold and munitions of war. The trouble seems to be that Russia now wants payment in kind for her "disinterested" benevolence, and Turkey shows no inclination to respond. Hence a certain coldness.

The Turkish Elections.

Internally, the main preoccupation at present is provided by the elections for the Grand National Assembly. Owing to the peculiar conditions surrounding political activities in Turkey, it is not easy to give a reasoned estimate of the chances of the various parties, first, because it is almost impossible to disentangle the various parties and factions one from another—there are so many of them; and, secondly, because methods are, to put it bluntly, somewhat Oriental. The general opinion seems to be that the Popular Party of Mustapha Kemal will have a good pull in a great part of the country owing to its command of the Executive; but that the numerous opposition groups are dangerous opponents in certain areas, particularly the Pontus. Constantinople and Adrianople are also said to be uncertain factors, and, notwithstanding an imposing list of candidates for Constantinople, which, according to the Vatan, includes Ismet Pasha, Kiazim Kara Behir, Ferzi Pasha, Rafet Pasha, Raouf Bey, Fethi Bey, Adnan Bey, etc., competent judges predict a stiff fight on the part of the opposition groups, reinforced by the remnants of the C.U.P. and the Conservative Old Turks.

General News.

To turn to matters of less general import, several straws show which way the wind is blowing. The Turco-Armenian Committee of Progress, which includes a number of prominent Armenians, has been sedulously propagating the idea of a serious entente, based upon community of interests, between the two mutually dependent races inhabiting Turkey.

The papers announce that 72 intending converts have applied to be allowed to embrace Islam since November 2 last, and 32 have completed the necessary formalities. They include French, Italians, Russians, and Greeks. The orphanages are being combed out, and some twenty orphans from the Armenian orphanage at Scutari have been claimed as Turks and transferred to Turkish orphanages—a reversal of the procedure of five years ago.

An excellent move has been taken by the Chief of Police, who has enacted that begging is forbidden, and all beggars must be arrested. We applaud, but we respectfully suggest that due provision should be made for reinforcing the city police force, and would inform the police directorate that, notwithstanding the edict, we are still forced to rush through the Grand Rue de Pera in this hot weather at 4 to 4½ miles an hour without a halt in order to avoid being accosted and pawed by a bewildering collection of beggars of all ages and stages of decrepitude.

Constantinople, May 22.

A Dangerous Situation.

We are in a state of suspended animation, like Micawber and Sister Ann, waiting for something to turn up. The blessed word "Bairam" has sustained many credulous souls for weary weeks, but here we are with Bairam in full blast, flags flying, drums silent during the night watches—and no peace. In fact, the atmosphere for the past week has been more than usually sultry. We are accustomed to the inveterate eternal hostility of the Greeks and Turks, but when their respective newspapers lose themselves daily in complicated calculations as to the military forces the other side has on the opposite bank of the Maritza, things are beginning to look awkward. To be quite serious, the situation created by the apparent deadlock at Lausanne on the subject of Greek reparations to the Turks is somewhat ominous. Fingers are fiddling with triggers, and it requires very little to cause a conflagration. All the elements of trouble are present. Neither power can afford to keep an army in the field indefinitely; money is dreadfully short on both sides, and although little matters like the soldiers' pay can be shelved for a certain time, there are important expenses incidental to keeping big armies in the field which cannot be so easily postponed indefinitely. Hence, with the prospect of a deadlock on the reparations questions, both sides are coming perilously near the decision that the cheapest way out of the impasse is to start fighting again; and if fighting comes, it will be in Europe this time, and with the best will in the world, it will be difficult to prevent other interested Powers taking a hand in it. In any case, it would render the already delicate position of the Allied Forces of Occupation a still more delicate one, for how they are going to hold the lists for both the combatants without fear or favour and at the same time maintain their own position vis-à-vis both sides is a problem that passes the wit of most men. Let us take comfort, however, from the reflection that here in the Orient the expected never happens, and that all our acute prognostications are most unlikely to materialise.

Lausanne, Angora, and Business.

Apart from these questions of high import, Lausanne and its provisional decisions or discussions are providing quite enough food for serious thought. The various representatives of the foreign companies established in Turkey are trickling through to Angora by devious ways, and by this time most of them are probably regretting the fact that some enterprising concessionaires have not yet got a hustle on and converted Angora into the model capital. In a few days now they should be hard at work trying to hammer out the best terms they can from a Turkish Government, out to make use of the Heaven-sent opportunity of striking the hardest bargain they can. The Turkish papers, with that cheery optimism which is becoming characteristic of them, opine that the negotiations will not last long—but they have been saying that about the Lausanne Conference too. There is one substantial difference in the circumstances. One must suppose that Angora is "dry."

Prohibition.

Constantinople, however, is still "wet." On the afternoon of the 15th, on the morning of which we were supposed to have foresworn spirituous liquors, nobody knew anything about the application of the dry law, but the following morning we were relieved to find that the vilayet had decreed that the application of the measure had been postponed for a month—i.e., till June 15, for the reason that so few declarations of stocks held had yet been received, and in order to give holders a chance of complying with the regulations. It sounds just a little unnatural as a serious excuse; but we must be duly thankful, and not look the gift-horse too closely in the mouth.

The Affair of the Bank of Athens.

The liquidators appointed by Angora to clear up the business of the Bank of Athens have arrived in Constantinople, and have been interviewed by representatives of the Press as to the manner in which they will carry out their task. The question of the legality of the Turkish action is still forming the subject of interviews and communications between Adnan Bey and the Allied High Commissioners.

The Elections.

There is no fresh news to report on the subject of the elections to the Grand National Assembly. The Vatan says that as the number of electors in Constantinople does not exceed 300,000, it will have the right to elect fifteen deputies, an increase of four over the last elections. It is anticipated that the elections in Constantinople will be completed a fortnight after Bairam, and that the Assembly will be able to meet before the end of June.

The Wasted Country.

Meanwhile the weather is heavenly. Although warm, it is not oppressively hot at any time of the day. The countryside is a mass of flowers. The Judas-trees and cherry-blossom are already finished, but the air is laden with the scent of acacia bloom, and an excursion into the country is almost capable of driving all thoughts of politics, wars, and alarms of wars out of your head for a few precious hours; but even out in the country you cannot get away from the unnatural emptiness of what ought to be a blossoming garden. There is something wrong with a state of affairs which allows a countryside like that around Constantinople to lie fallow except for a few patches not much bigger than a handkerchief. Solitudinem facerunt; but they cannot call it peace.

GREECE AND BRITISH RELIEF.

The Greek Minister of Hygiene and Public Assistance has addressed the following letter to the Save the Children Fund (42, Langham Street, London, W.1), which is co-operating with the Imperial War Relief Fund and the Friends' Relief Committee in the All-British Appeal for the Near East:—

"I have the honour to express to you by this letter the gratitude of the Greek Government and the Greek nation, as well as the thanks of many thousands of refugees, for your admirable effort in favour of those suffering crowds driven away from their homes. Your organisation, represented in Greece by Major E. de Lacy Barton, has really been working in a very difficult situation. The great help which you are offering to the Greek nation in this critical period, when we have had to accept into our country hundreds of thousands of unhappy refugees expelled by the Turks, will never be forgotten. Your organisation has shown a wonderful spirit of international solidarity. I hope that you will continue your philanthropic work in Greece.

(Signed) D. DOXIADES,

Minister of Hygiene and Public Assistance."

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND WESTERN THRACE.

A correspondent writes:—

I notice a slight error in the paragraph headed "Western Thrace," in the Bulgarian letter in your issue of May 3. The facts about Bulgarians being expelled to the islands are as stated. But the League of Nations did not "refuse to intervene." It referred the matter to the Refugee Department, under Dr. Nansen, who, in turn, detailed Colonel Proctor to carry out investigations, and the Mission now in Greece, under Colonel Proctor, is going into the question.

GREECE AND TURKEY.

The Allied Powers, as we ventured to hope last week, have not allowed the quarrel between Turkey and Greece, on the subject of reparations, to pass beyond their control. After a week of alarms and excursions, during which the Conference itself seems to have been a prey to the gravest misgivings, a settlement has been effected. At a prolonged meeting held on Saturday, at which the chief delegates of Yugoslavia and Roumania, as well as those of the four Great Powers and of the disputants, were present, agreement was reached on the basis of the transfer by Greece to Turkey, in the place of any monetary payment, of Karagatch and its suburbs. Greece admits her responsibility for the damage done in Asia Minor, but Turkey renounces her claim to reparation, and at the same time is guaranteed against having to pay for foreign property destroyed by the Greeks. Satisfaction over this settlement is inevitably tempered by the reflection that the issue ought not to have been allowed to reach a stage at which it threatened the peace of Europe. That Turks and Greeks should fail to agree on the subject of reparations was not unnatural in the circumstances; but there should have been no possibility of any attempt being made by either side to put an end to the deadlock by the resumption of hostilities. The attitude of Greece is not difficult to understand in the absence of a definite lead from the Powers. She has felt compelled to look after her own interests, and as she was guaranteed no security apart from what she could win for herself, her first task was to reorganise her army. Her chief danger lay in Turkey, and, accordingly, the reorganised army was massed where the Allies in their unwisdom propose to allow the Greek frontier to march with that of Turkey. From this point it was an easy step to threaten to take advantage of a local superiority of numbers over Turkish troops, in an attempt to wipe out the stigma of the defeat in Asia Minor, and entirely in keeping with Balkan traditions. If the Allies had seen fit to take effectual charge of the combatants, or, at least, of Greece, who would have welcomed the relief from further anxiety, there would have been no need for the heavy military expenditure in which the Greeks have been involved by the maintenance of a large standing army, and the proceedings at Lausanne would have been smoother.

At the conclusion of the negotiations last Saturday, we are told, M. Venizelos and Ismet Pasha shook hands, and in that act it is, perhaps, permissible to find an augury for a less hopeless state of affairs in the Near East than the future is generally supposed to hold. The 'Turks' view of the situation is that their troubles in the past have been mainly due to the fact that, with danger threatening them from neighbouring States, they are handicapped by the presence of large numbers of enemy nationals in their midst. Their first instinct, therefore, on securing liberty of action, has been to rid themselves of the Greeks in Asia Minor. It so happens, however, that with the Nationalist consciousness, setting special store on the letter as well as on the spirit of independence, has also arisen a keen desire for economic reconstruction and a better-equipped State. When the war-fever and victory-exaltation have passed, there can be little doubt that the dominant aspiration of the Turks will be for the fuller enjoyment of the advantages of modern civilisation. Fears of designs upon their political independence and territorial integrity will give place gradually to appreciation of the value of foreign help in the attaining of material prosperity, and with this will come the opportunity for the individual Greek in Turkey. The process will be helped if the Turks can feel assured that they have nothing to fear from a Greek desire for revenge. We could wish that, in shaking hands with Ismet Pasha, M. Venizelos intended to imply that Greece honourably accepted the logic of the situation, both for to-day and for the near future. She is not called upon to abandon her belief in her own destiny. That belief compelled her to impose a test on the new Turkey; but now that the latter has shown herself of a different mould from that of the old Turkey, Greece has nothing to be ashamed of in keeping within her own sphere and in responding to any friendly overtures from the Turks for such assistance as she has it in her power to render. If the new Turkey makes good, the Greeks will be the first to benefit; if it fails, Greece's opportunity will inevitably recur. Her chief concern should be that, if and when the day of Nationalist Turkey's failure arrives, she herself should be found ready and able to assume the new responsibilities. To this end she needs undivided attention on her own domestic affairs. At the present moment she has land frontiers with four States, and in the case of each neighbour there is some hindrance to the establishment of entirely cordial relations. It is not suggested that Greece alone is to blame for this state of affairs; but the fact remains, and if the Greeks are set upon consolidating their country, developing its resources, and making it ready to fulfil its destiny, they will at least give careful consideration to the removing of possible causes of offence to their neighbours.

For a long time it has been recognised, both in Greece and outside, that the Greeks have held a master-card in their hand in the possession of the territory that bars Bulgaria from access to the Ægean Sea. At any moment since the return of the Turks to Eastern Thrace was assured the voluntary surrender of a strip of this territory sufficient to give Bulgaria control of the railway line to Dedeagatch would have served a double purpose; it would have paved the way for Greco-Bulgarian friendship, and would have cut away the ground under any suspicion that Turkey might entertain of Greek intentions. Greece, or M. Venizelos, went as far as to suggest an exchange of Bulgarian territory—in the district south of the River Arda—for the railway strip; but Bulgaria refused to strike a bargain in regard to what had been promised her as a right by the Allied Powers. Now, in order to make her peace with Turkey at Lausanne, the Greek Government would seem to have bartered away her power to place on a satisfactory basis her relations with both Turkey and Bulgaria. The cession of Karagatch to the Turks interposes a second Power between Bulgaria and the Ægean Sea, and, even if Greece should still decide to hand over the railway to Dedeagatch to Bulgarian control, it must detract from the merit of the gift in Bulgaria's eyes. For the moment, the need for a settlement with Turkey was paramount, and it has been obtained without reference to the Article in the Treaty of Neuilly in which the Allies "undertake to ensure the economic outlets of Bulgaria to the Ægean Sea." The only sound aim to be kept in view in the Near East is a general and not a partial settlement. As peace cannot be established on a permanent footing until the question of Bulgaria's outlet to the Ægean is settled, it is to be hoped that an effort will be made at Lausanne to evolve an arrangement which will reconcile the interests of all concerned.

CROATIA AND SERBIA.

The Views of M. Raditch.

We are indebted to a correspondent for the following letter, written by M. Raditch, the Croatian leader, for publication:—

"I am sending you this letter to inform you upon the real political situation in Croatia and her neighbouring countries.

"(1) The true and unshakable resolve of the Croat people, of the Croat nation, expressed in hundreds of meetings comprising ten to fifty thousand heads, confirmed by 780,000 voters, and formulated by the constitutional Croat representation, that is by 70 Croat deputies, is the complete independence of Croatia (Croatia, Slavonia, Dalmatia) in a confederation with Serbia on the basis of an entente, by means of a treaty which would leave to Slovenia, to Bosnia-Herzegovina, to Batchka, to the Banat, to Montenegro, and to Macedonia the free choice by plebiscite either to remain tied to militarist and centralised Serbia or to enter into a federation with pacifist and neutral Croatia.

"(2) Croat pacifism is a general popular movement, so strong and deep that it has now become ineradicable. A whole people, a united nation of four millions, considers this pacifism as the corner-stone of all its international relations, and of its entire policy, whether domestic or foreign. It is only owing to this sentiment, now become a conviction, that confederation and perhaps even federation with Serbia, after four and a-half years of most detestable and detested Serbian tyranny, can be proclaimed in Croatia. This pacifism is not défaïtisme; on the contrary, it is a movement ready to overthrow, and capable of overthrowing, the present Serbian tyranny, militarist, bureaucratic, despoiling, corruptive and almost barbarous, of overthrowing it with its own forces in a moment—which, however, will neither entail civil war nor disturb European peace.

"(3) The neutrality of the Croatian State (Croatia, Slavonia, Dalmatia) is a natural consequence of Croat pacifism. Every Croat voter understands well that by the neutralisation of Croatia—that is, by the neutralisation of the Eastern coast of the Adriatic—Italy is delivered from the century-old nightmare which a Danubian or Balkan Power, a kind of new Attila, could realise by swooping down upon Venice, or Milan, in short, upon the whole of Northern Italy. The excessive and insensate militarism of Belgrade justifies only too well the fears of Rome, which, relieved of this anxiety, would be able to pursue with all its energies a policy of colonisation upon British lines, and so be able to place the surplus of its laborious and honest population. The neutrality of Croatia bars the route of the German 'Drang nach Trieste und Salonika,' and puts an end to the dreams of a militarist pan-Slav empire stretching from Vladivostok to Split—dreams which actually haunt the unbalanced spirits of Belgrade.

"(4) Croat republicanism is, therefore, sufficiently explained by these three political heads

(confederation, pacifism, and neutrality), without taking into account the powerful moral and social shocks engendered by the world War, which was looked upon by the entire Croat people as a mighty experience and as an unprecedented calamity, but above all as a great political schooling, from which the Croat people have emerged more industrious and thoughtful than ever, and—this is essential—more humanitarian than nationalist, which means that they are capable of extinguishing the ultra-nationalist flames of the Balkan hell, where all the 'great' territorial ideas (Great Greece, Great Serbia, Great Roumania) clash and destroy themselves in régimes of mutual oppression, of perpetual and barbarous vengeance; of extinguishing these nationalist flames by a sincere and practical humanitarianism in the whole of their political life. For they believe that any particular nationalism is worth just so much as it contains of humanitarianism and progress. Croatian republicanism, therefore, is not a means of electoral agitation, or simply a political mot d'ordre; but it is a popular post-War conception, in which the Croatian people see all the necessary guarantees of real self-government and sincere parliamentarism; that is, an administration and a government by the people and for the people.

"(5) The greatest obstacle to a friendly understanding between the Croats and Serbs, without the diplomatic intervention of Europe and without other than constitutional action on the part of Croatia, consists in the utterly primitive political ideas of all Serbian politicians. In the eyes of M. Pashitch, as well as in the eyes of MM. Protitch, Davidovitch, etc., to be an autonomist is the same as being a separatist, a revolutionary, subversive, a criminal. No distinction is made by any Serbian politician between the modest demands of M. Spaho (on behalf of Bosnia), the very moderate autonomist programme of M. Koroshets, and the federalist, pacifist republicanism of the Croats; one and all are met with the same non possumus to the accompaniment of violence and persecution. Thus, seeing that Belgrade rejects local autonomy in precisely the same way as it does the complete sovereignty of Croatia, and that, in order to arrive at the former, one is forced to enter upon the same fierce struggle as to achieve the latter, the Croats, to a single man, without distinction of class or profession, have rallied to the republican flag of independent, pacific, and neutral Croatia.

"(6) Some Important Results of the Last Elections.—(a) In our capital, Zagreb, the Croatian peasant republican party obtained 6,750 votes and both seats; in 1920 the party had only 1,060 votes and one seat out of the five which the city then comprised. At the recent election (March 18) the 'intellectuals' gave the republican party more than 4,000 votes.

"(b) In the county of Syrmia (Croatia) the Croatian republicans obtained 32,000 votes and five seats, while the Radicals (M. Pashitch's royalist, militarist, and centralist followers) obtained only 25,000 votes and four seats. N.B.—The population of this county comprises 120,000 Croats and 180,000 Serbs. With the Croats voted the Germans (69,000 inhabitants), Magyars (29,000), Slovaks and Ruthenes (25,000). Thus Croatian republicanism, pacifist and humanitarian, formed the rallying point of every race and religion. (The Slovaks are Protestants, the Ruthenes Orthodox-United.)

"(c) In Bosnia-Herzegovina the republican Croats obtained 60,000 votes and nine seats, and the radical Serbs 80,000 votes and twelve seats. But the elected Mohammedans (eighteen) have publicly rallied to Zagreb, and almost all (sixteen) openly call themselves Croats, so that in Bosnia at the moment there is a Croatian Parliamentary majority (eighteen and nine equals twenty-seven, Bosnia electing forty-eight members).

"(d) The old Yugoslav countries of Austria-Hungary (Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia, Batchka, and the Banat) elect in all 193 members; the federalist Croats have 92 (70 republicans, 18 Mussulmans, three simple federalists from Batchka, one 'savage' from Dalmatia, and, with the Slovenes, 114). There is, therefore, a notable majority without the Germans of the Banat (eight).

"The real Yugoslavia has, therefore, declared roundly against Greater Serbia.

"(7) The horrors of the present régime, royalist, militarist, and centralist, à outrance, continue, with the result that in Macedonia scores of peasants are being massacred. A Macedonian eye-witness, a man of intellect and unimpeachable integrity, who does not wish to be either Bulgarian or Serb, told me a month ago that for several days before the election of the 18th inst. the Radicals (local authorities) publicly shot 68 peasants for the sole reason that they wished to nominate as a candidate an independent Macedonian. That happened at Bregalnitz, not far from the Bulgarian frontier.

"In Montenegro is the same state of affairs, with a horrible famine in addition. There the Radicals (M. Pashitch) obtained their seats (three out of seven) only by distributing maize to those who promised to vote for them. Famine is raging at Shumadia (Serbia proper) also, and it is only to that fact M. Pashitch owes his 109 deputies out of 312.

"In the countries of the old Austria-Hungary the 'Gladstonian' atrocities are actually less frequent, but even there, in Croatia itself, a sub-prefect (named Kosta Dragitchivitch) killed a Croatian peasant by a shot from his revolver on April 27 of this year. This offence occurred at Dolni Varosh, near Nova Grodista, halfway between Zagreb and Belgrade, and was committed merely because the peasant called himself a Croat and bore the German name of Walter.

"(8) The most simple method of helping in the emancipation of the true Yugoslavia from the detestable yoke of Greater Serbia, aggravated either by the support of some (e.g., France) or by the indifference of others (e.g., Great Britain), is to compel the Government of Belgrade, as the Turkish Government so many times was compelled, first to respect human life and then to respect public European law, which does not permit a nation to govern or to dominate another people without having any legal mandate over it. Serbia must, therefore, either proclaim the occupation of Croatia—which is war—or else it must recognise the constitutional Croat representation (the Croatian Parliament), with the view of establishing a friendly entente between the two peoples."

HUMOUR IN ANCIENT EGYPT.

Dr. Blackman entertained the Ibis Literary Society at the Kingsway Hall on May 10 with an illustrated lecture on "The Valley of the Tombs of the Kings," describing the art of the period in which Akhenaten and Tutankhamen lived. The lecturer contradicted the widespread belief that the Egyptians were a solemn race, finding their principal enjoyment in attending funerals and reading the "Book of the Dead," and showed some amusing slides in support of his view.

The outstanding disputes between Hungary and Roumania over Transylvania, which were not disposed of at the last meeting of the relevant Committee of the League of Nations, are being further examined in Brussels, where it is hoped to find a satisfactory compromise.

THE PALESTINE IDEAL.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—In his recent lecture Sir Wyndham Deedes begs us to accept his assurance that the "power behind the throne" in Palestine is not Zionism, but it is evident from his lecture that it is, at any rate, the power behind Sir Wyndham Deedes.

May I add my quota to the "misplaced and ignorant criticism of the revival of the Hebrew language," as this seems to be not a mere item in the Zionist programme, but a decisive and critical exposure of its spirit? "It is obvious that the Jews must have their own means of expressing their ideals in the same way as the Irish and Welsh and others insist on using their own language." Could not still better illustrations of passionate attachment to peculiar little languages be drawn from the Balkans? Why is it obvious that the evil of Babel must be increased, and even be blessed, by the Palestine Government?

All these paltry particularisms spring from that little-mindedness and conceit, that desire to separate men from their neighbours and to emphasise essential differences to the utmost, which has been the hopeless ruin of the Near East. For what other purpose was Irish revived? For what possible other purpose can Hebrew—an even more artificial revival—be intended? It is simply, as always, the outward visible sign of an inward unspiritual exclusiveness, a definite refusal to share in the common effort of humanity, and no talk of the distinctive Jewish genius can make it any the less degraded and degrading. Of what use to the world can be any "literary, moral, artistic, and scientific developments" buried in a tiny local language? Has any great work ever been done yet in artificial literary languages? It has been the bursting of learned conventions by those whose need for utterance was too great for any but their mother tongue which has given us our master works and begun epochs of progress. It can safely be prophesied that never again will a great work be produced by Greek or Arab or Jew until one arises great enough to break down the fetters of his conventional literary language.

Unless the Hebrew culture is to be cut off from that of the world, one of the great languages must be its medium. The teaching of science in Arabic, for instance, has been tried and found hopeless, and research in such a local medium would be futile. The two ideals—that of a narrow little Hebrew community; cut off by its language from the world's literature, and the other, the great community of men of science—are wholly incompatible. Only by losing their life in union with the greater world spirit can the Hebrews hope to save it.

True, a peculiar language is almost essential to "the third feature of the home idea," the preservation of "Jewish traditions and customs and whatever is peculiar to the life of the people." The Jews are to be encouraged by us to keep themselves as distinct as possible from their neighbours in customs as well as speech, in Europe as well as Palestine. The results in the past have been pogroms in backward countries, dislike and contempt in others, evil fruits of a bad tree, which tree we are asked to honour and cherish! Strange that the evident causes of these things hateful to God should be so attractive to good men. It will be so until such men cease to be dazzled by the glories of the past and can recognise them as manifestations of the universal spirit, bound to neither place nor nation. I venture to quote an opinion given decisively against a local Zion and a local spiritual home. "Ye shall neither in this mountain nor yet at Jerusalem worship the Father . . . the true worshippers shall worship the Father in Spirit and in Truth." Sublime common sense before which the Zionist ideal is small and materialistic. Is it too high for us?

"The relations between Jews and Arabs would be very good if there were no politicians." Exactly—just as they were before this Zionism raised its head, but the implication that the Arab hostility is an artificially propagated growth is emphatically not true. What else could possibly be expected by the most naïve of our political leaders? However much we may deprecate ultra-national feelings, resentment against a relatively great immigration of aliens, who come in "not on sufferance but of right," who do, in fact, claim the country as their own, and in token of that have imposed upon the Government the use of a completely artificial and unnecessary language alongside that of the country, emphasising their separateness in every conceivable way, bitter resentment is natural to every thinking man, woman, and child in the country.

They know well enough that in these circumstances their talk of "our Arab cousins," however well meant and even sincere, is mere foolishness, and do well to fear these foreigners and the gifts they bring.

For British officials to open wide eyes and exclaim: "Why can't they settle down together?" only brings them under the (quite unjust) suspicion of hypocrisy. The Arab can hardly believe in such innocence.

When the Jews (1) scrap their unnecessary language and all the difficulties it makes, (2) cease to talk so much of their peculiar genius and privileges with the Almighty, (3) be content to merge their gifts of literature and science humbly in the common fund of humanity, we may believe in their attempt at co-operation, but so far history is against our accepting any assurances without much further proof. To expect the Arab world to give up its most important off-lying island (and Palestine is in that position) to an alien ideal is absurd, and to speak of this unwillingness as a "dog-in-the-manger attitude" is really somewhat naïve.

"Who'd expecter see pertaters

All on eend at being b'iled?"

Not being "pertaters," the Arabs are "all on eend," and it is futile, and dangerous, to ignore so natural and inevitable a consequence of our strange policies. Indeed, they are likely to take it as you and I, and Sir Wyndham, would if we were in their place, and that too probably means eventual trouble.—I am, etc.,

PRESS ON THE NEAR EAST.

The Government of Roumania.

The Times of May 19 contained an article, written by its Bucharest correspondent, on the government of Roumania by M. Vintila Bratianu, Minister of Finance. M. Vintila Bratianu, says the writer of the article, is "the dominant personality in Roumanian politics, and certainly the most unpopular man in the country at present." The Finance Minister has opposed the printing of paper money, so that there is now a terrible shortage of currency. He has been very eager for retrenchment, but he has at least, so this writer says, produced some order from the chaos in which Roumania found herself after the War. His policy of the "most resolute scrimping" has naturally been unpopular with the nation, which has cried out against it. The extreme measures which the Bratianu brothers have adopted have led to the misunderstanding abroad of their motives; for they do not, it appears, in despite of the nationalisation of the subsoil clause in the new Constitution, suppose that they can develop Roumania without the help of foreign capital. Far from that, says this writer, they need foreign capital to develop mineral resources, water power, and industry; but they do want Roumania to be treated as an adult and not as a minor.

Greece and Turkey.

The New Statesman of May 19 speculated thus on the possibility of friction between Greece and Turkey, after noting the apparent fruitlessness of the negotiations between M. Venizelos and Ismet Pasha:—

The next move, it is feared, may be an advance by the Greek army from the Maritza frontier against the Turkish forces in Eastern Thrace. Such an attack might, no doubt, achieve a temporary success, for the Greeks are strong in numbers and well equipped. But the end of it could only be another disaster, and it is difficult to think of any other people in the world, save the Athenians, who, in the present circumstances, and after the experiences of the last two years, would embark on such an adventure. Fortunately, however, there are some cool heads even in Athens, and the Allied Powers will have to help them to find a way out of the mess.

The Times of May 23 was impressed with the potentialities of the Greco-Turkish situation, and commented upon the "growing seriousness of the situation." But it believed that "the Allies can stay the menace of war if they have the moral courage to act with firmness and decision while there is yet time." The Greeks can always be restrained, it points out, by a blockade of the Piræus and of Salonika; and as for the Turks:—

The Turks as well as the Greeks know perfectly well that it would be stark madness for them to defy the Allies. It is, indeed, incredible that they intend to defy them, or to defy either France or England, separately. What they do hope—and in this hope lies the chief danger of rash action by them—is to extort from the Allies by menace and insolence concessions which they have been told are quite inadmissible. Union and firmness on the part of the Allies are the right means by which to extinguish hopes of the kind, and with them to quench a main risk of war. This time union between France and England is close and manifest, both in the Near East and at Lausanne. It distinguishes the position sharply from that which existed in the autumn, and Greeks and Turks would be prudent to weigh its importance. But co-operation in the tendering of good advice is not enough. Firmness as well as union is needed at Athens, at Constantinople, throughout the Near East, and at Lausanne. The resumed Conference at Lausanne has been a pitiful and painful exhibition for a whole month. . . . Complaints are made that in Constantinople itself our self-respect as a nation has been hurt by astonishing exhibitions of complaisance. They have led the Turks, it is much to be feared, into the delusion that England and France will make any concessions and submit to any indignities rather than display the firmness which is absolutely indispensable to the prevention of hostilities and to the conclusion of peace.

Greece, Turkey and Bulgaria.

The Manchester Guardian, after welcoming the fact that a rupture between Greece and Turkey has been averted, describes the reparations question between these two nations as having been settled "by an admission of the moral liability of the Greeks, and at the same time of their material inability to pay." It proceeds to describe what the cession of the Karagatch triangle to Turkey really means:—

The effect is, first, to bring Turkey and Bulgaria into direct contact along the railway line that passes from Constantinople, skirting Adrianople, to Sofia, and, secondly, to give Turkey as well as Greece control over Bulgaria's route to Dedeagatch, her one and very inadequate hope of access to the Aegean. The total effect is to bring Bulgaria into closer and more dependent relations with Turkey. A Turco-Bulgarian alliance would have continuous railway communication from Constantinople to the Serbian frontier, and that is why the Serbian representative, with reason, utters his protest against the scheme. At the same time Bulgaria becomes dependent on the good graces of Turkey for her communications with the coast. Such, at least, would be the effect if the agreement goes through without any stipulations in Bulgaria's favour. But it is hardly possible that this should be. In the Treaty of Neuilly we, with our Allies, explicitly "undertake to ensure the economic outlets of Bulgaria to the Aegean Sea." The clause goes on to say that "the conditions of this guarantee will be fixed at a later date." The present date is more than three years later than the treaty, but though in the interim Bulgaria has repeatedly urged that the promise should be carried out, nothing has actually been done to give it effect. What is now being done, on the contrary, makes it a good deal more difficult, and the moment has come when Bulgaria has the right to say, Now or never.

The article concludes with a very earnest appeal to Greece to cede the sovereignty over Dedeagatch to Bulgaria, because "there is no surer ground of unrest in a country than exclusion from the sea."

News has been received at Simla of the death in Persia of Khan Zair Khidhar Tangistani, who during the War intrigued on behalf of the German Wassmuss.

On the night of May 23 the Euphrates burst several miles of the Bund forty miles to the north-west of Baghdad, and some 45,000 acres of cultivated land with crops have been inundated. It is expected that the flood waters will flow into the Tigris by way of the intervening canals. Precautions have been taken to protect the township of Kazimain.

"ROMANTIC INDIA."

Mr. Lowell Thomas continues to enthral his audience with his pictures and description of Indian life. His "travelogue" has been transferred from Covent Garden Opera House to the Philharmonic Hall, and gains from its setting in the smaller building. No praise can be too high for an entertainment which, in its thrilling interest and its artistry, reaches a very high standard. Its charm appeals equally to those who know India and to those who do not. Among the audience last Saturday evening was the Duke of Connaught, who, it was noted, waited at the end of the "travelogue" in order to congratulate Mr. Thomas on his achievement. We can cordially recommend everyone to make a point of seeing "Through Romantic India," and we should like every schoolboy and schoolgirl within reach of London to be taken to it.

NOTES AND NEWS.

The New Chancellor.

Few things disturb the business world more than political changes, and the news of the resignation of Mr. Bonar Law gave rise temporarily to a feeling of uncertainty in commercial circles. The speedy choice of Mr. Baldwin as his successor, however, led to a rapid revival of confidence, which was strengthened when the names of the new Ministry were announced. While the personnel is in the main the same, there are some notable additions, the effect of which, in the opinion of the City, is greatly to strengthen the Administration. Particularly satisfactory to business men is the prospective return of Mr. McKenna to the Exchequer. No politician in recent years has inspired greater confidence in business circles than Mr. McKenna, and since his withdrawal from politics he has added to his reputation as a financial authority as chairman of the London Joint City and Midland Bank. From his speeches at the general meetings of that institution commerce knows precisely what it may expect from him, and it is realised very plainly that with Mr. McKenna as Chancellor there will be no risk of an unsound financial policy, and that the line pursued will be economy all the time. In a phrase, he will follow the path in which Mr. Baldwin has been so notable a success.

Empire Cotton Growing.

On another page in this issue will be found extensive extracts from the annual report of the British Cotton Growing Association. The report deals in detail with the progress in the development of cotton growing in the various regions in the Empire, notably in the spheres included in the Near East, and a perusal of it affords convincing evidence of the strides that are being made, largely as a result of the efforts of the association, towards the ideal state of things—still distant, of course—when the Empire will be able to supply the cotton that Lancashire requires. Gratifying as is the advance that has been made, increased efforts are still necessary to avoid the danger—which has of late years become increasingly obvious—that Lancashire may one day be short of supplies of cotton. There has, as we know, been no difficulty hitherto, because American cotton has been available in sufficient quantity, but the position in America is such, as I have pointed out before, that in the course of time there will be little cotton to spare for export as a result of the increasing use of the commodity in the country for the manufacture of tyres, and the problem we have to solve is how to develop cotton cultivation within the Empire quickly enough to anticipate an inevitable development.

The Orient Express.

The International Parliamentary Trade Conference has been in session in Prague, and has very wisely directed its attention to trans-Continental railway matters. It has recommended the appointment of a technical committee to deal at once with the question of improvements in passenger and goods traffic on the following routes:—(1) Ostend-Prague-Constantinople-Baghdad; (2) Calais-Trieste-Constantinople-Baghdad; (3) the lines served by the Orient Express. If such a committee is appointed, it is to be hoped that it will investigate railway conditions in Italy, where there has been a recrudescence of robberies on the international trains. This is a matter for the Italian authorities to take in hand, and it is surprising that the nuisance has not already been stamped out by the Fascist Government. The headquarters of the evil is Milan, and the thieves operate in two ways—"lifting" luggage from compartments during the absence of the owners (probably in the restaurant car), and blocking a passenger in a corridor of the train while a confederate, making a show of wishing to pass from the other side, relieves him of pocket-book or purse. Experience suggests that these gentry have things simplified, rather than made more difficult for them, by the station or train officials.

Burmah Oil Dividend.

Last week saw the appearance of the annual statement of the Burmah Oil Company. The proposed final distribution on the ordinary shares is 20 per cent., making 30 per cent. for the year, as before, which is in accordance with expectations. From the preliminary figures it is evident that the company has again had an excellent year. An alteration in the method of presenting the figures—fields expenditure on drilling and deepening being charged to profit and loss instead of written off as before—prevents precise comparison being made with the previous figures. The profit is £2,115,823, after charging £149,806 for depreciation on refineries, pipe-lines, tankers, and tank installations. For the previous year the profit was £1,902,790, and on that occasion the amount set aside for depreciation was £170,268. The allocations to the general and insurance reserves are the same as before—£200,000 and £20,000 respectively—leaving £335,062 to be carried forward, as compared with £359,584 brought in.

The Nile Tourist Traffic.

The poor character of the Nile tourist traffic during the past season is evident from the report of the Anglo-American Nile and Tourist Company, which experienced one of the worst seasons it has ever had. The results of the company's operations would have been worse but for certain arrangements that were entered into, the result of which was that the March cruises were more satisfactory than they would have been otherwise. The gross profits for the year ended March 31 amounted to £E14,000, as compared with £E21,500, while the net profit was £E1,400, as against £E8,600. The directors look for a considerable stimulus to the Nile traffic as a result of the recent discoveries at Luxor, and there is very little doubt that they will be amply justified in this expectation provided the steamship rates are reasonable and economic conditions generally continue to improve.

Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields.

In view of the reduced production of the Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields last year, it was not expected that the dividend for 1921 of 15 per cent. would be maintained, and the declaration of 12½ per cent. will, therefore, occasion no surprise. Developments of late are understood to have been promising, and it may not be long before the shareholders are able to enjoy much more substantial dividends.

Smyrna-Aidin Railway.

A meeting of the Ottoman Railway from Smyrna to Aidin will be held on June 25 at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, E.C., when a resolution will be proposed for sanctioning the creation and issue of further Four per Cent. First Debenture stock and Five per Cent. Second Debenture stock, to rank pari passu with the existing issues. This is to enable the company to defer until an interest period of twelve months after ratification of a treaty of peace between Great Britain and Turkey the instalments of interest due July 1 this year; also to allow the company to satisfy arrears of interest, such deferred payments to carry simple interest at 5 per cent. per annum in the meantime. It is proposed to issue the further First Debenture stock to the nominal amount of £120 for every £100 of interest so satisfied, and the Second Debenture stock to the nominal amount of the interest due, smaller amounts being in the same ratio in each case.

Tata Industrial Bank.

The report of the Tata Industrial Bank for the year ended March 31 shows a profit of Rs. 16,31,001, plus Rs. 1,91,136 brought forward. The directors have paid an interim dividend of annas 8 per share, free of tax, and appropriated to provision for income-tax and super-tax Rs. 1,00,000, leaving a balance at the credit of profit and loss of Rs. 12,21,694. The profit earned from the ordinary banking side has been well maintained, and in normal circumstances it should have been possible to pay a final dividend after placing a substantial sum to reserve. A year ago the activities of the industrial department were suspended owing to the depression and the uncertainty then prevailing in regard to the future of all industrial undertakings in India. These conditions continue, and the directors have decided to transfer Rs. 11,50,000 from profit and loss to writing down industrial investments, carrying forward Rs. 71,694. The directors regret being unable to recommend a final dividend.

Anglo-Egyptian Oil.

The directors of the Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields, Ltd., have decided to recommend to the general meeting to be held on June 15 a dividend on the "B" shares for the year 1922 of 12½ per cent., less tax.

Burma Ruby.

The accounts of the Burma Ruby Mines for the year ended February 28 show, after making the usual provision for depreciation, a deficiency of £5,707, and adding the debit balance of £4,209 brought in there remains a net deficiency of £9,917. 770,815 truck loads of ruby earth were washed, and the sluices ran for 12,198 hours, producing rubies valued at £5,845. The total value of the stones mined amounted to £48,778, compared with £49,372. Very few good stones were found during the year, but a new mine at Enjouk produced a fine ruby weighing 23 carats. In England the demand for rubies continues good, but the market for ordinary qualities in India and Burma has been weak throughout the year. There are, however, signs of improvement at the present time. Meeting, Cannon Street Hotel, E.C., June 4, noon.

Anglo-American Nile.

The report of the Anglo-American Nile and Tourist Company for the year ended March 31 states that the result of the year's working has again been disappointing. Had it not been for successful arrangements carried out in connection with the March cruises, the results would have been still more unsatisfactory. The directors are taking very drastic measures to reduce expenses during the coming year by enforcing substantial economies in every department, and especially in the cost of maintenance and repairs. With a view to end the "tariff war" and the continual lowering of freight rates the various firms interested in Nile freight service have come to an understanding, and arrangements are practically completed between the companies for the formation of a new company which will take over all freight fleets of the various companies after expert valuation. A sum of £E6,456,413 has been spent on maintenance, and depreciation amounts to £E3,166,526, leaving a profit of £E1,370,634. The directors propose a 3 per cent. supplementary dividend, making 4 per cent., carrying forward £E2,182,734, against £E5,929,524 brought in.

Burmah Oil.

The directors of the Burmah Oil Company recommend a final dividend for 1922 on the ordinary shares of 4s. per share, free of tax, making 30 per cent. for the year. The fields expenditure on drilling and deepening has been charged direct to profit and loss instead of, as in previous years, being written off as depreciation. On this basis, and after charging depreciation on refineries, pipe lines, tankers, and tank installations, of £149,806, and allowing for income-tax and all charges, the profit for the year amounts to £2,115,823, out of which the following allocations have been made:—To general reserve, £200,000; to insurance reserve, £20,000. The amount carried forward, subject to corporation profits tax, is £335,062.

CHUBB'S 20-TON DOOR SOLD.

The massive circular steel treasury door, weighing 20 tons, the first of its kind to be manufactured in this country, formed a leading feature in the new industrial film taken of Chubb's Works and recently shown throughout England. This door is now sold, and will shortly be fitted as the main strong room entrance of one of the principal banks.

The profits of the Malta and Mediterranean Gas Company for the past year amounted to £15,821, as against £17,322. It is proposed to pay an ordinary dividend of 6 per cent., tax free, the same as before, and to carry forward £7,468, as compared with £3,498.

Shipping Intelligence.

P. & O. AND BRITISH INDIA COMPANIES.

Building Arrangements.

The P. and O. Company have recently placed orders with Messrs. Harland and Wolff for the construction at that firm's Greenock yard of two passenger steamers of 15,200 tons, which will combine the excellences of the Kaisar-i-Hind with some features of the Naldera and Narkunda. A third ship of the same type will be constructed by Messrs. Hawthorn, Leslie, and Co., at Newcastle. The Greenock yard has also an order for a 10,000-ton passenger steamer. All the new vessels, which are intended for the India mail service, will have reciprocating engines and will be fitted to burn oil fuel under Scotch boilers.

The British India Company has in course of construction, or projected, no fewer than ten steamers; five of the "T" class, of 8,000 tons each, intended for the company's Calcutta-Japan service, of which three will be fitted for oil fuel and two to burn coal, two single screw motor-driven cargo ships, each of 2,300 gross tons. There are besides the Khandalla, 7,300 tons, for the company's Bombay-East Africa line, with twin screw reciprocating engines; the twin screw motor cargo ship Dalgoma, of 6,000 tons, and the Naringa, a single screw coal-burning turbine steamer, the two last being intended for the Indian coast service.

The new tonnage at present projected by the P. and O. company (including the Maloja and Mooltan, each of 21,000 tons, and now well on the way to completion) amounts to 97,600 tons gross; and by the British India Company 64,400 tons; together a total of 162,000 gross tons.

GREEK MERCHANT SHIPPING.

A Long Record.

The restoration of the merchant fleet of Greece almost to its pre-war proportions by the unaided efforts of Greek subjects is an illustration of the fact that national aptitudes which result from geographical conditions are likely to succeed, even in the face of a continued ring of adverse political circumstances (says Mr. Manuel Cambouri, in an article in "Commerce Reports," of the United States).

The Greeks are the oldest maritime race of Europe. The physical configuration of the country, composed of peninsulas, islands, and a mainland indented by the sea, requires domestic communication by water; and an interior traversed by mountain ranges compels a considerable part of the prolific race to seek a livelihood on the sea or by migration across the sea. The Greek immigration to the United States is the expression of a racial impulse which began with the settlement of Greek colonies along the shores and islands of the Mediterranean before the Christian era. Greek sailors and Greek merchants, even during four centuries of Turkish domination, had a large share in the navigation and trade of the Mediterranean, Black, Aegean, and Adriatic seas. But the decline of their political liberties stunted maritime growth, and when Greece again became independent, in the nineteenth century, steamers were beginning to supersede sailing vessels, of which the Greek merchant fleet was then composed.

The shipowners' attempts to adjust their shipping to these new conditions were largely unsuccessful, owing to lack of capital, until the Boer War; then the demand for cargo space forced up freight rates and led to considerable Greek shipping purchases. The real stimulus, however, was given in 1910 through the passage by the Boulé of a mortgage law which greatly enhanced the credit of the shipowners and enabled them to borrow capital on favourable terms. Shortly afterwards a Greek passenger line to New York was established, mainly to accommodate the large Greek emigration movement. In the four years following the passage of this law—that is, by July, 1914—Greece had added 500,000 gross tons to its steam fleet, which then numbered 401 vessels of 820,000 gross tons, according to Lloyds returns in 1914. Thus, in the eight years preceding, the Greek merchant fleet had doubled its tonnage, a result surpassed only by the growth of Netherlands shipping.

During the past ten years Greece has been in a disturbed condition due to war and other causes. In the World War 48 per cent. (388,000 gross tons) of the Greek merchant shipping was destroyed—a larger percentage of loss than was suffered by any other nation. In addition, 114 steamers, aggregating 260,000 gross tons, were sold to foreigners. Since the Armistice Greece has twice radically changed its government and has undergone a great military and political disaster. Yet by January, 1922, official returns show the Greek merchant shipping possessing 440 steamers of 685,000 gross tons, and by January, 1923, 419 steamers of 736,700 gross tons. This steamer fleet is made up of foreign-built ships, some of them constructed to Greek order at British yards, but the greater number of them bought from foreign owners and having already seen service.

The amount expended in purchasing the 550,000 gross tonnage added to the Greek fleet during the War and up to the end of 1921 was about $48,000,000, according to R. O. Hall, Commercial Attaché at Athens. But this represents only a small portion of the $200,000,000 collected by shipowners during the same period from insurance on lost ships, war prices for ships sold to foreigners, and high freight receipts.

The greater part of the Greek fleet has always been engaged in the Mediterranean trade, chiefly between Greece and ports of the Mediterranean, Aegean, and Black Seas where Greek merchants and Greek subjects have long been settled. During the War, however, the shipping was chartered to carry coal from England to the Mediterranean; also, during the post-War coal strikes Greek ships carried coal from the United States. But a large part of the fleet is also active in the many forms of coasting trade of Greece.

The coasting trade is reserved to Greek ships and to ships of nations that admit Greek ships to their coasting trade; but during the War the rule was suspended, as it was again in the autumn of 1922, when virtually all Greek ships were employed in the transport of the Army and the refugees from Asia Minor. Austrian ships before the war were admitted reciprocally to the Greek coasting trade, and the continuation of the privilege has been granted to these ships now under the Italian flag. The fisheries afford employment for many Greeks; and by a reciprocity treaty with Italy both Greeks and Italians enjoy the privilege of the sponge fisheries in the territorial waters under the jurisdiction of each country and its colonies.

CLOSING OF PRIVATE STORAGE DEPOTS AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

Some months ago an order was issued by the Customs authorities at Constantinople to the effect that no further storage would be permitted in private transit depots, and that all such depots must automatically close down when the goods already stored there had been cleared (says the British Commercial Secretary at Constantinople). This measure was quite practicable in view of the fact that for the past six months the volume of goods imported has been far below normal and the official Customs depots were able to provide ample accommodation. A further order has now been issued to the effect that all private depots still containing goods must close down at once, and that uncleared stocks must be transferred forthwith to Customs depots. Practically the only goods still remaining in such depots are alcoholic drinks and other articles on the prohibited list, which merchants have been unable to clear. Representations have been made to the Customs authorities requesting a further delay in the application of the recent order, and it is probable that this will be granted.

COTTON-GROWING IN THE EMPIRE.

British Cotton Growing Association's Report.

The British Cotton Growing Association has just issued its report for 1922. We give the following extracts:—

The values of cotton have fluctuated a good deal during 1922, the lowest price for fully middling American being 9½d. per lb. in February and the highest 15.62d. in November, and during the greater part of the year prices have ruled on a higher scale than in 1921. The actual number of bales marketed by the association in 1922 constituted a record, and the value of the cotton was higher than in any previous year, with the exception of 1920, when exceptional prices were ruling. The quantity of cotton which has passed through the hands of the association during the past six years is shown in the following statement:—

Year.	Bales.	Value. £
1917	39,191	1,415,644
1918	29,190	1,410,837
1919	30,881	1,494,921
1920	23,513	1,699,144
1921	63,966	1,597,702
1922	67,386	1,628,778

The council are pleased to be able to present a satisfactory financial statement, and, after making full provision for depreciation, also for income-tax and corporation profits tax, the accounts show a surplus on the year's working of £33,008 2s. 4d., which increases the excess of income over expenditure to £59,522 0s. 2d. This result has been brought about by careful management of "hedged" and by the close attention which has been given to the marketing of the cotton under the most favourable conditions.

Owing to the necessity of reducing the buying price during 1921, as compared with the very high prices which were possible in the previous year, it was only to be expected that the native cotton-growing industry in some colonies and protectorates would suffer a set-back, as it is difficult for the natives to understand fluctuations in values; especially has this been the case in the Southern Provinces of Nigeria and in Uganda, where the fall in production was further accentuated by unfavourable climatic conditions. The estimated amount of cotton grown in new fields in the British Empire during the last six years is as follows (stated in bales of 400 lb. each):—1917, 72,600; 1918, 54,900; 1919, 79,600; 1920, 105,800; 1921, 165,100; 1922, 103,400.

The following extracts are taken from the reports of work in the various cotton growing regions:—

India.

The new company referred to in the annual report for 1921 has been registered in India under the title of "B.C.G.A. Punjab Limited," and is operating the lease of about 7,500 acres of land near Khanewal in the Montgomery district of the Punjab Province. The land is irrigated by the Lower Bari Doab Canal, the rainfall being under five inches. The estate is being conducted as an object lesson for the growing of improved types of cotton and the better cultivation of crops generally, and is serving a most useful purpose in this respect, as the Indians in the neighbourhood of the estate are copying the methods of cultivation and asking for the improved type of cotton seed. The crops being grown on the farm consist of 2,500 acres of wheat, 1,900 acres of cotton, 700 acres of pulse, and other food crops. The cotton crop has proved very successful, and some hundreds of bales of improved cotton are to be sent to this country for sale.

Sudan.

The four estates in the Gezira Plain, which are managed by the Sudan Plantations Syndicate, Ltd., produced a total crop of 11,386 bales of 400 lb. each, as compared with 4,567 bales from three stations last year. The new station at Hosh, where 6,040 feddans were under cotton, yielded a crop of 5,927 bales. A further pumping station is being erected at Wad el Nau, and in July next it is expected that there will be an additional 10,000 feddans of cotton under cultivation. The negotiations for the completion of the work on the Makwar Dam have been successfully carried out during the year; and a contract has been secured by the eminent firm of Messrs. Pearson and Sons, in whose able hands the work will now be brought to a final and speedy conclusion, and, if all goes well, gravitation water should be available for the Gezira Plain in 1925. The area under cotton this year in the Gezira is 10,000 acres, which will be increased to 20,000 acres next year, and this will be further increased to 100,000 acres as soon as possible after the gravitation water arrives.

Arrangements have been made for the early construction of a railway to Kassala, and a concession for growing cotton is to be granted by the Sudan Government to the Kassala Cotton Co.; this concession is to be very much on the lines of the old Gezira agreement, thus establishing a three-cornered partnership as between the Sudan Government, the native cultivators, and the Kassala Cotton Co. The association have arranged to subscribe for £20,000 debentures and 20,000 1s. ordinary shares in the new company. The Kassala area is flooded each year by the River Gash, which waters from 80,000 to 200,000 acres annually; the volume of water is uncertain, and it is not possible to store it, and the intention is to make use of all the water possible during years of large flood and average it in years of small flood. The soil is rich and the climate suitable, and it is anticipated that in course of time 60,000 to 100,000 bales of excellent cotton will be produced in this district. On the completion of the Kassala Railway another cotton growing proposition at Gadaref becomes a possibility; the area is extensive and well populated, and quantities of rain-grown cotton of good American type have been produced, but development has been hampered by lack of transport facilities.

Excellent cotton of the Sakellarides variety has been grown for the past two years at Tokar, where the conditions are somewhat similar to Kassala, the land being irrigated by the River Baraka. Over 20,000 bales have been grown in this area, and, by conserving the water during times of big floods, probably twice this quantity might be obtained. The soil is excellent, and, after the flood, the seed is planted, and in some cases no further cultivation is necessary.

Irak.

Although a policy of marking time has been adopted in connection with the association's operations in this country, the cotton growing industry in the Baghdad district is making steady progress. The yield of 1921 was disappointing, but for the current year the production is estimated at 350 bales, the quality of which is very satisfactory. Judging from the demand for seed for planting, a greater interest is being taken in cotton cultivation, and the prospects for the coming season are very promising, the lowest estimate being 1,000 bales. In the past the cotton crop has suffered from the lack of an adequate water supply, but a system of "passes" has now been instituted, which is working satisfactorily, and should result in every planter receiving an ample supply of water.

Egyptian onions have continued in strong request, and prices have hardened.

Dried Fruit.—Excellent business is again to be recorded in respect of practically all branches of the dried fruit trade. Currants have continued to move off freely, and prices are somewhat higher. Sultanias have been in better request, and as supplies are short, particularly as regards Smyrnas, the tone of the market is very hard. Plums have been a good spot. Supplies of fine figs are very small, and rates are correspondingly high.

Oilseeds.—Linseed has been rather weak. Indian at 20s. 6d. has shed 6d., while La Plata is 4½d. down at 19s. 4½d. Rapeseed has been quiet. Toria is unchanged at 17s. 4½d., while real bold Ferozepore is unaltered at 16s. 7½d. Cottonseed has been dull. TRADE OF YEZD IN 1922-23.

Trade conditions in Yezd during the year ending March 31, 1923, showed an improvement as compared with the previous year, transport rate being lower, whilst the roads were safer for traffic (says the Acting British Vice-Consul at Yezd). The principal industries of the country are cotton and silk weaving on hand looms, the manufacture of silk and woollen cloth, carpet making, henna grinding, preparing raw opium, agriculture, and building. A large proportion of the foreign trade of the country is with India, as, in view of the time taken in transporting goods from the United Kingdom, merchants prefer to obtain their requirements in the nearest market.

The principal imports include cotton yarn (the lower counts being imported from India and the higher counts from the United Kingdom), cotton piece-goods, tea, sugar, matches, indigo, copper sheets, tin blocks, tin sheets, candles, kerosine oil, paper of all sorts, and bicycles. Cotton piece-goods are imported from India and the United Kingdom via Bunderabbas and Bushire, but owing to the high rate of exchange much less than the usual quantity was imported during the year under review. Loaf sugar is imported from France and Egypt, whilst safety matches (which are of inferior quality) are imported from Sweden and Japan through Bombay and Bunderabbas.

The principal exports include opium, gum (tragacanth and assafœtida), silk, cotton, almonds, walnuts, pestoh, goatskins, and henna. The best quality gum tragacanth is exported to Bombay for local use and also for re-export to London. The cotton crop was very good owing to the plentiful rainfall and cotton from Yezd and Ardakan was exported to India.

BULGARIAN TRADE CONDITIONS.

The report of the Bulgarska Banka, dated May 1, states:—

Important changes have taken place in the list of countries exporting goods. Austria, Belgium, Germany, Greece, Roumania, Turkey, Hungary, Czecho-Slovakia, and Yugoslavia have increased their imports. Then come Germany and Austria, which principally import metals and products connected with the metallurgical industry, machines, and textile materials.

The commercial situation has not changed. The firmness of the lev has no appreciable effect on prices. Exporters, owing to shortage of money, have suspended their purchases. There are very few new orders for foreign goods.

The export market for cereals and flour is calm, with a tendency to fall owing to the rise of the lev. The skin market is firm, but quiet. However, a fall is imminent. There have been no transactions in cocoons.

As from May 1 the Egyptian import duty on alcohol denatured in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Customs authorities, has been reduced from 3 to 2 millièmes per kilogram.

Cotton and Cotton Goods.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Small Turnover of Business.

The Commercial Company of Egypt, in their report for the week ended May 18, state :—

Since our last report the futures market has been fairly steady, but the turnover of business transacted has been rather small. Despite the recovery in New York, the large spot sales of Egyptians in Liverpool and the slightly better demand from abroad, our market has displayed little activity, and has merely managed to remain steady at the level of prices current after last week's heavy liquidation. Exporters are not using the futures market to any extent, preferring to cover their sales by immediate purchases of spot, whilst local speculators, having lost heavily either in being "long" or in straddling with Americans, are not keen on fresh commitments, in spite of the steady improving statistical position, and it looks as if our market will, for the time being, fluctuate more or less with New York prices. In Alexandria the stock now stands at 1,694,283 krs., against 1,717,640 krs. last week and 2,181,152 krs. a year ago, and as the quantity of cotton still held in the Interior is negligible, the weekly figures cannot but show a continual reduction from now on to the end of the season. A point worth mentioning is the exceptionally large exports since September 1 last; the figure is 6,211,650 krs., against 4,512,226 krs. during the corresponding period of last year and 2,593,054 krs. during the corresponding period two years ago.

A fresh review of the local statistical position on the basis of an export from now on to the end of the season of 1,100,000 krs. (against 1,300,000 krs. during the same period last year) is interesting :— Stock in Alexandria, 1,700,000 krs.; estimated stock Interior, 100,000 krs.—1,800,000 krs.; export, say, 1,100,000 krs.; carry over at August 31, 1923, 700,000 krs.; against a total carry-over at the end of last August of : Alexandria, 1,300,000 krs.; estimated Interior, 900,000 krs.; total, 2,200,000 krs.

Spot.—The Minet-el-Bassal market has only been open three days this week, due to the Bairam holidays. Sales amount to about 3,500 B/s, of which we estimate 2,400 B/s Sakellarides and 1,100 B/s uppers. A few bales of brown and white have also changed hands. Arrivals are very small, and the stock shows a decrease on the week. Sakellarides : All styles have been dealt in. Prices of spot against contracts, from good fair to good are a little dearer, for fully fair and below they are unchanged. Uppers : All grades have been traded in. Prices of spot against contracts are generally rather dearer, especially in the low qualities. Brown and White : Are neglected and only a few bales have been sold. Prices of spot against contracts for white are without change; in brown they are rather dearer.

Crop 1923.—There is little to report on the new crop; the weather has been rather changeable, and the temperature has not been all that could be desired for the normal development of the young plants. The report of the Ministry of Public Works on the state of the river for the month of April, 1923, states : The abnormal rises on the Sobat and Blue Nile have been of the greatest use to Egypt, for had it not been for them, this year would almost certainly have been the lowest recorded for many years. At Khartoum, with the exception of slight fluctuations, the river was slowly rising throughout the month. The main Nile at Wadi Halfa was almost steady during the month, and on the average 36 centimetres above last year.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

More Interest in Sudan.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended May 23 :—

The four business days under review have been rather overshadowed by the Whitsuntide holidays. The inquiry has naturally been on quieter lines than usual, but sales have been very little short of the average maintained in previous weeks. Prices have shown a hardening tendency, which materialised to-day in a rise of 40 points following on yesterday's strong market in New York. Buyers have concerned themselves chiefly with Sakellaridis 15d.—17d., Uppers about 15½d., and Low cottons 6d.—12d. Exceptionally, a little business has been done in good to fine Sakellaridis, whilst rather more interest has been displayed in Sudan and Tokar Sakellaridis. Brown and white cottons have been neglected. The stock in Liverpool stands at approximately 120,000 bales, but, on the other hand, receipts in Alexandria have practically ceased, and there is a good, steady trade doing here. The Continent is taking very little at present, but it will have to be reckoned with again, and with only 50 points between American and Egyptian contracts the attention of American spinners is sure to be attracted more than ever towards Egyptian growths. Although, during the months of the growing crops in America and Egypt, the markets will be sensible to weather conditions, we think, on the whole, that indications point to higher prices for Egyptian cotton before the season is through. Forwardings to spinners for the week ended 17th inst. were returned as 5,330 bales. Total sales 4,000 bales (includes 1,100 Sudan). Quotations are advanced 40 points, with the exception of extra fine Sakellaridis, which is raised 30 points only. Fully good fair Sakellaridis to-day 16.10d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

The Holiday Period.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank, for the week ended May 26, states :—

As usual during Whit-week, most business houses in this city have been closed for the entire period, and there is consequently nothing of interest to report with regard to transactions in yarn or cloth.

The Liverpool cotton market has been open as usual every day except Monday, but, owing to the virtual closing down in Manchester, the "spot" demand has been exceedingly small. Another change of sentiment has taken place in New York, principally on a continuation of unfavourable weather news with regard to the new crop, and Liverpool has adjusted accordingly. Closing prices are as follows :— American fully middling, 15.60; Egyptian fully good fair, 16.10.

The Shereefian Office of Phosphates of Morocco has exported 37,375 tons of phosphates during the first quarter of this year.

The legislative decree ratifying the Convention of March 3 with the National Bank authorising the latter to issue new notes to a total value of 300,000,000 drachmæ with the object of stimulating trade, industry, and agriculture, was officially published to-day (says a Reuter message from Athens dated May 19).

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS

Hamadan, April 21.

Cotton is selling at 13½ krs. per batman of four kilos, as compared with 6½ to 7 krs. per batman at the same period last year. There is a steady demand from Russia. Similarly, in respect of raisins, walnuts, and almonds, prices have risen from 20 per cent. to 50 per cent. on account of purchases from Russia. The market generally is again affected by the shortage of silver krans.

Aintab, April 26.

The uncertain situation is a marked obstacle to the development of our commerce. Our importers are operating within very narrow limits, restricting their purchases to the needs for local consumption, the more so as they are acutely affected by the illicit trade carried on on a large scale across the frontiers, which, of course, also affects the customs. Custom barriers have been established, but they are not successful in combating effectively the contraband trade, in view of the extent of the frontiers.

The leather industry is at a standstill, the commodity not being in demand at the moment in the consuming centres—Alexandria and Tripoli. There are also no buyers for pistachio nuts.

Jerusalem, May 5.

Harvesting is just commencing in some districts. Crops in central and northern Palestine are good; but in the south they are much below the average, particularly in the Beersheba district.

Haifa, May 5.

Business in cereals has been normal during the week, but prices have weakened in the Italian and French markets.

Mosul, May 5.

The price of wool tends to rise. The market is very active, and the export trade is considerable. Despite the export of cereals on a large scale, prices remain unchanged, the new crop being near. The barley harvest commenced at the beginning of the week. The yield promises to be good.

SUEZ CANAL COMPANY.

Sir R. Horne's Appointment.

In the House of Commons, on May 28, in reply to Mr. Gilbert, who asked if Sir Robert Horne had been appointed a director of the Suez Canal Company by the British Government, Sir William Joynson-Hicks, Financial Secretary to the Treasury, said there are thirty-two directors of the Suez Canal Company. Of these ten are British—three appointed by His Majesty's Government and seven, of whom the member for Hillhead (Sir Robert Horne) is one, by British shipowners. The directors received 2 per cent. of the net profits and fees for attendance, and their remuneration consequently varied from year to year.

In a further reply to Mr. Gilbert, Sir William Joynson-Hicks said: Of 400,000 original shares of the Suez Canal 360,481 of 500 frs. each (fully paid) were in issue at January 2, 1923. His Majesty's Government now hold 160,101 shares, 16,501 of the holding originally acquired having been drawn and replaced. Interest and dividends received in the years 1918-19, 1919-20, 1920-21, and 1921-22 on the Government holding amounted to £617,214, £682,497, £798,566, and £1,094,303 respectively. In addition, 300 qualifying shares were held by the British Government directors, on which interest and dividends were payable.

EFFECT OF POLITICAL DEVELOPMENTS.

Rise in Gilt-Edged.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday morning.

As was to be expected, the political developments caused some uncertainty when the markets opened after the holidays, but any effect was very short-lived, for the choice of Mr. Stanley Baldwin as Prime Minister and the announcement of the personnel of the new Ministry speedily restored confidence, the feeling being that the Government, on the whole, had gained by the change. In this connection it must be emphasised that special satisfaction is felt at the inclusion of Mr. McKenna in the Cabinet.

Apart from the satisfactory outcome of the change of Prime Minister, events at Lausanne at the week-end have had a helpful influence on the markets. Only a few days ago it seemed at least possible that the Conference would prove as ill-fated as its predecessor, but now, as a result of the settlement of the Greco-Turkish questions, a very different atmosphere prevails, and it is possible to look forward to a happy issue of the negotiations, with the result that the factor that has exercised a clogging effect on trade and commerce in the Near East will no longer exist. In the circumstances, it is not to be surprised at that the markets have assumed almost a buoyant appearance.

There is no further news at the moment with regard to new loans of importance. It will not be long, however, before some of those I have already mentioned make their appearance, while it goes without saying that a Near Eastern settlement should lead to quite a number of loans for the Near East.

Gilt-Edged Strong.

Gilt-edged have benefited particularly by the developments in the political situation, and securities have risen almost all along the line. Consols at 58½ have gained ¾. War Loan Fives are, however, ½ down at 101, but the Conversion Loan is 9-16 up at 80¾, while Fundings have risen ¼ to 92¾. Indian stocks have been quite firm. The Three per Cent. Loan at 61½ is ½ up; the Five and a-Half per Cent. Loan is unchanged at 103½; while the Seven per Cent. Loan remains at 120½.

Foreign Government securities have made a better showing during the week, the strength of Greek and Turkish loans being a notable feature. French stocks have been fairly steady, War Loan Fives being 29¾ x.d.; while the Four per Cents. at 23½ are ½ down. German Three per Cents. are unchanged at 12s., while Italian Rentes have shed ½ at 22. In Near Eastern securities Turkish Unified, after weakening, recovered sharply, and at 26 are only ¼ down on the week. Greek securities have been good all along the line, Monopolies being 43½. Czecho-Slovak Eight per Cents. are unchanged at 94½, while the new Roumanian Loan is now 1½ discount.

Industrials Cheerful.

After a period of uncertainty, quite a good tone has developed in the Industrial group, and yesterday cheerful conditions obtained almost everywhere. Business, however, remained very restricted, and this will no doubt be the case until the political situation abroad becomes clearer. When that happens things will go ahead.

Textiles have been fairly steady. Coats are unchanged at 69s., while Courtaulds at 69s. 6d. are 6d. down. Iron and steel shares have been rather dull. Vickers are 4½d. down at 15s. 3d., Armstrongs have shed 1s. at 19s., while Guest Keens are 1s. 3d. down at 42s. 9d. Tobaccos have been in strong request. Bats at 97s. 9d. have gained 3s. 3d., while Imperial Tobaccos at 92s. 3d. are 1s. 4½d. up.

Shipping securities have been rather weak. P. and O. Deferred at 327 are 3 down; Cunards are unchanged at 20s. 6d.; while Furness Withys remain at 36s. 6d. Bank shares have been fairly firm. Chartered of India remain at 19¾, National of India are ½ down at 45½; Imperial of Persia have shed 1-15 at 7½; National of Egypt at 21½ are ¼ down; Agricultural of Egypt at 5 29-32 have shed 3-32; Bank of British West Africa at 5 have gained 9d.; while Westminster Bank are unchanged at 18 11-16.

Oils Weak.

A dull tone has ruled generally in the Oil group, and there has been a certain amount of liquidation going on. Burmahs have not been affected by the favourable dividend announcement, and at 5 5-16 are 1-32 lower, while Anglo-Persian Ord. at 3 29-32 are 7-32 down. Lobitos at 6 13-16 are 3-32 lower, Mexican Eagles at 1½ are 5-32 down, while Shell Transport at 4½ are 5-16 lower. Among Egyptians, Anglo-Egyptian B are 3-32 down at 1½. In the Roumanian group Phoenix at 1 7-32 are about the same. Dacia Romanos are 15-32, while Steaua Romanas are 8s.

The Egyptian Delta Land and Investment Company announces a dividend of 6d. per share, payable June 1.

The traffic receipts of the Suez Canal Company for the period May 19 to 25 amounted to 3,540,000 francs, against 3,450,000 francs.

The South Behar Railway Company announce interim dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on capital stock, payable July 16.

FOREIGN EXCHANGES.

Improvement in Near Eastern Rates.

Changes in the Continental exchanges during the week have not been of much moment, except for the continued collapse of German marks, which have reached 281,500. The favourable developments at Lausanne have reacted on the Near Eastern exchanges, almost all of which have sharply improved. Greek drachmæ have risen to 230, Roumanian lei are 860, as compared with 930, while Bulgarian leva at 470 have risen 105 points. Turkish piastres are slightly better at 760.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Lausanne Conference.

Now that the questions awaiting agreement at the Lausanne Conference have been reduced to three or four, there can be no doubt as to the genuineness of the progress on which the report issued a short while ago by the British delegation insisted. It is true that of the matters still outstanding one or two are still capable of entering upon a critical phase, such as, for instance, the payment of the Turkish debt; but on neither side does it seem to be anticipated that anything can now prevent the signing of peace. In these fortunate circumstances we need not for the moment lay too much stress on the temporary deadlock over the question of the currency in which payment is to be made by Turkey to her foreign bondholders, nor on the apparent hesitation of the Allied Governments in notifying their acceptance of a further significant concession made to the Turks at Lausanne in regard to the judicial guarantees for foreigners in Turkey. The Allied delegates have agreed, subject to the approval of their Governments, that in the case of the arrest or search of any foreign subject, it shall be an obligation of the Turkish authorities to notify the foreign legal councillor immediately after, instead of before, the event.

Straws in Constantinople.

It is certainly unfortunate from the Turkish point of view that such a time as the present should have been chosen by the Constantinople Municipality for a glaring violation of an international agreement. A municipal loan of one million pounds sterling, advanced in 1909 by the National Bank of Turkey, was secured on the toll receipts of Galata Bridge, which have been paid daily into the bank, even during the War. On May 28 the bank was informed by the Vali of Constantinople that the Municipality found it no longer possible to hand over the money required to meet the £50,000 due annually for interest owing to the difference between the value of Turkish and British currencies, and that for the present no more payments of the toll receipts would be made to the bank. This act, coming on top of the appropriation of several of the revenues of the Ottoman Debt, which are specifically pledged to the bondholders, must inevitably prejudice Turkey, not only at Lausanne, but also afterwards in the general attitude of foreigners who are prepared to do business in the country. It is most desirable in the Turks' own interests that they should be able to deal with the type of foreign business man not of the get-rich-quick order, but one who looks upon Turkey as a suitable sphere for the permanent investment and a reasonable turnover of capital. If, however, Nationalist Turkey shows that it has no scruples in repudiating its undertakings whenever it finds it convenient to do so, it may still be able to hold out attractions for foreign capital, but on different terms, and it will have a different type of business man to cope with, who will see to it that his profits, made at the expense of the Turks, are proportionate to the risks that he runs.

The Attack on the Phanar.

Another incident that does little credit to the Turkish authorities in Constantinople is the attack on the Patriarch Meletios. On June 1 a crowd of Greeks forced their way into the Phanar and demanded the resignation of the Patriarch. When he refused, Meletios IV. was seized, dragged downstairs, and subjected to rough handling until he was rescued by Allied police. Turkish responsibility is explained by the presence among the demonstrators of Turkish police, who are accused of actually lending a hand in the attack on the Patriarch, and even if the outrage was not engineered by the Turks, it is believed to have been encouraged by them. Unfortunately, the career of the Patriarch Meletios IV. has been so closely identified with Greek political disputes that it would not be difficult to collect a Greek crowd in Constantinople for the purpose of an attack on the Phanar. There can be little doubt, however, that the Turkish authorities would be inclined to attach considerable value to the resignation of the present Patriarch in the hope of finding a successor more amenable to Turkish dictation. It will be remembered that at the first Lausanne Conference Ismet Pasha insisted on the complete removal of the Ecumenical Patriarchate from Constantinople, and only withdrew the claim on the understanding that the Patriarchate was no longer to take any part whatever in affairs of a political or administrative character. The Turks are within their rights in objecting to what they regard as prejudicial action on the part of the Patriarchate or an individual Patriarch; but they overlook the fact that the acts of which their Constantinople officials seem to have been guilty in connection with the attack on the Phanar are incompatible with the claim that Nationalist Turkey is to be treated as a State which has reached the European standard in the regulation of its foreign relations.

Bulgaria's Outlet to Ægean.

As was to be expected, the Bulgarian Government has lost no time in confirming the protest that its delegate at Lausanne lodged immediately with the Conference against the decision to restore to the Turks the Karagatch triangle, which Turkey had ceded to Bulgaria in 1915. M. Theodoroff was instructed to notify the Conference that Article 48 of the Treaty of Neuilly is still in force, and that the obligations of the Allied and Associated Powers are the same as before the conclusion of the Greco-Turkish agreement. Although the Allies are said to claim that, by providing for control of the entire railway from the Bulgarian frontier to Dedeagatch by the League of Nations, they have discharged their obligations to Bulgaria under the Treaty of Neuilly, it is not to be expected that the last has been heard of the subject. The Lausanne Conference, however, may establish its point that the question is outside its terms of reference, and in these circumstances Bulgaria will be in a stronger position if she waits to see how the present arrangement works. Her instinct may tell her that, unless the League of Nations provides the railway officials all along the route, her freedom of access to the Ægean will not stand any practical test; but her theories will be contradicted by her neighbours. Only when she is able to point to the failure of the scheme in actual working can she count on a sympathetic hearing. In the meantime the possibility of interesting developments need not be altogether overlooked.

Egypt in Transition.

The release of Zaghloul Pasha's former companions in exile, who remained in the Seychelles Islands when their leader was transferred to Gibraltar, follows as a natural corollary to Zaghloul Pasha's own release and the course of events in Egypt. By a coincidence, perhaps not altogether fortuitous, the official intimation to the deportees that they were free to return to their own country—boats do not leave the Seychelles every day of the month—was delivered simultaneously with the promulgation by the Egyptian Government of a new law regulating the right of public assembly. The main interest attaching to a measure of this nature, apart from the fact that it serves as a reminder that the promulgation of an Indemnity Act and the withdrawal of martial law are shortly to be expected, lies in the safeguards for law and public order that commend themselves to official Egypt on the threshold of its independence. The Constitution proclaims public meetings in Egypt to be free, subject to the law. The provisions of the law as now promulgated go a considerable way towards restricting that freedom, but not unnecessarily, perhaps, in view of recent tendencies. While independent Egypt is finding herself, she will do well to undergo as much self-discipline as possible, if only as a corrective to the excess of political Chauvinism in which she has indulged with comparative immunity under the tolerant protection of Great Britain.

Georgia and the Soviet.

Officially, Georgia is as Bolshevik as Russia. The Georgians, however, although socialistically minded, have bowed the knee to the Soviet system only under compulsion, and during their dark days do not seem to have abandoned all hope of winning back again the independence that not very long ago received formal recognition in Europe. If it be true that a Nationalist plot has been discovered by the Bolsheviks and has led to wholesale arrests and a large number of executions, it is to be feared that the national cause in Georgia has received a serious setback. To undertake a single-handed fight against Bolshevism at this moment may have argued great patriotism, but almost inevitably entailed too unequal a struggle. The country fell a prey to the Red Army partly as a result of political dissension. Its experience of Bolshevik rule had gone a long way towards convincing the great majority of the people that only by holding together could they hope to free themselves. From the reports that have reached England so far it is difficult to tell whether they have been led to show their hand prematurely or have again been betrayed by the enemy in their midst.

Lord Reading's Future.

It has become the fashion of late to drag Lord Reading's name into the discussion of each successive development in English politics, and we were quite prepared for last week's announcement of his immediate retirement, and also for the prompt contradiction which was issued on the highest authority. It was noteworthy, however, that the contradiction contained no reference to another suggestion of which a good deal has been said recently, that the Viceroy would come home temporarily to represent India at the Imperial Conference, and there is no doubt that such an arrangement would be widely welcomed, at any rate in Bombay. Of its appropriateness there can be little question, for Imperial disputes are now settled by diplomatic methods, while the Conference comprises many lawyers, and his keenest critics will admit that in an atmosphere of forensic diplomacy Lord Reading would be absolutely at home. Probably, too, a short respite from the daily worries of his position would be welcome, and since the legal obstacles are not insurmountable, the decision must depend mainly on the development of the situation in India.

India in the Autumn.

It would, however, be very rash to attempt a forecast of the situation in three months' time. The general election will then be imminent, and it will really be the first of its kind, for three years ago the electorate as a body scarcely knew what was happening. The interval has brought a certain amount of enlightenment, and also that most unfortunate acerbation of religious differences to which we have so often had to refer. Indian traditions require the settlement of religious disputes by hand-to-hand fighting, and, however parties may formally line up, it will be exceedingly difficult to confine the contest to secular matters, when the electors have religion on their nerves. The weather also is an important factor. Statistically speaking, a poor season is almost due, and if the elections should unhappily fall in a period of rapidly rising prices, it would be necessary for everyone, from the Viceroy downwards, to be at his post. We do not, therefore, anticipate any immediate announcement of Lord Reading's temporary return. The project may be dropped at once, but more probably the question will be left open until a more confident forecast can be made than is possible at present.

The Indian Honours List.

The Honours Lists, which were issued last Saturday, show signs of the great changes in Indian conditions. In the old days the higher ranks in the Orders were practically reserved for political and administrative rewards, while knighthoods were divided between the judicial bench and the leaders of the commercial world. Nowadays the administration of an ordinary province needs three or four titles where formerly one sufficed, while other demands are also increasing, and, apparently, the Orders are no longer large enough to go round, so administrative officials are finding their way into the list of ordinary knights. From the personal point of view, the present lists are not of great interest. Service at headquarters is as usual abundantly recognised, and service in the districts is just not ignored. It is possible to congratulate all the recipients without any sacrifice of sincerity, and it is impossible not to be reminded by the omissions or the great mass of good work which remains formally unrecognised.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

A Slack Season.

We have come upon a period lean of events, when everyone is talking about future happenings rather than the present—holidays, the Derby, May week, and the like; the papers, in fact, are so hard up for news that they are raking up once more the eternal question of domestic service. One supposes that some people do read all this rubbish, because some people read everything, provided it makes no demands on the intelligence; but it is a little trying to have such stuff foisted on us before the legitimate "silly season" of the Press commences.

Even the Government at the moment is rather planning than doing, though it is with particular interest that the early unfolding of its plans on German reparations is awaited. The possibility of a settlement is looming larger now than it did in Mr. Bonar Law's time; and it will be a mighty relief to the Government if before the end of the summer the two anxious problems of Ireland and of the Ruhr are satisfactorily solved. In any case, one cannot but feel the optimism at the moment surrounding both questions.

Rent Control and Re-assessment.

After many endeavours and not a few miscarriages a Rent Control Bill has been devised which does appear to satisfy the majority of people. The Government has decided to postpone the decontrol of all classes of houses until June, 1925, and is allowing cases of exceptional hardship to be dealt with by a tribunal. There are many other clauses in the Bill which are far too complicated for me to understand; possibly they will appear clearer after the debates in the House on Wednesday and Thursday.

In the matter of re-assessment, too, the Government has bowed to the public expression of opinion. One had come rather to think that a property-owner was a sinful fellow trying to hide the full extent of his vice from the light; the Government now more reasonably treats him as an ordinary being, and is charging its own inspectors, and not its groaning debtors, with proving the justice of their claim on appeal. The assessment is to be made on its proper land-tax basis, and so we are after all to be spared some of that bureaucratic bungling with which Mr. Lloyd George stifled our freedom.

The Caricatures of "Max."

Nothing is more remarkable in our age than the manifest knowledge displayed by artists, whether literary, musical, or merely pseudo, of the uses of advertisement. Your modern writer, painter, composer is no shy, retiring bird, who inevitably and carelessly is swindled by some agent; he is very wide awake to the sources of money, and, though he may depreciate the value of publicity for others, he takes trouble that he himself gets a good whack of it. But one must admit, having put him with the hundred-and-one other exceptions, that one had not placed Mr. Max Beerbohm in this category. I am not sufficiently young to have been touched by the anti-Max movement, which, I understand, is making considerable headway among the emptier-headed or fickle-minded; in fact, I am a whole-hearted admirer both of his books and of his caricatures. But I am sorry that, having hung in his exhibition at the Leicester Galleries pictures of King Edward VII. and of the Prince of Wales, which were seized upon by certain writers in the Press as offensive, he should have allowed some days to elapse before having them withdrawn. If he had withdrawn them at once (and somebody must, if he would not buy one, have lent him a newspaper to read), or if he had preserved them in his collection, the more sensible people would not have minded over-much; but the method that was actually employed must have been too commercially successful for any decent approval to be given to it.

Viscount Chaplin.

The death of Viscount Chaplin has been the occasion of expressions of regret for the age that is gone, coupled with wonder that he should have survived, with the beauty of his poise unaltered, into our modern time. There is no doubt that he took hold in an extraordinary way of the imagination of the generations through which he lived. Some remember him for his political activities—he was for about forty years in Parliament, and belonged to that sturdy group of Tories for whom when they said a thing was wrong it was wrong; others recall his love of the Turf, and speak with a show of intimate knowledge of his winning the Derby with Hermit in a snow-storm—the fact that there was no snowstorm does not matter in the least, the picturesqueness of the detail being admirably in keeping with the man; and others will not cease from talking of the figure in society which he not only cut, but steadfastly maintained. Our people, for all the drab dullness of these democratic days, still admires pomp and splendour; and the late Lord Chaplin appealed to it as many other greater men could not. It is scarcely possible for another such man to arise in our time, but that is our misfortune. Colour and ceremony are vanishing from our public life, but we shall probably have to restore them one day.

The League of Arts.

In many artistic ways we are as a nation going forward—Lord Newton's Bill for the prevention of disfiguring advertisements, for instance, was commented on sympathetically by the entire Press—but we still make many saddening mistakes. On our Office of Works worthy hopes are being built, but the news has come that, owing to its action, the League of Arts have had to abandon their intention during the summer to give in Hyde Park open-air performances of plays, operas, and dances. The Works Office apparently has no power to sanction the charge for admission to the enclosure hitherto made by the League, and so work in one of the most fruitful centres must cease. Those who saw the League's performances of such things as Purcell's "Dido and Æneas," and Old English Folk Dances, and Londoners' very manifest enjoyment of them, will regret profoundly this decision. London was always, until the League of Arts set to work in 1919, the dullest of places during the summer months, and must now relapse into its former drabness. This year, however, since we are to get no summer, it will perhaps not matter so much!

New Periodicals.

The running and management of journals is not nowadays the happiest of occupations, but even in the difficult contemporary conditions new papers keep on tumbling out. In the last week or so we have had what are practically four new monthly periodicals, the Illustrated Review, the Adelphi, Open-Air, and, in a new form, the English Review. The first is an effort in a new direction by Mr. Belloc, and is extremely well devised and produced. One can see no reason why this should not succeed. Mr. Middleton Murry's venture, the Adelphi, is much more speculative. He intends to print only what has significance in life, and, though a semi-human and intimate note is aimed at, the attractiveness of the first number at any rate is a little remote. I see no merits in Open-Air; it does not seem nearly so good as was the King's Highway, which failed. The English Review, which in Mr. Austin Harrison's time printed many good and not a few very foolish things, is now in new hands, and is to be run as an organ of "a virile and independent Conservatism." If it remains true to its ambition, its future at least for the next ten years or so is certain.

The Peace of Pocahontas.

The story of one of the most grotesque quests of our time has ended in the failure of the party at Gravesend to recover the bones of Princess Pocahontas. It was pure sentimentality, this wish of some Americans that the Princess should be buried in her native Virginia, and because of that fact, perhaps, attracted much more attention than it deserved. Even to the ears of Lord Curzon the report of the search reached, and he worthily dismissed it the other day as mere ghoulishness. Very few indeed will be dissatisfied that all the diggers found by the church at Gravesend was an odd assortment of skulls, thigh-bones, cats, dogs, old tins, and a pig's jawbone; for if, in view of the deplorable state in which they found the tomb, the charge of disturbing the sanctity of sepulture cannot be preferred against them, at any rate their motive was not approved by the public generally. Most people, in fact, thought the whole scheme was a horrid idea, and are glad that the bones of the Princess, wherever they may be, may now lie in peace.

The High Commissioner.

According to present arrangements, the High Commissioner and Lady Allenby will leave for England about June 20, when the Residency will move to Alexandria for the summer. On the 8th His Excellency goes to Kantara to inaugurate the memorial to the Allied Forces which has been erected there. During Lord Allenby's absence Mr. Ernest Scott, Counsellor to the Residency, will officiate as Acting High Commissioner.

The Tutankhamen Objects.

This week the objects from the Tutankhamen ante-chamber arrived in Cairo, and were transferred to the Cairo Museum, where certain of the cases have been opened and the contents put on show. The transport from the tomb at the height of the Valley to Cairo was by no means an easy task. To the river bank at Luxor they were conveyed by Decauville. From Luxor to Cairo they were brought by barge, and from the river bank they were carried by hand into the Museum. Notwithstanding their fragility and the jolting which they must have suffered, especially on the road from the tomb to the river bank at Luxor, they have arrived in excellent condition, thanks to the extraordinary care and ability with which Mr. Howard Carter, Mr. Mace, and Mr. Lucas prepared and packed them and Mr. Callender superintended their transport.

Only a few of the objects are being exhibited at present because of the lack of accommodation and of showcases. These include the magnificent throne, the beautiful shrine made of gold plates, some of the wonderful alabaster vases, the King's chair with its very fine carving, the Ankh torch-holders, the King's mannequin, the beautifully worked serpent-emblem of the tenth nome of Lower Egypt, the elaborately ornamented alabaster casket, and some other smaller objects. The decision to exhibit them came somewhat as a surprise. It was, in fact, taken almost at the last moment, when it was realised that some of the objects, at any rate, would be fit on arrival for exposure to the atmosphere, and that some of the old showcases could be used pending the manufacture of proper ones. A small space has been cleared at the Museum for these exhibits on the first floor, and they will be kept there until the proposed annexe has been made.

Mr. Carter and Mr. Mace have left for Europe on a well-earned holiday; Mr. Lucas is remaining here for the summer; Mr. Callender has gone to his estate at Armant; and Mr. Burton is already in England. All will foregather again in the Valley in October, when the work of digging out the tomb will be undertaken and the task of removing the shrine or canopies in the sepulchral chamber will be started.

The Conspiracy Trial.

The conspiracy trial drags on its weary way. Although it began seven weeks ago, the Court has only just finished dealing with the witnesses for the prosecution. It is understood that the defence have quite a number to call, so that the case is likely to last well into the month of June. The trial is now taking place under most arduous conditions. During the past week the temperature has risen very considerably, and the court-house has become a veritable furnace. An attempt has been made to alleviate the heat by erecting electric fans operating on huge blocks of ice, but the atmosphere and the flies are still very trying, and both Court and counsel are deserving of every sympathy in the discomfort which they are suffering.

The most important facts elicited during the last week or so have been evidence which distinctly confirms the theory held at the time that, in the early days of the investigation by the Special Criminal Department, one at least of the Egyptian officials did his best to thwart the inquiry. Whether it will be possible to take any steps against him is doubtful, but if, as seems probable, the Court adopts a serious view of his attitude, it is to be hoped that the Egyptian Government in its own interests will take proper action in his case. Meanwhile interesting developments are expected in connection with the various arrests that have been effected as a result of revelations made in the course of this trial. It is highly probable that in the near future those who at a safe distance directed the activities of this criminal organisation and are in reality more responsible than the unfortunate men who carried out their inspirations, will be brought to book.

PALESTINE.

Jerusalem, May 23.

Palestine and the Arab Union.

The burning topic here at the moment is whether or not Palestine is included in the recently signed Anglo-Arab Treaty. During the past fortnight excitement in Arab circles has been growing; all manner of gossip became current as to the contents of the treaty and Palestine's part in it. As ever, hope grows eternal in the Arab breast, and it was openly asserted that the treaty was to include Palestine as one of the independent States which were to be comprised in an Arab union, sketched or promised in the treaty draft which was being brought to King Hussein for his signature. To give an air of religious solemnity to the act, the signature of the King of the Hejaz was to be attached on the Feast of Ramadan—last Thursday.

Then early on Friday a cable was received by the local Moslem-Christian Association, from King Hussein, purporting to give the substance of the agreement. This cable was promptly embodied in a hand-bill proclamation from the head of the Moslem-Christian Association and distributed in thousands of copies. The cable, as printed, stated categorically that Palestine was included among Arab territories whose freedom Great Britain pledged herself to recognise, and which were to be welded into an All-Arab Union, which Great Britain would seek to foster. The jubilation in Arab circles can well be imagined, as well as the corresponding consternation in Jewish circles. The Arab linguist summed up the situation in the terms "Finish Balfour Declaration"! The Jews endeavoured to get the face-interpretation of the Hejaz cable contradicted by the local Government, but the only comfort—and it was cold comfort—was a statement issued by the police for publication in all the Palestine papers, that an official statement would be issued in due course, and that in the meantime it must not be assumed "that any change has been effected in the political status of Palestine"—which was a masterpiece of official reticence.

The local Jewish papers are, naturally, indignant, and are pouring out their wrath on everybody from the High Commissioner down to their Zionist Agency officials. They receive daily reassuring cables from their English agents to the effect that Palestine is not really included in the treaty, that it is an impudent invention on the part of the Arabs, and that, anyhow, Dr. Weizmann was consulted by the British Government about the treaty, so that all must be well.

The Air Force Display.

Last week, Tuesday, May 15, the Air Force at Ramleh invited most of Palestine to witness an aerial display. This is the first thing of its kind we have had here. It certainly proved an attraction, and drew, it is estimated, something like 8,000 spectators—an enormous crowd for these parts. The R.A.F.'s machines went through all their more spectacular performances and stunts—bombing an "enemy explosive factory," giving an exhibition of an air combat, "crazy flying," "balloon hunting," landing on a specified mark from a height of 2,000 feet, as well as straight-forward racing. The "Palestine Aerial Derby," with thirteen competitors, was won by Flt.-Lt. Martin, flying a Vickers-Vimy. Our Air Force is to be highly congratulated both for the happy idea of the show and also for the most efficient way in which it was carried through.

The Incidence of the King's Birthday.

A characteristic little Palestinian squabble is at present going on over the date for the official celebration of the King's Birthday. Last year the actual date fell on a Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath, but was officially observed on the following Monday, whereby it aroused much indignation in Arab circles that the scruples of a minority should so interfere with a State function. This year it falls on a Sunday, and those in authority have seen fit to transfer the official observance—public holiday, State service in the Cathedral, official receptions—to Saturday, the day before, Sabbath or no Sabbath. The Christian Arab Press takes this as a proof that their complaints of a year ago have borne fruit, and that the Government has come to a better frame of mind, and it utters a pious hope that this is just a beginning of the recognition of Arab rights. And naturally the Jewish community is correspondingly indignant, though it is too bothered by the Hussein cable to be affected by much else at the moment.

The Axe in the Departments.

Reference was made last week to the abolition, or, rather, absorption into another department, of the Department of Commerce and Industry, on the grounds of economy. The budgets of most Departments are now undergoing drastic reduction, and a considerable number of senior officials are being dispensed with. The head of the Department of Public Works, Major-General Grant, leaves in a few weeks, and he is being followed by several others out of his department. The thinning out of this department is ominous, and says little for the Colonial Office's confidence in a large and rapid development of Palestine in the way of water, light, and road transport. "P. W. D." started life on a large scale with a large expert staff, but for long they have not found sufficient work to keep them occupied. The Palestine Loan, which should have meant so much for their projects, has not yet materialised, any more than the many Jewish millions that were confidently expected two years or so ago.

Attempts at Reconciliation.

Two or three years ago the Hebrew daily, Doar ha-Yom, published an Arabic edition, which may or may not have had many subscribers among the readers aimed at; in any case it did not long survive. This past week has seen an attempt at the reverse process. The Arabic paper, Nafir, has begun to publish a weekly Hebrew edition ha-Shofar ("The Trumpet"). Its aims, as explained

Constantinople, May 29.

Breathing Again.

We have just been through another crisis. A new Greco-Turkish war has been averted by a hair's-breadth. It might have given us a first-class thrill last August or September, but we are becoming quite callous. As far as I can discover, nobody started packing up last week, notwithstanding a generous crop of hair-raising stories about the local massacres which were going to inaugurate the campaign in Constantinople itself. The fact is, the Orient is living up to its reputation as the place where the expected never happens. It is true that we are not quite out of the wood yet, and guns might yet go off unexpectedly; but it does really seem as if the civilising influence of good Lausanne hotels, and an apparently stable scheme of life, where revolvers only rarely appear in restaurants, has had its due effect upon the hot passions of the inveterate enemies of the Near Eastern world, and they have realised the danger of plunging into war. The difficulty is now, as ever, Angora.

The Turk as Diplomatist.

Whatever one may think of the present temper of the Turks, however low one's opinion of their capacity as a governing organisation may be, however cynical may be our views on the future of the New Turkey, whose schemes of reform may appear childishly inefficient to our Western eyes, we must admit one thing: that wherever the Turk comes into contact with the European, he shows himself to be a moderately reasonable diplomatist, with an innate capacity for finding that middle course which, however unsatisfactory from the standpoint of absolute right and wrong, has saved the world from many worse evils. This has been illustrated time and time again, both in Constantinople and Lausanne. The representatives of Angora in both places have deserved well of their country in that they have definitely imposed their will in all matters of major importance on the ignorant backwoodsmen of Anatolia, whose wild Asiaticism would have wrecked all chances of a reasonable agreement long before this. I would not be a foreign representative of the Grand National Assembly for anything in the world. The one promising feature about the new Turkey is the fact that they have men like Ismet Pasha, Adnan Bey, and others, who are able to keep their end up in what appear to be hopeless circumstances. Let us hope that such men will have a chance of showing what they can do in the task of reconstructing Turkey after the conclusion of peace.

Reconstruction Problems.

Now that the question of peace or war seems to have been very properly relegated to the background, more practical reconstruction problems are coming to the fore. The negotiations of foreign companies with Angora, and the settlement of the vexed question as to the currency in which payment of coupons of the Ottoman External Debt shall be made, are coming into greater prominence. Both are of primary importance. As to the first, the Turkish Press believes that the British companies, which include the Constantinople Telephone Company, the Eastern Telegraph Company, Messrs. Armstrong Vickers, Ltd., the Aidin Railway Company, and others, will put forward the following general principles as the basis of their claims:—

(1) The confirmation of all concessions granted before the War and of all modifications made since the War.

(2) Re-adaptation of the concessions to the new internal conditions in Turkey.

(3) Extension of the time limits of the concessions to compensate for the War-period during which the rights of the concessionnaires were in abeyance.

(4) Payment of an indemnity to counterbalance losses sustained through requisitions and other causes during the War.

(5) Reference to arbitration in case settlement by direct negotiation is not arrived at.

More or less similar claims are reported to have been lodged by the French and Italian representatives.

All the delegates have now arrived at Angora, and negotiations are proceeding with Moukhtar Bey. No prognostications concerning the results are yet possible. The press confidently assumes that a settlement will be reached in the course of a week or so. We take leave to doubt it. It appears much more probable that there will be a great deal of hard bazaar bargaining, all of which takes time.

The issue of these negotiations should affect seriously the other burning financial question of the hour, namely the currency in which the future fragments of coupons of the Ottoman debt will be made. The attitude of the bondholders' representatives to Hassan Bey in Paris is a prudent and reasonable one. Appeals of States to their creditors to show mercy and threats to go into bankruptcy if they are pressed are becoming far too common. National credit is seriously impaired by such unworthy manoeuvres. The Turks will probably complain bitterly that foreign creditors have chosen their poverty-stricken, sorely tried country as a target for their moral precepts; and they will have some semblance of justification; but the main argument of the bondholders is a sound one. The contractual relations between Turkey and her foreign creditors are not affected by the relations or treaties between Turkey and foreign Powers. Hence there is no necessity of mixing the debt question up with the Peace Treaty. A further reason for delaying any decisions on the debt question until after the conclusion of peace is the fact that a certain portion, possibly forty per cent., of the external debt of Turkey will fall upon the detached provinces, and until those provinces are officially recognised as detached from Turkey by a treaty, signed, sealed, and delivered, any concession made by the bondholders in respect of Turkey's external debt will apply, not to the sixty per cent., which is new Turkey's responsibility, but also to the forty per cent. which falls on the shoulders of the Succession States. The validity of that argument should appeal forcibly to the Turks, in view of their relations with some of the neighbouring States who have to share with them the responsibility for the external debt.

The Maltese Community.

The Constantinople Maltese community has taken a wise step in inaugurating a central committee for the care of its interests under the presidency of one of its most respected members, Dr. Alfred Rizzo. H.B.M. Consul-General and Vice-Consul have consented to act as Honorary President and Vice-President respectively. The object of the committee will be to promote in every way possible the civic and national spirit among members of the community, assisting the education of the children, starting a benefit fund for the needy, encouraging the study of the English language, and so forth. The objects are admirable, and it is particularly pleasing to observe the growth on foreign soil of any institution that underlines the essential oneness of different parts of the British Empire in these days when self-determination is rampant.

PRESS ON THE NEAR EAST.

Angora and the East.

In the Contemporary Review of June Professor Arnold Toynbee sets down some of the political impressions produced upon him by his recent visit to Angora, in an article entitled "Angora and the British Empire in the East." First of all, he says, the Turkish nation is pre-occupied with the problem of internal economic development, and he does not think that this new desire for economic progress will prove transitory. This road to economic progress and efficiency will not be taken by the Turks alone, but by the other Middle Eastern peoples also. The Turk now is bound by a rigid Nationalism, and such extra-territorial adventures as Pan-Islamism and Pan-Turanianism are out of fashion. This fact is exemplified by the insistence which Moustapha Kemal Pasha has recently laid on the dangers attending Balkan and Arab aspirations on the part of the Turks.

Upon the question of Kurdistan, however, the Turks have definitely made up their minds—they mean to incorporate it politically. It would have been wiser, says Professor Toynbee, to have offered the Kurds the position of equal partners, but they have committed themselves to the policy of amalgamation. Hence, he thinks, if the present policy of the British Government in regard to Irak is to be carried out, the goodwill of Turkey can be obtained only at the price of Southern Kurdistan.

If we relinquish the political sovereignty of Southern Kurdistan then, he is convinced, the Turks will not use it as a stepping-stone for the re-acquisition of the rest of Mesopotamia.

There are important grounds, he proceeds, for believing that the British and Turkish peoples will slip back into their traditional nineteenth-century relationship, chief among which is the perceptible loosening of the recent bonds between Turkey and Russia.

The article concludes by emphasising the fact that Angora is much more than the capital of the new Turkish National State—it is the focus from which revolutionary Nationalism has been spreading through all the Middle-Eastern peoples. The men of Angora have challenged, and have challenged successfully, the ascendancy of the British Empire throughout the East, so that it is no longer conceivable that the Oriental peoples will consent to work out their destinies within the framework of the British Empire. The Eastern countries intend to make their own selection from what we have to offer them, and to produce their own blend between Western and Oriental civilisation.

The Future of Yugoslavia.

The Round Table of June sets out in full the details of "the problem of Yugoslavia." It grants, indeed, that "Yugoslavia exists, and whatever differences there are concerning the form which the union is finally to receive, no one doubts its survival," but expatiates on the fact that no one formula will cover all the cross-divisions of Yugoslavia. Of the three provinces—Croatia, Dalmatia, and Bosnia-Herzegovina—intervening between Slovenia and Serbia, it says that there is little sense in lumping them altogether, still less in partitioning any of them; in view of the marked individuality of each a fair measure of autonomy is desirable. But, it says, this must be only a step towards closer union between the Serbs and Croats.

It then turns to the "enormous" economic possibilities of Yugoslavia, which, however, must remain unused unless an efficient, progressive Government creates conditions under which foreign capitalists could work. Her present condition is poor—"between her politicians and her peasants (who form about 85 per cent. of the population, own practically the entire wealth, and, if taxed, would reject the Government), Serbs and Croats alike, Yugoslavia remains poor, in spite of her natural wealth." Salvation must, therefore, come from outside, for though the peasants may preserve a State, they cannot build one, and in any case it is in mining, industry, and trade that the economic life of Yugoslavia will have to be raised. "It is in Yugoslavia that Czech industry and Austrian commerce and finance could find the most profitable field for their activities." In conclusion, it makes the suggestion that the railways not only of Yugoslavia, but of Czecho-Slovakia, and of Austria as well, should be handed over to one single Anglo-American railway concern which would eliminate bureaucratic waste and political jealousies. And its last word:—"This sounds like a daydream—but perhaps all thoughts of economic recovery and further development are for these parts of the world in our own time nothing better than daydreams."

THE UNITY OF THE ARTS.

"THE ARTS OF GREECE." By F. A. Wright. (London: Longmans and Co. 6s. net.)

In the three essays, on the Dance, on Music, and on Painting respectively, contained in this book Mr. F. A. Wright attempts to explain the unity which underlay the arts of ancient Greece, and, though exposition is his first purpose, perhaps even more interesting is his implication that we should endeavour to restore to our own age that same unity. In his own words, his book "is an attempt to state some ancient principles again, and to show how it was that to the Greeks music was the music of words, and not the music of instruments; how their painting depended on the beauty of line, and not the beauty of colour; how dancing was not a mere form of exercise, but a form of mental expression using the body as a medium. In each one of the arts here discussed there is a vital difference between Greek and modern conceptions; and the difference is not always to our advantage." And he further suggests that our musicians, painters, and dramatists must take the Greeks as models if they are to escape from "that spirit of restlessness which since the Renaissance has been the bane of art."

Now, Mr. Wright is well within the current of fashion when he tries thus to synthesise the arts; among our own poets, critics, and musicians this feeling towards a unity, at least towards a comprehension of arts other than that in which they are creatively or actively engaged, is very manifest. But few can bring to the attempt such learning and complete understanding of the Greek spirit as has the author of these essays. Yet in his satisfaction with the serenity and goodness which Greek art undoubtedly attained we are not sure that he does not tend to minimise the importance of works performed, not in anything approaching that serenity, but in the glare of our modern period. He is pleased with contemporary efforts to revive the Greek spirit, particularly with the school of Eurythmics, but have such efforts produced any genius or any work of art? Are not those, indeed, who to-day aim at unity also those who succeed in achieving mediocrity?

However, with Mr. Wright's actual exposition of the Greek arts we have no grounds for disagreement. He shows, easily and delightfully, how important was the dance among the Greeks; how our own musical technology (such words as "melody," "harmony," "rhythm") is derived from it; and how it was an art of universal application, not merely an exercise, or a ritual, but a natural expression. In his essay on Music he points out how the whole conception of the art has changed from the time of the Greeks: to them it meant all literature, nearly all their music being vocal, and nearly all their literature spoken words. Their instrumental music was small, for the simple reason that they counted as musical only two instruments—the lyre and the flute-clarinet.

But apparently these two instruments perfectly sufficed their needs—and Mr. Wright makes the amusing guess that, though they might have accepted the pianola as being fit matter for the amateur to practise on, they would have rejected the violin, the necessity for skill in playing which would have transgressed their ideas of specialisation. This chapter on Music is extremely important, for, whereas there is a tendency nowadays merely to infer from the excellence of their other arts that the Greeks had also music worthy of them, Mr. Wright reminds us that we have a good deal of Greek music surviving, and in many other ways adds to our knowledge of Greek music. But we think he goes too far in his love for the Greeks. On the assumption that the human voice is the most perfect of instruments, he explains the Greek lack of, or omission to invent, other instruments; and he asserts that they wrote so much for the voice because their language was so beautiful. This leads him to say that Bach, Mendelssohn, and Beethoven wrote little for the voice because the German language was so ugly, and to speak disrespectfully of the "blurred vowels and the harsh monosyllables of English." Now, quite apart from the inaccuracy of the examples given, this explanation of the writing in particular musical forms simply will not do: musicians do not desist from writing in any particular form because of such difficulties. Were not our own exquisite madrigals and Elizabethan songs written in English? Was it the unmusicality of the Russian language, scarcely proved by Moussorgsky or Rimsky-Korsakoff, that made Scriabin omit to write a single song? However, these are questions to be asked of Mr. Wright's illustrations and inferences; in his exposition, as we have said, there is little that is not admirable.

In his essay on Painting Mr. Wright has to devote most of his space to the vases of the Greeks, for, despite abundant literary evidence to prove the existence of frescoes and easel pictures, these vases are the only things that have survived in any quantity. He notes that the Greek painter was not a colourist—his devotion was to the pure line, and black, white, and red, and occasionally yellow, sufficed his needs. He did not dabble in "atmosphere," working only in sunlight and clear air. This concentration and comparative simplicity of aim again lead Mr. Wright to comment adversely upon our own perplexed state, in which, it appears, we have suffered a degradation of the senses through making our standard of aesthetic perception the eye (i.e., attaching far too much importance to colour). Here once more we think this author unduly hard on our generation, for the appreciation both of colour and of line is probably keener now than it ever was in the artistic history of our people. But, however that may be, we should like to pay tribute to these stimulating, if provoking, essays; for the information supplied, at any rate, we are unreservedly grateful.

THE PALESTINE EXPERIMENT.

The fact that the elections recently held in Palestine have been officially declared null and void came as a surprise to no one, for it was obvious that the majority of the Arabs were determined in their policy of non-participation, and would reduce to an absurdity the electoral device by which it was hoped to gain their goodwill. The Legislative Council, which was to have been formed of twelve elected members, the High Commissioner, and ten official members, remains at the moment, therefore, a theoretical proposition. But the possibility of forming it eventually has not been abandoned, for the Order in Council which was published on May 29 provides for the constitution of such a body "from and after a date to be fixed by the High Commissioner in Executive Council, by Proclamation in the Gazette"; and the first general election for the choice of the unofficial members is to be held within six months from the issue of this Proclamation. In other words, the Government, though thus temporarily thwarted in its intentions, is equally determined with its present opponents; and the policy of just and impartial rule is to be maintained. An Advisory Council is in the interim being revived, containing twelve unofficial members, of whom eight are Mohammedans, two Christians, and two Jews; this Council, which the High Commissioner will consult on all important matters, will continue in existence until the Legislative Council is elected. To emphasise the continuity of the spirit which has characterised the British Administration in Palestine, the Order in Council expressly reiterates that "no Ordinance shall be promulgated which shall restrict complete freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship, save in so far as is required for the maintenance of public order and morals; or which shall tend to discriminate in any way between the inhabitants on the ground of race, religion, or language." Quite plainly, the Government of Palestine is to go on as before, with ideals unabated and resolves unaltered.

It would be easy to point out that the Government in this particular experiment—a purely Western conception, by the way—has failed, and to hail the boycott of the elections as complete proof of Arab hostility to the idea of a Jewish "National Home"; but little purpose would be served by so doing. The Government has failed, the Arabs are hostile, but what else could the Government do but try again? Palestine has always been in a different position from that of any other country for which we have assumed responsibility, for, although, perhaps, it is bootless to refer back to the question of pledges, since contradictory interpretations of those pledges are given even by those who took part in the making of them, it remains a fact that in Palestine we are doubly pledged, and, too, more positively than anywhere else. Naturally, the fulfilment of those pledges is falling short of the expectations of those in whose interests they were given, but that is the fault of the conditions, not of the fulfiller. It must at first have been hoped that the reconciliation of Arabs and Jews in Palestine would have been easier than has since been proved; and the persistence of the attempt, honest and continuous, to reconcile them does in fact mean the postponement or the whittling down of their respective hopes. The "National Home" of the Jew in Palestine still leaves much scope for the purely spiritual exercise of his domestic longings—perhaps that must always be so; and the Arab cannot see any early realisation of his aspirations towards self-government. Both races are still a little fearful and perplexed; how sensitive their nerves yet are can be seen in our Jerusalem Correspondent's description this week of their reception of the Anglo-Arab Treaty. The success of the British experiment has, therefore, yet to be proved. There is no point in denying that the fiasco of the elections is a serious set-back to that experiment, as well as, less importantly, a blow to our prestige. But we must go on. From some ploughs to which we have set our hand we can, perhaps, turn away, and leave them without hurt to grow rusty; but in Palestine we are too deeply involved and interested for such abandonment at the moment to be feasible. We would not, however, wish to be accused of any blind optimism in regard to Palestine. The great task which Britain has taken upon herself, or, as some think, to which she has been called, of rebuilding there a home for the Jews, is, we are convinced, capable of achievement; but that home must always be more spiritual than actual. It will be, particularly to Jews of restless or unhappy temperament, a focus, a distributing centre of thought and of enterprise; it can never be a hearth to those Jews whose adopted nationality assures them comfort and content. In this connection, it is well to recall the official definition of the Jewish National Home in Palestine:—"It is not the imposition of a Jewish nationality upon the inhabitants of Palestine as a whole, but the further development of the existing Jewish community, with the assistance of Jews in other parts of the world, in order that it may become a centre in which the Jewish people as a whole may take, on grounds of religion and race, an interest and a pride." The partial character of this aim is sometimes obscured, especially in the idle talk that Great Britain is handing Palestine over to the Jews. But the statement contains also another implication: the larger problem of Jewry cannot be solved by this Palestine experiment. For the greater part of the fifteen million Jews in the world the Holy Land can never be more than a spiritual home, and though we may affect this problem by the institution of a "National Home," we cannot radically alter it. No new political practice, no attempted fulfilment of prophecy even, can touch that mystery.

And what of the future of Palestine? On the purely practical side things are scarcely going as well as might be. The commercial development of the land has not been the success that was anticipated, and we imagine that those British Jews who, on being asked to invest money in Palestine, looked and did not leap, will not be surprised to read in our Jerusalem Correspondent's letter this week that the Colonial Office's confidence in the development of Palestine by water, light, and road transport is waning. Too great stress, it is true, can be laid on the poverty and intractability of the country: but, speaking actually, an equal error can be made by repeating too often that "man cannot live by bread alone." The immediate future of this poor country is in Britain's hands, and when we relinquish it, it will revert, purged and re-charged, we hope, to the possession of the Arabs. But they will not be the pre-War Arabs. They will be Arabs to whom our Administration has been an unforgettable model, who will, in especial, see that justice to other races is a sine qua non of enlightened rule. How soon they will reach an understanding with us upon the "National Home," it is impossible to forecast; presumably, however, not so soon as was expected. But the very fact that at some period another General Election is to be held indicates that the Government is not without hope that the Arabs can be reconciled to the Balfour Declaration. It is not pleasant, we admit, to have to proceed in this dark and indefinite way, but how often and how gloriously has it been England's way! Perhaps it is specious to point to the quiet that Palestine now enjoys as giving livelier hopes than could be entertained two or three years ago of Arab-Jewish reconciliation; but at least that quiet provides ground in which the seeds of British justice must inevitably, it slowly, ripen. From the next elections in Palestine, in short, we may expect the formation of a genuine constitution, which will probably be the basis of the Arabs' form of Government when they themselves become a sovereign power.

AN EARLY TRAVELLER IN THE SUDAN AND ABYSSINIA.

By "ABU NAKHLA."

Monsieur Poncet, so the anonymous writer of the preface of the English translation of his book* tells us—was an able Doctor of Physick, liv'd at Caire, the Capital City of Egypt, and gave such pregnant demonstrations of his abilities in those parts that the Emperour of Æthiopia being seized with an illness which threaten'd his life, he was prevailed upon as the best qualify'd Physician to undertake the cure.

We may agree, too, with M. Poncet's introducer that his work is "a masterpiece of its kind," and it certainly contains much "curious and extraordinary matter."

Poncet tells us that he left Cairo on June 10, 1698, accompanied by Hagi Ali, an officer of the Ethiopian court, and Father Charles Francis Xaverius de Brevedent, a missionary of the Jesuits. Hagi Ali never receives another mention in the course of the narrative, and the Reverend Father died within a day's march of the Abyssinian capital in circumstances which seem to throw some doubt on our author's medical skill, and definitely show him to have had a bedside manner which could hardly have helped in those days to have increased his practice.

We were constrain'd to take up in that place (Barko), by reason of my falling very ill, and because my dear companion F. de Brevedent found himself in a few days reduc'd to the last extremity by a violent purging occasion'd by the kernels of Indian Pine-Apples, called Cataputia, which they had given him unfortunately at Tripoli in Syria. This remedy always dangerous (according to an able Physician) had caus'd a Flux which incommoded him much, and which he conceal'd from me through Modesty. I had no sooner learn'd the Condition he was in but I ordered myself to be carry'd to his Chamber, although I was at that time very much out of order. My Tears more than my Words gave him to understand that I despair'd of his Cure, and that his Illness was without Remedy. Those Tears were sincere, and if I cou'd have sav'd him at the Expense of my own life, I shou'd have done it with Pleasure. But he was ripe for Heaven, and Almighty God thought fit to call him to the Reward of his Apostolic Labours.

The fact that Poncet was travelling to the Court of Abyssinia seems to have proved an excellent passport in the kingdoms of Dongola and Sennar, through which he passed. Of his journey through Upper Egypt he has not much of interest to tell us, but it is interesting to read of a 'stone bridge at Assiut, which he believed to be the only one on the Nile. It was here that Poncet joined a caravan and travelled by the desert route in four days to "Halaoue." After a rest there a march of sixteen days was made by "Chabbe" and "Selyma" to "Machou," a place on the eastern bank of the Nile opposite Argo, and which must have been at, or near, the modern Kerma.

The terrors of the desert journey are vividly described and our author is greatly impressed by the utility of the camel. It may be true that "these Animals will continue six or seven Days without eating or drinking," but, either the breed has seriously deteriorated in the last two hundred years, or Poncet was the victim of a "leg-pull":—

That which is yet more surprising is, what a venerable old Man, Brother of the Patriarch of Æthiopia who was of our Caravan, assured me, viz.: That having twice made the Journey from Selyma to Sudan thro' the Country of the Negro's, and having each time spent forty Days in passing the Desarts, which lie in the Road, the Camels of that Caravan had neither eat nor drunk during that whole time. Three or four Hours Rest in a Night suffices them and supplies the want of Food, which you are not to give them, before you have water'd them, because they would otherwise burst.

That last little touch discloses the Patriarch's venerable brother as a real artist in romance.

We find that at the time of Poncet's visit both Argo upstream and Korti downstream, of the Kingdom of Dongola, were each administered by an "Erbab" or Governor directly answerable to the Fung kings of Sennar, to whom also the kings of Dongola paid tribute. Dongola seems to have been a prosperous enough country, in spite of the ravages of plague, in 1696, and the sagias (waterwheels) turned then as they had turned for centuries in the past and will doubtless continue to turn for centuries in the future. Trade was all by barter, and millet not only provided almost the only article of diet, but also the native beer which Poncet thought as nasty as it still seems to the European palate. Of the people he formed a poor opinion:—

Oathes and Blasphemies are very common among those stupid People, and who likewise are so debauch'd, that they have neither Modesty, nor Civility, nor Religion: for altho' Mahometanism is what at present they make Profession of, yet they know no more than the bare Formulary of their Profession of Faith, which they repeat upon all occasions. What is truly deplorable, and which drew Tears to the Eyes of Father Brevedent, my dear Companion, is, that it is not long since this was a Christian Country, and that it has not lost the Faith, but only for want of some Person who had Zeal enough to consecrate himself to the Instruction of this abandon'd Nation. Upon our Way we found great Number of Hermitages, and Churches half ruin'd.

It is curious to reflect that this was the same country which some one hundred and eighty years later was to produce Mohammed Ahmed el Mahdi and form the cradle for a revolt against Egyptian rule—a revolt whose origins were political, but which found its motive power in a violent fanaticism. At the same time, no one can agree that any one man could have staved off the wave of the Islamic invasion which had in the preceding centuries swept over the Sudan from the north and east. Neither can we take the grief of the Reverend Father as being entirely prompted by the paganism which he found, for it is, unfortunately, the fact that the reason of his presence with the Mission was a somewhat undignified quarrel between the Jesuits and the Franciscans, who both desired the control of missionary enterprise in Abyssinia. We cannot but assume that the desire to cure the King of Abyssinia of scurvy would not in itself have been sufficient to prompt so arduous a journey.

Dongola town was then on the eastern bank of the Nile, and is described as a poor and ramshackle township surrounding the castle of the King. From Dongola our travellers went to Korti, in Fung territory, and thence struck across the Bayuda desert to Jebel Gerri, as the tribes to the east and north of Korti were in revolt against the Fung power, which was by that time very weak on the outskirts of the kingdom, and was in another hundred and twenty years to suffer a final eclipse at the hands of the armies of Mohammed Ali Pasha, first Khedive of Egypt. It was by the Bayuda Desert and by a route which must have been very near that of Poncet, if not identical with it, that the Desert Column in January, 1886, made their attempt, which failed by so little, to reach Gordon in Khartoum. These routes are almost deserted now—killed by the railway—but if motor transport ever becomes a commercial proposition in desert countries they may well in the near future take a new lease of life.

The Nile was crossed by ferry at Jebel Gerri, and the journey continued up the Blue Nile (Poncet makes no mention of the White Nile) to the capital of the Fung kingdom at Sennar.

Of the place and its life we get an interesting description. The King's Palace was without plan or order—"a confused heap of buildings"—and surrounded with a wall of mud brick. Inside, "the apartments are furnished richly enough with carpets after the manner of the Levant." The King's person was hedged about with great ceremony. No one, whether stranger or native, might approach except barefoot, and the King was saluted by falling on the knees and kissing the ground three times. Twice a week the King dined at one of his country houses a league distant from the town. These meals seem to have been in the nature of a picnic—if a rather elaborate one—as the viands were carried from the Palace in the King's retinue, which, with the subsequent proceedings, is thus described:—

Between three and four hundred Horsemen mounted upon fine Horses make the first Appearance. After these comes the King attended by a great Number of Footmen, and arm'd Souldiers, who with a loud Voice, sing forth his Praises, and play upon the Tabor, which makes no unpleasant Harmony. Seven or eight Hundred young Maids and Women march together with these Souldiers, and carry upon their Heads great round Baskets of Straw of different Colours, and finely made. These Baskets, which represent all sorts of Flowers, and the Covers whereof are Pyramid-wise, are fill'd with Copper Dishes Tinn'd over, and full of Fruit, and several Meats ready dress'd. These Dishes are served before the King, and afterwards distributed amongst those, who have the Honour to attend upon him. Two or three hundred Horsemen follow in the same Order as those that went foremost, and close the whole March. The King, who never appears in Publick but with his Face cover'd with a Silk-Gauze of several Colours, sits down to Table as soon as he is arrived. The usual Diversion of this Prince, is to propose Prizes to the Lords of his Court, and to shoot with them at a Mark with a Gun, at which they are not as yet very Expert. After they have spent the best Part of the Day in this Exercise, they return in the Evening to the Town, observing the same Order as at their setting out in the Morning. This Entertainment is regularly taken on Wednesday and Saturday every Week. On other Days he holds a Council Morning and Evening, and applies himself to administer Justice to his Subjects without leaving any Crime unpunish'd. In that Country they don't seek to protract Causes. As soon as a Criminal is seiz'd, they bring him before a Judge, who examines him, and condemns him to die, if he be guilty. The Sentence is executed on the Spot; they take the Criminal and throw him upon the Ground, then with great Clubs they beat him upon the Breast till he expires. In this Manner during our stay at Sennar, they treated an Æthiopian called Joseph, who had had the misfortune some time before to Renounce the Christian Religion and Embraced the Mahometan.

So perish all renegades; but Joseph had his revenge, as his death was made the excuse for an attack on the Fung kingdom by the Abyssinians, who were victorious.

The hard-up Civil Servant might well wish the clock set back, and apply for a transfer to Sennar:—

All things are very cheap at Sennar. A Camel costs not above seven or eight Livers, an Ox fifty Pence, a Sheep fifteen, and a Hen a Penny. . . . The smallest Piece of Money of that Kingdom is of the Value of a French Double. 'Tis a little Bit of Iron of the Figure of St. Antony's Cross. The Fadda comes from Turkey, and is a small Silver Piece less than a Denier, it's worth a Penny. . . . A Piaster is about the Value of four Livers in that Country.

Sennar merchants carried civet, gold, ivory, and slaves to the Yemen via Suakim and Moka, and imported spices and other merchandise of the Indies.

To be born in the purple was not without its risks: "When the King of Sennar happens to die, the great Council meets, and by a barbarous and detestable Custom orders the Throats to be cut of all the Brothers of that Prince, who is to ascend the Throne." No doubt the arrangement tended to the peace of the Kingdom, and had the additional advantage of reducing the Civil List. As some of the Fung kings were credited with families which ran into scores, we may doubt whether the rule was ever very strictly enforced, and, indeed, Poncet mentions two exceptions within his own knowledge.

In May, 1699, after a stay of nearly three months at Sennar, Poncet continued his journey towards the Abyssinian frontier.

From Sennar the journey was made with varying fortunes and after several delays; with the details of which we need not concern ourselves, to Girana, well up on the Abyssinian escarpment; here the party exchanged their camels for horses, and here, by the consent of the Abyssinian Government, the King of Sennar maintained a Customs post.

Anyone who has travelled the plains of the Sudan will sympathise with Poncet's delight at encountering the hills of Abyssinia. From Girana the party went on to Chelga and Barko, their way being made easy by order of the King as a compliment, not only to the foreign mission visiting his court, but also to the brother of the Patriarch who here reappears in the story for the first time since his mention as a raconteur at an earlier stage of the journey.

At Barko—but half a day's journey from his goal at Gondar—Father Brevedent died in the distressing circumstances already described.

THE NEW TURKEY.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—There appears now every chance of the Lausanne Conference resulting in a Peace, as the Capitulations are the only remaining difficulties to be overcome. The writer must confess to having a strong sympathy with the Turks in their fight for independence from the Capitulations, especially as regards the non-violation of a foreigner's domicile, one of the demands made by the Allies. As an old police official, he has still vivid recollections of the way this sanctity of domicile can be abused, and how it was utilised to frustrate justice. It would appear, too, that in this connection the Turks are prepared to make certain exceptions in the matter of granting bail to foreigners accused of délits, concessions which should go a long way to meet the demands of the Allies. As regards civil justice, the Turkish Courts may not, in the eyes of the foreign traders, be as reliable as their own, but do any of us regard justice meted out by foreigners as equal to the home production? Yet we do not ask for exceptional privileges when we reside in other foreign countries. Risks must be accepted in Turkey as elsewhere, and, when all is said and done, many of us do not take up our abode in foreign lands solely for pleasure.

The world has not stood still since Capitulations were first heard of, and if in India a 'second Ilbert Bill' can be accepted practically without a murmur there would appear to be no reason why we should not also agree to a revision of procedure in Turkey in civil as well as criminal matters. The interesting question is, however, whether the Turks themselves will benefit. Is this Turkish Renaissance lasting, and are these Turkish statesmen fighting for their country's independence capable of putting their house in order without European assistance? In this respect these Turkish reformers differ entirely from their predecessors. They do not ask for, and are very chary of accepting, assistance from foreign advisers. Further, they are creating an entirely new precedent in their endeavour to draw a distinction between the spiritual powers of the Khalif and the temporal powers of the General Assembly at Angora. They seem to have realised that a Khalif-Sultan is not capable of becoming a constitutional monarch. The fact that Constantinople was in the occupation of the Allies has undoubtedly facilitated the task which the Turks have set themselves of vesting the President of the Assembly with more power than a constitutional monarch has hitherto granted to his Prime Minister, and the absence of Palace intrigue at Angora has enabled them to consolidate this temporal power in their President. But what will happen when the seat of Government is transferred once more to Constantinople? If the Turkish democrats are wise they will continue to exercise their temporal power at Angora.

Hitherto in all Mahommedan countries the temporal and spiritual powers have been hopelessly mixed in the person of their sovereign, and the question arises, is it possible to rule after the precepts of Islam and democracy at one and the same time? The democracy being of the modern type and not what was preached by Mohammed at Mecca. Europeans who are learned on the subject tell us that such rule if successful will have little of Islam in it.

On the other hand, the Turks may argue that to be the Khalif it is not necessary to exercise the temporal powers which the Sultans of Turkey have hitherto possessed. They might even point out that it is not reasonable that all the temporal power of the Khalif should be, so to speak, provided at the expense of Turkish democracy, and that other Moslem countries which acknowledge the Sultan as their Khalif should contribute nothing towards their temporal upkeep. Altogether, it is a very thorny question, which Moslems alone can decide, and it makes it none the less thorny that the Turks have, 'so it would appear, decided to jump straight from Monarchism in its most absolute form to what is, practically speaking, a Republic. It is certainly a very bold experiment, and, if successful, will show that all of us who have hitherto maintained that a monarchical form of government is the most suitable form of ruling Easterners have been mistaken.—I am, etc.,

COLES PASHA.

THE PALESTINE IDEAL.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—There are several statements in Sir Wyndham Deedes' address to the Central Asian Society, as reported in your issue of May 24, which call for comment.

1. The Palestine Government, says Sir Wyndham, is impartial as between Arabs and Jews. Although the Jews form only 11 per cent. of the population and the Moslems are 77 per cent., the number of Jews in high appointments, such as heads of departments, is glaringly out of proportion, while no Moslem occupies a similar post. The proposed Legislative Council would mean under-representation for the Moslems by over 40 per cent., the figures being eight Moslems, two Christians, and two Jews. How can the claim to impartiality be reconciled with such preferential treatment of Jews as the Rutenberg concession, the granting of Government road contracts to Jewish immigrant labour, which is both more expensive and less efficient than Arab labour, and other examples which I could quote?

2. Sir Wyndham's opinion of Jewish immigrants is at variance with that of many other competent judges. Their Communist ideas, such as the doctrine of "free love," and the behaviour of many of them have been a cause of irritation and complaint to the Arab population.

3. The Palestine Government attached no importance to Bolshevism in the winter of 1920-21, in spite of repeated warnings from its own Director of Public Security. The outbreak at Jaffa was the result. There is ample evidence of the spread of Communist ideas, and this, combined with the smuggling of arms, the existence of the Hagonah Defence Force, and the well-known views of the Zionists, has led the Arabs to suspect that a Communistic Jewish State in Palestine is the ultimate aim. They consider the Hagonah as the nucleus of a Red Army intended to crush them and insure Jewish domination.

4. It is only as an official language that anyone objects to Hebrew in Palestine. Would Englishmen tolerate a similar use of Welsh in England?

5. To talk of Jewish brains and money as useful to the Arab Nationalist movement is merely to repeat a hollow argument of the Zionists.

6. Recent complaints as to land transactions, including details of a concession which was so unjust as to require a commission of inquiry after strong Arab protests, hardly go to confirm the contention that the Palestine Government's land policy is above suspicion.

No amount of idealism can disguise the unpleasant fact that the present policy in Palestine is contrary to all that is best in British tradition.—I am, etc.,

[It is not quite clear what our correspondent means in his reference to heads of departments. As far as we are aware, the thirteen or fourteen departments in the Palestine Government are under British officials, two or three of whom are Jews. It would be exceptional to find among British civil servants an adherent of the Moslem religion.—ED.]

EASTERN STUDENTS.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—The question of the Eastern students in England has lately been raised in THE NEAR EAST. May I venture to submit a proposal in this respect through your column as it affects Persia?

The Persian students in this country hardly number a dozen; and when one realises the relationships of the two countries and the position which each country occupies towards the other, this small number is disappointing. There are many reasons for this shortage, the foremost of which is the high cost of living here. Otherwise there is no lack of enthusiasm or appreciation for English education.

Cannot the British Government devote a portion of the Persian debt for educational purposes on the same lines as America and Great Britain are disposing of the Boxer indemnity in China?

The material sacrifice to the British Treasury would be insignificant, as the total Persian debt is only a few million pounds sterling; but such a generous act would have far-reaching consequences.—I am, etc.,

THE BRITISH RED CRESCENT.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—According to statistics published by the International Red Cross, there are in Anatolia at the present time over a million people, including women and children, who are homeless and destitute as a result of the War.

The relief societies which have made a joint appeal for Greek and Armenian refugees in the Near East have not found it possible to include these Moslem sufferers within the scope of their work. But anyone who wishes for humanitarian reasons to alleviate this widespread distress may send a donation direct to the bankers of the British Red Crescent, Messrs. Coutts and Co., 440, Strand, W.C. We also understand that the Imperial War Relief Fund and the Save the Children Fund can immediately utilise for this purpose any donations earmarked for relief in Anatolia.

THE BRITISH RED CRESCENT COMMITTEE

We have received from the Secretary of the British Red Crescent Committee the following particulars of its activities:—

The British Red Crescent Committee includes among its members the Aga Khan, Lord Lamington, the Lady Lamington, Lady Lowther, Colonel Aubrey Herbert, M.P., General Conyers Surtees, C.B., C.M.G., D.S.O., Professor E. G. Browne, of Cambridge, Syed Ameer Ali (President), besides other prominent people. The bankers of the Society are Messrs. Coutts and Co. The Honorary Treasurer of the Society, Mr. A. S. M. Anik, a Moslem merchant in London of recognised position and standing, holds a high rank in the Masonic world. No cheque is issued on behalf of the Society without two signatures—viz., those of the President and Honorary Treasurer. The audited accounts are regularly submitted every year to the London County Council as required under the law. The work of the Society is carried on on the most economical lines by one clerk, who acts as Secretary to the Society, and works on an extremely moderate salary for three other Societies—viz., the London Moslem League, the London Mosque Fund, and the Woking Mosque Trust. In the distribution of its charity the work is entirely honorary.

Greek Exchange Troubles.

The complications that have ensued on the rapid improvement in the Greek exchange show very plainly that an advance towards parity to be safe must of necessity be a slow and gradual process. Drachmæ depreciated to over 400 per sterling; they have rapidly risen in the last few weeks to about 115 as a result of a variety of factors, notably the settlement with Turkey and the general improvement in the Greek financial position. The consequence of this has been temporarily to upset the economic balance in the country, and a crisis of a rather serious character has developed owing to the country's life being based on the depreciated currency. It takes time in a case like this for matters to readjust themselves, and it is satisfactory to know that the first reports of widespread disaster are unfounded. The country's position, it must be emphasised, is fundamentally sound, and it is not likely to be materially affected by the present development. Incidentally, what has happened in the case of Greece and, to a lesser extent, of Czecho-Slovakia shows what we must expect before the exchanges as a whole are reasonably near parity. Truly, it is a case of facilis descensus . . . sed revocare gradus, hoc opus. . .

British Chamber of Commerce for Turkey.

Circumstances have given the British Chamber of Commerce for Turkey and the Balkan States very special scope for action in the interests of British trade in recent years, and the annual report which has just been issued (and reference to which is made this week by our Constantinople Correspondent) throws an illuminating light on the Chamber's activities in this respect. It is relatively satisfactory to note, from the figures of membership given from the foundation of the Chamber, that this body has enjoyed a much greater measure of support by British firms since the war, the total membership for 1922 being 630, as compared with 443 for 1914; but the position in this respect leaves a good deal to be desired. To be of the fullest utility, British Chambers of Commerce must enjoy the united support of traders, and this is as yet far from being the case as regards the British Chamber of Commerce for Turkey.

Compensation for British Subjects.

The report deals in detail with the various efforts made in connection with the claims of British subjects for requisitioned goods, property occupied by the Turkish military authorities, and damages and losses arising out of the war. The question is one which is of primary importance as regards the future development of British trade with Turkey, as the effect of the failure to obtain compensation up to the present is to cripple the trading capacity of the British community in Turkey who were responsible for the success of our trade endeavour there. One can well understand the difficulty with which the British authorities have been faced in the matter, but here was a case in which an effort ought to have been made to secure compensation without unnecessary delay.

Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields.

I briefly referred to the proposed dividend of the Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields Company last week. The report which has now been issued, and which will be found in another column, shows that there was a considerable decline in output in 1922, the figures being 169,313 tons, as compared with 181,231 tons in 1921. The total revenue amounted to £650,158, as against £915,246 for 1921 and £731,046 for 1920, while the expenditure was £352,811, as compared with £361,038. The net profits are £229,730, as against £374,836, and, including the carry forward, the available balance is £469,625, as against £520,839. The payment of the dividends on the "B" and "C" shares will leave £236,125 to be carried forward, as compared with £239,895.

Operations on the Fields.

The most interesting part of the report is the review of operations on the fields. A number of new wells were drilled at Hurgada, and from all of them production was obtained, while in the course of the year two exploration wells were drilled to the north of the main field, in regard to one of which there would appear to be considerable promise. Further, an exploration well is to be put down in a new area as a result of geological examinations. No doubt, further information regarding these and other developments will be forthcoming at the general meeting.

Next Year's Fair.

On more than one occasion I have pointed out the inadvisability of holding the British Industries Fair in 1924 at its usual date in the early spring, because of the inevitable competition with the British Empire Exhibition. I understand that the probability is that the fair will be held about three months later than usual, so that visitors to either the Fair or the Exhibition will be able to see both events.

Cairo, May 26.

The Cultivation of Flax.

The Egyptian Government is determined to find new resources for the country, and it is showing extraordinary perseverance in particular in regard to the extension of flax cultivation. A circular has been issued this week for broadcast circulation, pointing out that the experiments carried out by the Ministry of Agriculture with foreign seed have met with very great success, and that, as these experiments have proved that local seed is of no use, the Government has arranged to import sufficient of the Belgian variety to sow 5,000 feddans. The circular lays stress on the fact that in ancient times Egypt produced large quantities of first-class flax, and that the experiments now made prove that Egyptian soil is still as suitable for this cultivation.

The Government proposes to distribute this flax seed on credit to cultivators in Lower Egypt, and, in order to guarantee them the sale of their crop, it has entered into an agreement with the Nile Flax Company, which has for some time been running a factory for retting and handling flax, to purchase the resultant crop from the fellaheen in lots not exceeding 1,000 kantars at P.T.30 per kantar. The Government inspectors have been instructed to explain the merits of this crop to the fellaheen, and there is every prospect of the scheme's meeting with the same success as has been achieved in the recent past by similar schemes for the distribution of seed on credit to Egyptian cultivators.

TURKEY.

Constantinople, May 29.

The British Chamber of Commerce.

Our domestic affairs are progressing quite peacefully—one might say, indeed, that they are stagnant. The commercial community is still patiently awaiting that settlement which will enable them to get to work to repair the losses of the past nine years. The British Chamber of Commerce has just published its annual report for 1922, and it is gratifying to learn that the trading community has appreciated the advantage of some form of unifying organisation, as is shown by the steadily increasing number of members for the years since the War. The total membership of the Chamber in 1914 was 443. Since the War it has risen to 630, and, whereas in the latter part of last year there was a certain shrinkage, due to the abnormal circumstances, the figure stood at 580 at the beginning of 1923. The Chamber places upon record the sympathetic reception its representations and suggestions have always received from the high civil and military British authorities, and we cannot help thinking that a well-organised official commercial secretariat attached to our diplomatic representation would be of great assistance to British traders in the Levant, and would encourage them in their uphill task of forwarding legitimate British interests in this part of the world, particularly in the doubtful future, in which they will be suffering from a heavy handicap owing to their losses in the past few years and the difficulty of accommodating themselves to the new scheme of things in Turkey.

INDIA AND BURMA AT WEMBLEY.

Mr. Austin Kendall, I.C.S. retired, lectured on June 1 at the Royal Society of Arts on the participation of India and Burma in the British Empire Exhibition.

India has participated in many Exhibitions before, he pointed out, from that of 1851, in which she was allotted 24,000 sq. ft. She exhibited in Paris in 1867, 1878, and 1889, in Philadelphia in 1876, and in Amsterdam in 1883, where she provided a great attraction by free distribution of cups of tea. Her exhibit at the Colonial and Indian Exhibition in 1886 covered 103,000 sq. ft., and of that exhibit it was said that it was hardly possible to over-estimate its value to the British Empire at large. The unprecedented success of the Indian section was in no small measure attributable to the public-spirited and loyal munificence of the Indian Princes, whose support, it was reported, was the making of the Exhibition.

India had decided to participate in the Exhibition with two principal objects in view. From the point of view of her commerce, she was convinced of the value of an exhibition of this nature in order to demonstrate what she could produce. India had for a very long time been noted for certain classes of products, for art work and craftsmanship, which were peculiarly her own. In this sphere she could do a great deal more in the direction of bringing her products to the notice of the world, and of the Empire in particular. But she wished to go further than that, and to demonstrate that in respect of the greater industries she was progressing rapidly to a place among the leading nations of the world. She has secured recognition from the Council of the League of Nations as one of the eight chief industrial states of the world, and in representation at the Exhibition she looked for an opportunity of proving her status.

In a country of the size of India, and in one which still had very far to go in the process of industrialisation, it was obviously no easy matter to organise an exhibition which would show the best that the country as a whole could produce in the best possible way. The general principle which the organisers of the Indian exhibit would attempt to follow would be a central collection displaying those industries which were of major importance and which represented India as a whole, rather than any one province or tract, while the smaller arts and crafts would be displayed in the Provincial Courts.

Mr. Kendall proceeded to give some facts about leading Indian industries, such as the leather works of Cawnpore, and the valuable subsidiary industries which had grown up around the Indian Forestry Department. The Indian forests, which were most efficiently administered by the Forest Department, not only had an enormous export trade in timber, but were responsible also for many bye-products, such as paper, tanning, and dyeing materials, resins and gums. A special effort would be made at the Exhibition to show what could be done with Indian woods. The Tea and Cotton Associations would also make special efforts to attract the attention of the public. Indian tea had found at the Amsterdam Exhibition in 1883, the great advantage to be gained from publicity at International Exhibitions, and the Paris Exhibition in 1899 had impressed the same lesson, so that they were resolved to take full advantage of this greatest Exhibition yet held in the world. There would also be a working exhibit of carpet-making, an Indian industry, the products of which were in growing favour all over the world. The seaboard trade of India, which was said to be equal to that of Australia and Canada combined, would be represented by special displays from the Indian ports. The steel trade of India would be shown in its various phases by cinematograph illustrations. In effect there would be as complete a demonstration of modern Indian life as could be arranged. The Indian States were joining heart and soul in this Imperial project: many and varied were the industries which had grown up in those States in recent years, and those industries would be displayed with the splendour which they have almost grown to expect from an Indian Prince, when he associated himself with any Imperial venture. Altogether the Indian States had been allotted one-sixth of the total available space.

The lecturer then gave some facts about the Burma exhibit, the arrangements for which, he said, were in the hands of Mr. Rodger, of the Imperial Forest Service in England, and Mr. J. M. Symns, of the Indian Educational Service, in Burma. Burma had decided to have a special pavilion of her own, separate from the rest of India. There would be shown all her principal products, including rice, timber, cotton, tobacco, rubies, jade, amber, etc., also the lacquer, silk, ivory, silver, and bronze work of the Burmese. The Burmese pavilion and its garden would be laid out in Burmese style, and it was hoped that Burmese elephants and Burmese peacocks would be on display, to give as good an idea as possible of picturesque Burma.

COMPETITION IN IRON AND STEEL GOODS IN EGYPT.

We give the following extracts from a report by the British Commercial Agent for Egypt (Mr. E. H. Muloch):—

Belgium holds the predominating position in the supply of iron or steel bars and billets, with Germany and France fairly close behind as regards billets, and Germany a distant second with respect to bars. United Kingdom supplies have been distinctly disappointing in these lines, but the healthy increase in United Kingdom deliveries of iron or steel rails and fittings is decidedly encouraging, and should be maintained. The danger of German competition should not, however, be overlooked by British manufacturers.

United Kingdom supplies of iron and steel rivets, bolts, nuts, and washers have also increased in quantity, although, as in practically all lines of goods, values have decreased considerably compared with the previous year. In this category also German competition is the strongest, statistics of import showing that country's total supply as 311,531 kgs., valued at £E8,446, compared with a total of 419,826 kgs., valued at £E13,512 from the United Kingdom; British, French, and German deliveries were considerably greater than those of 1921, but the Belgian share of the trade decreased. The very considerable increase in imports of iron or steel hoops and strips is probably due to a more or less steady demand for cotton. United Kingdom supplies of these commodities were over 6,000,000 kgs. above those of Germany and Belgium.

American and Italian competition in most lines of iron or steel goods and engineering products, with the exception of motor vehicles, show a considerable falling off in so far as the actual deliveries of these goods are concerned, but against this must be set the recently successful tender by an Italian firm for the supply of twenty locomotives to the Egyptian State Railways. Germany has been enabled to dispose at a very low price of a considerable quantity of her surplus stocks of secondhand war disposals material, consisting for the most part of light railway track, trolleys, locomotives, and tip waggons. In the last category, however, it is gratifying to be able to state that owing to the very poor material of a consignment from Germany, a tender for a considerable number of waggons has been accepted from a well-known United Kingdom firm to replace an equal number of faulty waggons, previously supplied by a German firm to a very high personage in Egypt. In such lines as enamelled iron or steel hollow ware, Germany, Japan, Austria, and Czecho-Slovakia are the main suppliers. Belgian, German, and to a lesser extent American, competition has been particularly formidable with regard to nails and screws. In 1921 the United Kingdom was the chief supplier as regards value; but in 1922 the British share had dropped to fourth place in quantity and third place in value.

IMPORT FIGURES FOR 1921 AND 1922.

	1922.		1921.
	Quantity. Kgs.	Value. £E.	Quantity. Kgs.	Value. £E.
U.K.	364,503	10,984	430,201	22,235
Belgium	2,224,925	38,405	749,238	17,521
Germany.....	1,385,934	27,360	347,609	9,021
U.S.A.	509,692	8,103	138,366	2,860
France	213,913	4,493	74,861	3,421
Italy	153,059	2,728	36,979	1,431

Total supplies of iron or steel works (constructed or partly constructed), wrought-iron or steel pipes and fittings, iron or steel axles, wheels, springs, cables, chains, anchors, grappels, industrial implements and tools, have dropped decidedly from the rather considerable supplies of 1921, but in all these lines, with the exception of axles and wheels, and constructed or partly constructed works, German competition has increased to the detriment of the United Kingdom, particularly in such goods as wrought iron or steel pipes and fittings and industrial implements and tools. Germany is now the chief supplier of the latter line of goods, and is a very close second to the United Kingdom in the supply of wrought iron and steel fittings. The small increase in the United Kingdom's share in the trade in angles and tees, amounting to 272,627 kgs., valued at £E2,804, compared with 110,540 kgs., valued at £E2,656 in 1921, is encouraging; but, on the other hand, Belgian and German deliveries increased to 1,053,616 kgs. and 100,456 kgs., valued at £E8,692 and £E829 respectively from their previous supplies of 432,154 kgs. and 45,430 kgs., valued at £E4,658 and £E405 respectively.

The history of the year's trade in the lines under review may be briefly summed up, in so far as the United Kingdom manufacturer is concerned, as an uphill struggle against the almost overwhelming odds of unnatural advantages held by competitors of low currency countries. On the whole, therefore, British manufacturers may congratulate themselves that they have at least retained their footing in a market which, although preferring quantity to quality, yet admits the superiority of British iron and steel, by purchasing from the United Kingdom whenever prices approach those of the low currency countries. As makeshift and poor materials begin to collapse, as indeed has happened already in many cases, the desire for strength and reliability of material will undoubtedly become more widespread in Egypt to the advantage of British firms. Egypt is slowly learning her lesson, and although the Orient is hard to change in methods of business, yet there are signs of an awakening to the fact that the lowest-priced goods are not necessarily the cheapest in the long run.

An Order-in-Council, dated April 19, prohibits the exportation from Cyprus of the following articles:—Artillery of all kinds, apparatus for the discharge of all kinds of projectiles, explosive or gas-diffusing, flame-throwers, bombs, grenades, machine-guns, mares and fillies, cows and heifers, provided that cows which are certified by the Government veterinary surgeon to be no longer fit for breeding or draught purposes may be exported, rifled small-bore breech-loading weapons of all kinds, ammunition for use with such arms, firearms and ammunition, whether complete or in parts, chemicals and drugs, all kinds, silver in coin. The following goods are prohibited to be exported to all ports and destinations abroad other than ports and destinations in the United Kingdom, British Possessions, and Protectorates:—Tools, appurtenances, and accessories for the filling and repair of rifle and shotgun cartridges, explosives, coal.

Cotton and Cotton Goods.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Tone Fairly Firm.

The Commercial Co. of Egypt in their report for the week ended May 25 state:—Since our last report the futures market has been fairly firm. We mentioned in our previous report that the market looked as if it would, for the time being, fluctuate with New York prices, and this week's movements confirm that opinion; the firmer tone displayed during the last two sessions must be attributed solely to the recent rise in New York. The latter market has now become more or less a weather market, and as the reports on the growing crop have been of late unfavourable, prices have been correspondingly influenced. The U.S.A. Bureau condition to be published on June 2 is eagerly awaited, and should it confirm the recent pessimistic views there is every reason to expect the present rise to be pushed further. Ashmouni contracts have been very little dealt in, but owing to some speculative buying and the fact that stocks are very small, the parity with Sakellarides is well maintained. The demand from abroad has not increased to any extent, but as Liverpool prices continue to be cheaper than Alexandria it is but natural to expect that market to attract the bulk of any trade demand. Spot sales in Liverpool have again been fairly large, and the official stock figures published must now include a fair quantity of cotton sold but not yet taken out of warehouse. The week's receipts from the interior amount to 13,413 krs., and the exports to 93,758 krs. Stocks now stand at 1,613,938 krs., against 1,694,283 krs. a week ago and 2,080,304 krs. a year ago.

Spot.—The Minet el Bassal market has been rather quieter this week, and sales amount to about 4,800 bales, of which we estimate 3,100 bales Sakellarides, 1,450 bales uppers, 200 bales brown and pilon, and 50 bales of white. Arrivals are very small, whilst exports are considerably larger than last week, and the stock shows a fair decrease.

Sakellarides.—All grades have been dealt in. Good fair and below are daily becoming more difficult to find, but there is still a very fair selection of the better grades. Prices of spot against contracts generally are without much change.

Uppers.—All grades have changed hands, but most of the business has been in fully good fair and above. The lower grades are extremely scarce, but have not been in much request this week. Prices of spot against contracts are unchanged.

Brown.—A moderate business has been done at unchanged rates.

White.—A retail business has been done. Prices are rather easier than last week.

Crop, 1923.—The crop is progressing normally; the weather has again become settled, and the water supply for the moment is everywhere sufficient.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Falling Off in Inquiry.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended May 30:—

Business during the past week has again been somewhat disorganised by holidays, and on one or two days there was a considerable falling off in the inquiry. Yesterday and to-day, however, the demand showed improvement, and it was in the nature of a disappointment that the sales recorded were only 500 bales and 300 bales respectively. F.G.F. Sakellaridis at about 16d.—16½d., and good Sakel at about 17d.—17½d., have been in request, but the finer qualities have been ignored. Uppers have commanded attention at round about 15½d., but there is very little on offer at this price, except for new crop, which at the moment does not appear to interest buyers. Holders of old crop Uppers, both here and in Egypt, are displaying more and more a tendency to retain their holdings and await events. Several inquiries for best brown have been received, and a small business has taken place in Sudan and Tokar cottons. White cotton has been neglected. In low varieties a small but persistent demand continues to be felt at prices ranging from 6d. to about 1s. per lb. C.i.f. business remains very quiet owing to the premiums over our market, which are still quoted in Alexandria.

The chief bar to an improved business just now appears to be the view taken by spinners and manufacturers generally, both in this country and abroad, that next year's crop of American cotton is bound to be a bumper one, and, as the course of the Egyptian market is largely directed by the vagaries of its American neighbour, the result of this wait-and-see policy is found reflected there. Otherwise, it is difficult to understand why, with the two contracts so close together (20 points only between the two May positions!), the daily sales are not many times larger than is actually the case. Weekly sales 1,800 bales (includes 210 bales Sudan). Quotations are raised 30 points. Fully good fair Sakellaridis to-day 16.40d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Inquiry on Increased Scale.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended June 2 states:—

The market settled down after the Whitsuntide holidays in a more cheerful mood, and inquiry has been on a progressive scale throughout the past week. Unfortunately, although many offers were at increased rates, it is still to be recorded that only a small percentage of the inquiry has resulted in actual business.

Yarn.—Yarns have been harder on the week under the influence of raw cotton and the determination of the Master Cotton Spinners' Federation to insist on a minimum price below which its members are exhorted on no account to sell. Naturally, these circumstances have not tended towards the facilitation of an increased business, buyers being by no means certain that the prices quoted can be maintained in the present state of the market.

Cloth.—It is pleasant to be able to record that China, which has for so long been little more than a name, has re-entered the market, and some fairly good lines have been placed, whilst much more could have been done but for difficulties over price. India, however, continues to look on without operating to any appreciable extent, though the conditions in that country are reported to be, generally speaking, in favour of a really active demand. The Near East has again been a buyer in a modest way, but other markets abroad call for no special comment and are generally dull. The continuance of very unseasonable weather has operated adversely as regards home trade transactions. Prices may be said to be slightly firmer following the action of spinners in endeavouring to raise theirs.

Raw Cotton.—The chief item of interest in this section was the issue yesterday of the first report of the American Agricultural Bureau on the condition of the growing cotton crop. This was given as 71 per cent., being 1.4 per cent. above the average last year at the same time. This is said to indicate a crop of about 11½ million bales. "Spot" transactions during the week have been on a small scale, with some improvement in business on Thursday and Friday. Closing prices are as follows:—American fully middling, 16.06d.; Egyptian fully good fair, 16.40d.

The Imperial Bank of India has reduced its minimum rate of discount from 7 per cent. to 6 per cent.

The Bengal-Nagpur Railway Company has declared an interim dividend of 15s. per cent. and a bonus of 10s. per cent. on the ordinary stock, payable July 2, which, together with guaranteed interest of £1 15s. per cent., makes 3 per cent. for the half-year, less tax.

DALMATIA AS A HOLIDAY RESORT.

The increasing popularity of the Dalmatian coast as a pleasure resort has led to a notable improvement this summer in the steamer services of the Eastern Adriatic. The Adriatic Steamship Company of Sushak (Fiume) now announces that, in addition to the two sailings weekly between Buccari (near Fiume) and Cattaro, and between Buccari and Metkovitch, and the weekly service between Buccari and Curfola, it will run the following services:—Two steamers daily from Buccari to Senia, calling at Cirkvenitsa; three sailings weekly from Buccari to Malinska; and four sailings weekly on the Buccari-Baska-Arba line. The places served by these additional sailings are amongst the most popular resorts frequented by visitors from Czecho-Slovakia.

At the same time the Yugoslav Government is trying to meet the wishes of Czecho-Slovakia by providing an improved service on the State Railways for the summer holiday traffic.

NEW BRITISH INDIA STEAMER.

The s.s. Khandalla, which has been built by Messrs. Swan, Hunter, and Wigham Richardson, Newcastle-on-Tyne, for the India-South Africa Service of the British India Steam Navigation Co., Ltd., of London, recently completed a very successful trial trip off the Tyne, and has sailed to take up her station in her owners' service.

The vessel is a twin-screw steamer, built of steel, with cruiser stern and two masts. She is 440 ft. in length by 55½ ft. beam by 34 ft. depth, and will carry a dead weight of about 6,700 tons. She has been built under the special survey of Lloyd's Register to attain their 100 A1 class. The vessel is fitted to carry 60 first-class passengers, 60 second-class, and a large number of native third-class passengers. The first-class accommodation is luxuriously arranged and handsomely finished, and includes a spacious dining saloon, a music saloon, smoking room, and entrance hall, etc.

The first-class dining saloon will seat 64, and is situated on the saloon deck. The walls are white, picked out in gold with carved enrichments; the furniture is of dark oak, and includes two ornamental mirrors over the sideboards. At the fore end of the room, extending the full height, is a mirror, with jardiniere below. The first-class music saloon is on the promenade deck. The walls are of mahogany, painted grey, whilst the doors and furniture are of dark mahogany, and the floor is covered with Ruboleum tiles.

The first-class smoking room, situated on the promenade deck aft, has walls of fumed oak, and in it are two fine paintings by that well-known artist Mr. Frank H. Mason. All the furniture is of oak, and the upholstery of leather, the whole giving a very pleasing effect.

The propelling machinery, which has also been constructed by Messrs. Swan, Hunter, and Wigham Richardson, Ltd., consists of two sets of four-crank triple-expansion reciprocating steam engines. On the trial trip the machinery worked perfectly, giving entire satisfaction to all concerned and driving the vessel at a speed of 17 knots.

Amongst those representing the owners on the trial trip were Captain Isdale, their marine superintendent, Mr. Leslie, their superintendent engineer, and Mr. Grey.

BURMAH OIL REPORT.Net Profit £2,115,823.

The report of the Burmah Oil Co. for 1922 states that all fields expenditure other than of a purely capital nature has been charged direct to revenue. The profits for the year, after charging income-tax, contribution to employees' provident fund, directors' fees, etc., and writing off £149,806 for depreciation, amounted to £2,115,823, to which is added £205,814 brought in, making £2,321,637. There have been transferred to insurance reserve £20,000, and to general reserve £200,000. The preference dividends and the interim dividend on the ordinary shares absorbed £736,358, leaving £1,365,279. The directors recommend a final dividend of 4s. per share, free of tax, making 30 per cent. for the year, free of tax, carrying forward, subject to corporation profits tax, £335,062. Depreciation has been fully provided for; £64,935 has been written off refineries account, £20,000 off the pipelines account, and £64,871 off tankers and tank account.

The improved trading results are stated to be due partly to the increased production and sales, partly to profits on exchange, together with increased revenue from investments and lower taxation and other charges. Fields expenditure was again heavy, and to secure the maintenance of crude oil production up to refinery requirements is likely to continue to be so. There was a record volume of crude production from the Burmah fields during the year, while there have been some satisfactory developments in the company's main producing fields. None of the efforts being made to prove lateral extensions of the known productive areas in Burmah have yet borne fruit. There was a further decline in production from the Badarpur field of Lower Assam, despite relatively considerable drilling operations to increase it, and here again no success has so far followed attempts to extend the known producing area of the field. Efforts to prove oil in the Punjab concessions have also been abortive so far. The refineries dealt with a record volume of crude oil during the year, and further economies in fuel consumption were secured. A start has been made on their concentration and reconstruction.

GREEK TELEPHONE SYSTEM.

Proposals have been made by a Belgian telephone manufacturing concern for the reconstruction of the Greek telephone system, according to an American consular report. The cost of the work is given at 65,000,000 drachmæ. It is provided that the work is to be completed within two years after contracts have been signed. The proposals provide for the conversion of the present overhead lines into an underground cable system, with modern exchanges and the linking of Athens, Piræus, and Salonika, together with points in the interior, into a unified system.

Messrs. Back, Manson, and Hornblower have been awarded the contract for the supply of steel locomotive carriage and wagon tyres for the Egyptian State Railways. These will be manufactured by Messrs. Brown, Bayley's Steel Works, Ltd., Sheffield, at a total cost of £32,000.

AGRICULTURE IN IRAK.

Increased Interest in Cotton.

The following extracts are taken from the Agricultural Bulletin of Irak for the period March 16 to April 15:—

The mild temperatures which prevailed early in March were followed by unusually low temperatures during the period under review. Showers of rain have been widespread. Crops in general have benefited therefrom. The unusually high flood in the Tigris towards the end of March was, in general, helpful to the riverain crop of cereals, but numerous breaches have destroyed fairly large areas of standing crops. The worst of these breaches occurred a few miles north of Baghdad, and resulted in flooding the major portion of the Royal Estates. Flood water will ensure good grazing over large areas. The condition of stock, other than draught animals, in Upper Irak is exceptionally good. All stock in Lower Irak is in good condition.

The supply of irrigation water in all canals has been satisfactory. A good crop of wheat and barley is expected, and the surplus available for export will probably equal that of the previous season, of which 155,000 tons were exported by the end of March. The wheat crop in Upper Irak, which was in danger of ripening prematurely owing to the short spell of hot weather, has improved considerably with the subsequent rains and cooler weather. Large areas are being ploughed for summer fallow. Desert vegetation is not as plentiful as last year.

The standing crop of wheat and barley and the experimental plots at the Rustam Experimental Farm are in good condition. The season is characterised by a moderate attack of rust, which makes it relatively easy to eliminate rusted varieties of wheat. Three thousand five hundred tree seedlings were planted out on the estate during the month. A serious breach in the Diyala River occurred during the flood about half a mile downstream of Rustam. Some of the temporary buildings had to be demolished in order to procure material to prevent the breach from widening. This work has materially interfered with normal farm operations.

The analysis of water obtained from the Saklawiyah Canal in February and March is practically identical with that from the Euphrates at the same periods except that the solids in suspension in the canal water are very much lower than in the river water. The wells in the Saklawiyah area show an alarming degree of salinity, which emphasises the necessity for the construction of drainage channels in this area at an early date.

About fifty tons of cotton seed, sufficient to sow 4,000 acres, were distributed to cultivators by the end of March. Precautions have been taken to limit the distribution of seed to areas where the supply of water is practically assured. There is a general desire amongst cultivators to give their cotton crop better attention than has been customary in the past. The large profits made last year from some of the cotton crops, compared with profits from cereals, have acted as an incentive to most cultivators to give cotton proper attention. A flax-breaking machine has arrived and is in course of erection.

The fertilisation of the date palm in the Basrah area was undertaken comparatively early in the season. General conditions during the winter months were favourable to date palm cultivation.

Owing to shortage of funds no preliminary arrangements were made to combat the annual outbreak of locusts in Upper Irak. In response to representation made by the Administrative staff in Mosul, an Agricultural Official was deputed to organise a campaign. A sum of Rs. 6,000 has been placed at his disposal for this purpose. Locust hoppers have emerged in large numbers, and it is feared that owing to the scarcity of desert vegetation they will do a good deal of damage to the standing crops of cereals. An outbreak of locusts is also reported from Hit and Anah.

DRIED FRUIT REPORT.

Messrs. J. C. Houghton and Co., of Liverpool, report as follows, under date June 1:—

Currants.—The trade for the time of the year has been distinctly disappointing, and with the exception of bold and small cleaned fruit, which in the early days of the month were keenly competed for, the demand has been very restricted. It was expected that the arrival of s.s. Cypria with 800 tons, comprising a good selection of Zante fruit, would have infused more life into the market, but no doubt the near approach of the Whitsuntide holidays had a restraining influence on buyers, and the volume of business was of the smallest dimensions. A further cargo per s.s. Maronian commenced discharging on 26th ultimo without altering the situation, and the same lifeless condition continued to the end of the period under review. The strength of the Greek market has helped to keep spot prices firm, and quotations for shipment are fully 5s. per cwt. higher than those ruling on the home market. Quotations:—Pyrgos, 55s.; Amalias, 56s.; Patras, 58s., 60s.; Gulf and Panariti, 58s., 62s.; Zante, 57s., 62s.; Vostizza, 65s., 73s. A further consignment of Australian 3-Crown fruit met a ready sale at 71s.

Valencia Raisins.—These are cleared out, common seedless at 32s. 6d., and selected at 35s. to 37s. The first of the new crop Cape realised 42s. to 45s. first grade, and 38s. to 40s. second grade.

Sultanas.—So far as the general volume of business is concerned, there is very little change to record. Medium qualities sell slowly at 72s. 6d. to 80s. Fine grades are scarce, with some sales at 90s. to 105s. Further arrivals per s.s. Sitra are to hand, and the s.s. Egyptian is about due with additional supplies. Greeks, 75s. to 80s. Holders display great confidence in the future, basing their belief on the adverse reports which are circulated in Smyrna concerning the growing crop, both as regards the extent and the condition of the fruit. Australian:—Additional supplies of 3-Crown quality per s.s. Suevic met a good reception, and were quickly cleared at 95s. to 100s. Afghans:—Present prices fail to interest buyers, and only attractive coloury fruit (yellow variety) is saleable at 60s. to 70s. Californian soda bleached 67s. to 68s.

Figs are difficult to move, and the only inquiry is for cheapest qualities round about 22s.

BULGARIAN COUPONS.

Payment in French Francs.

Messrs. J. Henry Schroder and Co. are prepared to receive for payment in French francs, under the scheme put forward by the Bulgarian Government, coupons of the Bulgarian Government Four and a-Half per Cent. Loan of 1909, due June 1, 1922, December 1, 1922, and June 1, 1923, and drawn bonds due June 1, 1922, and December 1, 1922. The list of bonds drawn for repayment due June 1, 1923, will be announced as soon as received. Holders other than British subjects whose national currency has not depreciated more than the French franc may also present their coupons and drawn bonds, provided these have been held in Great Britain continuously since October 1, 1915.

COMPANY MEETING.

Egyptian Markets.

The annual general meeting of the Egyptian Markets, Ltd., was held at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, London, E.C., on May 30, Lieut.-Col. A. St. John Cooke (chairman of the company) presiding.

The Secretary (Mr. F. R. Parker) read the notice convening the meeting and the auditor's report.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said: In May, 1922, the last occasion upon which I had the pleasure of addressing you, I described how the efforts of political extremists to boycott British institutions and goods in Egypt had resulted in the boycott of as many as forty-eight of our markets. I think we have every reason for congratulation that this movement did not become more general and affect the whole of our markets, as it might very easily have done. Had it not been for the prompt assistance given us by the Egyptian Government authorities towards its suppression and the tact displayed by members of our staff, both European and native, in dealing, in some instances, with very ugly situations, the boycott might easily have developed into rioting with serious damage to the company's property. That the movement was confined to only forty-eight markets is also, I think, good evidence of the popularity of our markets and of the intimate knowledge of native psychology and customs displayed by our European staff. Revenue was further adversely affected by the loss of 118 cattle market days in consequence of an outbreak of cattle plague, as compared with a loss of 91 cattle market days during the previous year. In addition to this we have had to contend with the scarcity of money in the provinces, resulting from the restricted sale of cotton because of the low price. This affected our receipts for about three months, from the middle of August to November. Notwithstanding these serious reverses, I am glad to say that our gross receipts from the markets amounted to the very substantial figure of £97,539. Though not so good as last year's figures, which in the circumstances could hardly have been expected, the final results for the year have, I may say, exceeded our anticipations.

You will have noticed that, after reserving £20,545 5s. 6d. for the Government share of profits, paying our debenture interest and providing for the share capital and debenture sinking funds, your directors propose to dispose of the balance by carrying £1,000 to reserve, paying a final dividend of 5 per cent. on the ordinary shares, making a total of 10 per cent. for the year, paying a dividend for the year at the rate of £7 16s. 11d. odd on the deferred shares, and carrying forward £11,595 19s. 2d., or £1,215 1s. 7d. more than was brought in from the previous year. Personally I think, and I trust you will agree with me, that under the adverse circumstances which have been experienced these results may be considered satisfactory.

At December 31, 1922, the whole of our markets were open and working, but, unfortunately, there has since been an outbreak of cattle plague in Upper Egypt, and the authorities have for that reason seen fit to close fifty-two of our cattle markets. Provided the cattle plague does not assume formidable dimensions, which I think is hardly likely in view of the drastic measures adopted by the Government for its suppression, and that there are no other disturbances, I have every hope that the current year will be a good one. In conclusion, I have with great pleasure to testify again to the excellent manner in which our general manager, ably supported by his assistants and staff, have continued to carry on the work since we last met. I think you would like to hear from Mr. Horne at first hand of his recent visit to inspect the organisation in Egypt, so I will ask him to address you.

Mr. W. Home seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. F. J. Horne (managing director), in the course of his speech, said: I think any visitor to our markets must feel impressed by the efficient manner in which they are handled. If you realise how large an area of country our operations cover—in fact, the whole of Egypt, both Upper and Lower—you will appreciate how much we have to rely upon the individual efforts of our inspectors.

An important feature which I hope may materially benefit us in the future is that the subject of the construction and proper maintenance of main and agricultural roads is receiving considerable local attention, not only from the municipal authorities, but also from the principal landowners. In Upper Egypt, where transit, apart from railway and river, has hitherto been slow and difficult, they are engaged on the construction of roads. In Lower Egypt it is now possible to travel by motor-car over excellent roadways to almost any given point. This road development has already given an impetus to enterprise, and a very considerable passenger traffic is done by motor vehicles running from populous centres to and from our markets.

COMPANY NOTES AND REPORTS.

Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields.

The report of the Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields for 1922 states that the total estimated net production of crude oil for the year amounted to 169,313 tons, as compared with a net production of 181,231 tons in 1921. The net profit, after making the usual provision for depreciation on the property, amounts to £229,729, compared with £374,837 for the previous year. With the addition of £239,894 brought forward, there is a credit to the profit and loss account of £469,624, against £520,840 for 1921, when £146,003 was brought in. The directors recommend that the sum of £233,500 be applied to the payment of dividends on the respective classes of shares, leaving £236,124 to be carried forward to next year, subject to taxation. The proportion of the profits allotted to the "B" shares allows for the payment of a dividend equal to 12½ per cent. upon the "B" share capital, less tax, a reduction of 2½ per cent. on the dividend for 1921.

A number of new wells were completed on the Hurghada field during the year, from all of which production was obtained. Two exploration wells were commenced to the north of the main field, in one of which promising indications have recently been encountered. No new wells were drilled at Gernsah, but a small production was obtained from some of the old wells which were deepened and repaired. Exploration wells were drilled on three licences held under standard regulations. None of these was successful, and two of the licences have now been surrendered. On the third preparations are being made to drill a new well to a considerably greater depth than the first well, which did not reach the desired structure. A large amount of geological exploration work was done during the year, as the result of which it has been decided to drill an exploration well in one new area. Meeting, Winchester House, June 15, noon.

FOREIGN EXCHANGES.

Sharp Rise of Drachmae.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Bulgaria's Coup d'Etat.

All comment on the Bulgarian coup d'état necessarily suffers at this stage from inadequate knowledge. We see no reason, however, for any uneasiness among Bulgaria's neighbours or elsewhere in Europe. Every indication points to the change of Governments having been prompted by personal hostility to M. Stambolisky and his domestic policy. Rightly or wrongly, he was credited with the intention of ridding Bulgaria of all "Bourgeois" influence for all time, and the "Bourgeois" or intelligenza resolved to strike a blow for their own freedom before it was too late. As a result of the support of the Army, or, rather, the Reserve Officers' League, the movement appears to have achieved signal success. In military parlance, there must have been good staff work. It was common knowledge to those in close touch with Bulgarian affairs that the Opposition parties, in spite of their apparent discomfiture, had not abandoned hope of being able to overturn the Government, but there was little expectation, we believe, that the attempt was to be made so soon.

The Macedonian Question.

The provisional Government appointed in Sofia, it will be noticed, contains none of the leaders of the old parties. At the head of the movement was General Lazaroff, an officer of wide popularity who first made a name for himself in the Balkan wars. Three of the new Ministers belong to no political group, and the others represent Radicals, Liberals, Democrats, and Socialists. Some uneasiness is apparent outside Bulgaria lest the change implies the return to power of what is called "the old gang," with a fresh orientation in Bulgaria's foreign policy. There is at present no justification for these fears. M. Stambolisky's foreign policy had the support of the entire country, until the moment when he seemed to be cultivating friendship with Yugoslavia at the expense of the Macedonians. The Macedonian problem is too big for Bulgaria to solve alone, or for Bulgaria and Yugoslavia. It is unlikely that there can be any permanent settlement short of autonomy for Macedonia, and as that solution requires the consent of Greece, it can be reached only by a general international agreement. Until, therefore, the Allied Governments or the League of Nations take a hand in the question, there must be serious pitfalls ahead for any Bulgarian Government that tries to do its duty by its neighbours. If the new régime and the Macedonians are well advised, they will avoid an attempt to force the pace towards a settlement of the Macedonian question until they have been able to explore it from every angle.

The Lausanne Conference.

The Lausanne Conference is outlasting its interest. For a very long time now Turkey has been allowed to dominate the European stage; but this is a state of affairs that cannot prevail indefinitely. One effect of the protracted negotiations is to bring home to Allied countries the growing conviction that the capacity of a country of seven or eight million people to hold up the world's machinery—in spite of their key position—is limited. Turkey may have been able to extract from the Allies a number of concessions that were not offered her at the first; but the process has left her in a weaker position in the world's councils than she would have occupied if she could have introduced the statesmanship of Mudania into Lausanne. Ismet Pasha was welcomed at the first Conference last November as an equal among European statesmen; to-day he is the pedlar at the door who will not do business and who will not go away. In the meantime internal conditions in Turkey, and especially her military position, are deteriorating. Mustapha Kemal Pasha, who came to the front as a leader, seems now to prefer to take cover behind a few extremists, who do not represent the views of the majority, and already others are preparing to lead the country. The change will not necessarily be of advantage at first to Europe, but it will at least be another stage in the laboured education of Turkey.

Fiume and Salonika.

Perhaps the most satisfactory part of the long statement of policy delivered in the Skupshchina by the Yugoslav Foreign Minister last week was the optimistic reference to the Fiume problem. M. Nintchitch expressed the hope that the Rome negotiations would lead to a definite settlement in regard to Fiume's frontiers. There is some reason to suppose that the arrangement which he had in view entails the cession of the port of Baross to Yugoslavia and the annexation of the rest of Fiume by Italy. Any definite settlement must be better than the present indeterminate position, which is embittering relations between the two countries and ruining Fiume. Whether under any other system than that which held good in the days of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, when the possession of both Trieste and Fiume with the hinterland enabled the Dual Monarchy to nurse both ports into prosperity, Fiume can recover its old position is another matter. In this respect it finds its counterpart in Salonika, where the recently signed Convention between Yugoslavia and Greece regarding a free zone for the former has served to draw fresh attention to the disastrous effect of a policy that places a port and its hinterland under separate jurisdiction.

Cyprus and Greece.

A good many people in Great Britain, we imagine, have kept an open mind in regard to the future of Cyprus; but every intelligent person who knows anything of the subject realises that the ultimate destiny of the island cannot be settled by the shouting of a catchword by a crowd. For this reason it is unfortunate that the leaders in Cyprus of the movement for union with Greece cannot understand that they do not advance their cause, nor do they inspire any confidence in their own capacity for administrative responsibilities, by the multiplication of mass meetings clamouring for union. The more the question is relegated to crowd decisions, the more carefully will the British authorities feel obliged to approach the subject, because the crowd that shouts unheedingly for union to-day can be appealed to to-morrow with equal success to support the oppression of the Turkish minority. In view of the Greek feeling on the island, it is legitimate and a wise move to invite M. Venizelos "to advocate before the British Government the wishes of (the Greeks of) Cyprus," although it is quite well known to those who submitted the resolution to the meeting that M. Venizelos has invariably counselled the Greek leaders to study the psychology of the question and not merely to shout blindly for union. His advice is never kept for long; but it still represents the policy that is in the best interests of Cyprus, and when the Greek leaders think less of their own personal interests and more of the good of the island, they will appreciate the wisdom of adopting M. Venizelos's advice.

The Situation in the Punjab.

The most disquieting news from India still relates to the situation in the Punjab. The local administration has, as we have recorded in these columns, been successful in dealing with the series of outbreaks of disorder in the cities, but rural lawlessness presents a much more difficult problem, and the authorities have so far failed to protect the public against the murder gang which for several months has been operating in the country about Jullundur, endeavouring to produce a revolution by systematic murders of prominent loyal citizens. It is to be hoped that the strong measures now announced, including the employment of regular cavalry, will prove sufficient to suppress a movement which is not in itself numerically strong, though it has been able to secure the passive support of the population of a fairly large area, and has accomplished enough to tempt the extremists in other provinces to imitate its methods. The job is not really one for the army, but the province has been trying to save money on its police, and the important thing now is to break up the gang without further delay, not to argue about the appropriateness of the choice of weapons.

"Indianisation."

The Morning Post published last week a detailed exposition of the views held on the question of "Indianising" the services by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, who, now that he is relieved from the cares of office, is the most interesting, and perhaps the most important, figure in Indian politics. His letter was designed to correct the interpretation placed by Sir Michael O'Dwyer on an interview published some time ago, and is consequently controversial in form, but leaving the natural asperities out of account, the views put forward are substantially on the lines we have suggested from time to time as a reasonable solution of a very difficult problem—future recruitment to be normally Indian, but as a temporary measure a minimum British element to be provided, and the grievances of the existing Services to be redressed, without committing the country to permanent expenditure on the scale required by the market for employment in England. It is on some such lines that a solution can be reached, given the good feeling which Sir Tej Bahadur postulates, but which has been so conspicuously absent of late from the speeches of other prominent Indian politicians.

The Services Commission.

Where we differ from Sir Tej Bahadur is the question of procedure. He objects to the Royal Commission, and would have preferred to see everything left to the Indian Legislature, but it seems to us that in this matter he ignores the position of Parliament, and also the state of public opinion in this country. Parliament is responsible for carrying out the vast change that it has decided to make in India, and, in order to bear that responsibility, it must insist on the final voice in the choice of agents to perform its orders. The appointment of a Royal Commission is an accepted constitutional device for placing before Parliament the facts on which it must determine the questions in issue. Alternative methods of procedure might, indeed, have been chosen to serve the same purpose, but no sovereign body could be expected to tie its hands by leaving the whole thing to a subordinate legislature. Now that the decision has been taken to proceed by way of a Royal Commission—the composition of which has at last been made public—the important thing surely is that the Commission should get to work at once, and finish its task as quickly as possible.

A statue of Lord Ronaldshay, former Governor of Bengal, is to be erected at Calcutta.

At its meeting last month Magdalen College, Oxford, voted grants, among others, to the British Schools at Athens and Jerusalem.

The American Jewish Physicians' Committee has sent a sum of £2,000 to Palestine for the purchase of land on which to erect the building of the Medical Faculty of the Hebrew University.

It is understood that the Viceroy has invited Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, a former law member of the Government, to represent India at the Imperial Conference, and that the invitation has been accepted.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

The Offer of Germany.

Through the dark, hopeless veil which has enshrouded the question of German Reparations the optimists are at last beginning to see light. Not that there has by any means been universal approval of Germany's latest offer—for nearly everyone is ready to point out its omissions and shortcomings—but it is felt that the Note marks an advance, that a little more solidarity and determination on the part of the Allies will bring about something workable. The main features of the Note are the proposal to allow an "impartial international body" to assess Germany's capacity to pay, and to fix the amount, and the specification of definite guarantees, such as charges on railways, customs, and excise. It is over the first point that the chief opposition is being raised, for we know well the nature of "impartial international" bodies—mere collections of ex-enemy or neutral or de-nationalised experts. The body that will surely fix Germany's capacity to pay will be the Reparations Commission plus the United States and Germany; on that point neither France nor Belgium, and, we hope, not even the British Government, will yield.

However, no definite refusal of the offer has yet been made. It appears that conversations are to take place between Britain, France, and Belgium, and, though it would be absurd to predict an early settlement, high hopes have been raised that it will be possible for joint action to be taken. From our own point of view, if a settlement is possible at all, it is possible now, because Mr. Baldwin's Government is probably as pro-French as any Government we are likely to get. It contains, moreover, men who do not treat the Reparations as one merely of economics—as so many of Mr. Lloyd George's experts were wont to treat it—men who realise fully the political aspects of the problem. I should imagine that they, with the French, will insist on the cessation of passive resistance in the Ruhr; if so, the extraction of a business-like offer from Germany should not be too difficult.

Epsom Week.

We laugh in a very superior way when we read of the rash speculations in which peoples of other countries indulge, but all the same the speculative spirit is deeply ingrained in us. The number of sweepstakes organised for the Derby last week must have been countless, and the number of disappointments, of course, a thousand times as many. So serious, indeed, is the lottery habit becoming—and the publicity given to it—that the police are taking steps against it, though with a chance of success for which I would not risk my all.

The weather at Epsom was not overkind, and the whims of Fortune even crueller. Very few of the favourites in the larger races got home, the Derby winner, Papyrus, for example, being third favourite at 100 to 15, and the Oaks, Brownhylda, at 10 to 1. The jockey on Papyrus, "Steve" Donoghue, rode his third winner in succession, a unique feat in the history of the Derby. Another remarkable feature, and one exceedingly pleasant to notice, was the fact that the bookmakers did not do overwell; there were very many people "on" Brownhylda, despite the apparent security of Tranquil, and on the course no more than 2 to 1 was given by these knowing people for Papyrus. It was a week in which a knowledge of "form" was the least desirable equipment for making a bet; but the enjoyment of it all seemed quite equal to that of other years. The one thing that detracted from its large gaiety was the absence of the King, who missed the Derby on account of the state of health of Princess Christian, who, unhappily, has since died.

Sex Equality in Divorce.

The Matrimonial Clauses Bill, which in the matter of divorce equalises men and women by making simple infidelity a ground upon which a wife may sue for divorce, was carried last week in the Commons by 259 votes to 26. This was its third reading, and it now goes to the Lords, where the prospect of its being defeated seems remote. This Bill marks a stage in our social history in which we have reached a pitch of senseless logicity. We have for long paid theoretical homage to the principle of the equality of the sexes, though never really believing in it; and now, for the sake of form or because of some flawless reasoning, we are actually legalising that equality. Of course, the critics of the Bill said it would disturb the sanctity of the home and that it would largely increase the work of the Divorce Court, but perhaps they were beside the point. The root factor which makes this Bill superfluous is the greater willingness to forgive on the part of wives; no opportunity which any law may grant to lessen that willingness will affect this fundamental of woman's nature. And to pretend, as some do, that the Bill will make husbands more careful is rather naïf.

A Nature Reserve.

Every honest Englishman has a favourite county, in which the meadows are sweeter, the villages quieter, the waters pleasanter, and the wenches (a word which after the revival of "The Beggar's Opera" three years ago has fallen into universal use) are comelier or at least homelier than anywhere else. But the most accurate of such men is he who chooses Norfolk. This is quite beyond argument: but as evidence of the county's public spirit is the excellent news that Scolt Head has been bought as a nature reserve by Norfolk people, and is being handed over to the National Trust. Most other counties depend on the generosity or wisdom of one man for the preservation of what they call their "beauty-spots," but this fine purchase the Norfolk and Naturalists' Society have made on their own account. Scolt Head, which faces and lies north of Burnham Deepdale, and is a clump of sand-dunes on an island which is bounded by Burnham Harbourn, Norton Creek, and Brancaster Harbour, appears to the unknowing as a dull, desolate spot; but to the rare and informed lover of salt-marshes the news that its vegetation is to be tended, and that it itself is to be preserved as the breeding ground of birds seldom nesting in England is pleasant indeed. The eggs of rare birds were often taken from these parts—by boys as well as by high tides—and there was a prospect of extermination of some of the species, particularly of the sandwich tern. But just in time the public spirit of the place has asserted itself, and intends rigidly to conserve the privileges of the country which the commingling of land and sea has given it.

The Visit of Duse.

The visit to this country of Eleanora Duse, the Italian actress, has set all our dramatic critics tumbling over each other in their desire to obtain the extremest of superlatives of praise. I have read, and heard of, no one who does not think she is the finest contemporary actress, finer even than Bernhardt was, and this in spite of the fact that she has been seen only in a poor play, Ibsen's "Lady of the Sea." Our dramatic critics are a queer assembly—Walkley, St. John Ervine, Agate, and the rest—who occasionally give vent to the most diverse, and, if we took them more seriously, baffling, opinions; but their absolute unanimity over Duse was simply wonderful. Myself, I have yet not seen her; but I should imagine that her art is similar to that of her fellow countryman, Busoni, who imposes on all the works that he performs his own unforgettable personality. Her method is not to lose herself in the personification of another, but to impose on the author's conception her own; and it is an imposition achieved by the quietest, least demonstrative means. Much of the welcome with which she was greeted was due to the undemonstrative way in which she set about her work. Similarly with her "publicity" methods, which do not exist. Duse does not advertise, she is never boomed, except by ready and sincere lips; but that is the way and the reward of true art.

A Motorway Scheme.

Somebody has said of England, and Chesterton has confirmed it, that one of her glories is her roads, those rolling, winding roads that lead from nowhere. And somebody else—Yeats, I think—has said that the only really immortal thing in the world is a road, because it has no beginning and no end. But all this, it seems, is to be altered, and the fair face of this country is to be rudely biffed by the prophets of utilitarianism. There is afoot a scheme for a great motorway between London and Liverpool, a smooth, purposeful, monstrous thing, fifty feet wide, whereon the pedestrian will find himself as secure as a poacher in a well-kept wood. A syndicate, called the Northern and Western Motorway Syndicate, has been formed, and sufficient financial backing has been obtained for the chances of a rejection of the Bill which it is introducing into Parliament next November to carry out the necessary survey work to be quite remote. What the countryside will look like when traversed by these exclusively motor roads one shudders to think. I have not seen one, though I am told that there are already such things in the country, and just recently a Bill was passed through Parliament providing for a motorway between Bournemouth and Swanage. However, we must pay something for living in an age of progress. ALTER EGO.

Two thousand Armenian orphan boys from Anatolia landed at Cavalla on June 6 as farm colonists in the rich agricultural district behind the Macedonian front allotted by the Greek Government to the American Near East Relief, which is establishing farm villages for boys.

The Near and Middle East.

From Our Own Correspondents.

Cairo, June 2.

The Case of the Foreign Officials.

There are indications that the Egyptian Government is getting seriously alarmed at the large number of foreign officials who are applying to retire and whose applications it cannot refuse. If, as seems probable, the rate of these retirements continues, the situation will in the near future become a very serious one. For this the Egyptian authorities have themselves entirely to blame. They had a chance last year of making a satisfactory arrangement which would have enabled them to dispense with those officials whom they did not want to retain on payment of good compensation, but at the same time make such terms with those whose services are necessary to them that they would not have found themselves compelled to seek retirement. But, instead of that, owing to fear of opposition they preferred to leave a permanent scheme in abeyance and merely to deal on their merits with such cases as the High Commissioner considered had suffered damage by the introduction of the new régime.

On all sides one hears the statement that the majority of the foreign officials at bottom have no desire to retire, but that the absence of any definite scheme, laying down the principle of their right to retire concurrently with that of the Government's right to dismiss, deprives them of protection against the highly unsatisfactory conditions which are gradually creeping into each administration, and renders it imperative that they should take even the present not altogether adequate rate of compensation rather than run the almost certain risks which the future, under existing conditions, holds out to them. This is, in fact, the whole crux of the situation. If only the Government would agree to a definite scheme applicable to the whole Service and granting the right to dismiss and the right to retire, the retirements would in a great measure be arrested. Such an agreement, while facilitating the removal of the less necessary element and thus making way for Egyptians, would render it possible not only to allay the reasonable anxiety of the foreign officials in general, but also to retain the services of the more useful and really indispensable element.

The future welfare of Egypt, as also the interests of Great Britain and the foreign colonies, depend entirely on the maintenance of an efficient administration. This the more far-seeing and intelligent Egyptians admit can be assured only by a leavening of Englishmen. It is sheer folly on the part of any Egyptian Government, merely because it is afraid of its political opponents, to persist in an attitude which is fast rendering it quite impossible for foreign officials to remain in the service, and which will be quickly productive of consequences far more serious than those which it is feared might result from acceptance of a scheme.

The Streets of Cairo.

One of the most unsatisfactory features of the past month or so has been the condition of the Cairo streets, which appear daily to be getting worse. I do not refer to the amount of repair work which is going on, but to the quantity of refuse of every description which is left lying about even in the principal streets until late in the day, and sometimes throughout the day. In some quarters the state of things is reminiscent of the situation in March, 1919, when the scavengers joined in the political strike. Cairo is no longer the clean city it was, and the sooner the authorities take the matter in hand and introduce greater efficiency into the responsible service the better it will be for everyone.

A Temperance Meeting.

An interesting meeting took place the other evening at the Y.M.C.A. It was organised by the Egyptian Women's Temperance Union, and the subject was the introduction and enforcement of prohibition in Egypt. The meeting took place under the chairmanship of Dr. Morton Howell, the American Minister, who delivered a long address on the subject. Of late, the temperance movement in Egypt has become much extended, and the Egyptian Women's Temperance Union, under the auspices of which this meeting was held, is the latest development in the activities of the Egyptian Temperance Society, which was founded some eighteen years ago, and has latterly been in communication with the Prime Minister in regard to the possibility of introducing prohibition into Egypt. The meeting was a great success, and in reply to a certain amount of comment on the fact that the chair was taken by the American Diplomatic Representative I have been requested to point out that Dr. Morton Howell acted entirely in his private capacity.

The Mission to Uganda.

The Mission which the Egyptian Government sent at the beginning of the year to Uganda under Mr. P. M. Tottenham, Under-Secretary of State for Public Works, appears to have been successful. Its object was to enlist the sympathy of the Uganda Government in favour of the creation of an organisation for collecting data on the Upper Nile and in the region of the Equatorial Lakes required for the completion of the study of the irrigation works projected in those regions. According to the information that has become available, the Uganda Government has declared itself sympathetic to the idea, but naturally reserves its decision until definite proposals are officially put before it. These proposals must be made through the British Government, and it is understood that conversations in this connection have already been started through the Foreign and Colonial Offices. There is, however, great need for hurry, as, unless a definite conclusion is reached before the autumn, the whole of the next season will be lost.

The Arab Problem.

Dr. Naji El Assil, the representative of the King of the Hejaz in London, passed through Cairo this week on his return journey from Mecca. It would appear that the proposals from the British Government which he laid before his King have met with the latter's entire approval, and Dr. El Assil has now been authorised to complete the negotiations for a treaty between Great Britain and the Hejaz. As has been previously mentioned, this Treaty provides for the recognition of the independence of the Arabs in realisation of the promises made to King Hussein in the early days of the War, and there are indications that the conclusion of this Treaty will be followed by a rapprochement between the various Arab States in view of a Confederation.

Constantinople, June 5.

The Danger of Concessions.

Although there has been no dramatic, critical moment during the past week, the general tenseness of the atmosphere has been demonstrated in a thousand and one ways. At the risk of seeming to criticise the already harassed British and Allied representatives at Lausanne, we feel inclined to ask them whether they have not given their whole case away in conceding that the Turkish authorities should not advise the foreign judicial advisers of the arrest or domiciliary search of an Allied subject until "immediately after" the aforesaid action. A mere nodding acquaintance with Turkish methods would convince anyone of the complete futility of such a provision.

No one is more convinced of the urgent necessity of getting back to something like the old relations of mutual respect of the British and the Turks for one another than we are, for it is an undoubted fact that there is, and has always been, a very real friendly feeling between individual Turks and individual Englishmen, based upon a generous tolerance of the other's point of view and a mutual belief in the honesty of the other fellow, but in the present temper of the paramount factors in Turkey you cannot count upon any such sane view of their relations with any foreigners.

Among the powers that be in Turkey xenophobia is rampant. It is probably only a passing phase, but while it is so insistently active that it leads them to commit all kinds of tactless folly it has to be reckoned with as a very serious factor in the situation. An incident a week ago is an example of their criminally bad tactics, even from the point of view of their own interests.

Turkish Confiscation.

A considerable flutter has been caused by the action of the Turkish authorities in confiscating in the most arbitrary fashion the current revenues which are hypothecated to the service of the Constantinople Municipal 5 per cent. Loan of 1909.

This loan, which was issued for the sum of £1,000,000, or £T1,100,000 gold, is secured by contract between the National Bank of Turkey and the Municipality of Constantinople, guaranteed by the Ottoman Government as to the payment of coupons and the service of its sinking fund by a first charge on receipts of tolls paid for the use of the bridges across the Golden Horn and on the revenues from certain petroleum depôts. The amount required yearly for this purpose is £stg.55,000, or £T60,500 gold. Further, the contract in several of its articles lays emphasis upon the fact that the loan is upon a sterling or gold lira basis, and that any deficiency in revenue from the assigned sources, from whatever reason, including difference of exchange, must be met by the attribution of further sources of revenue, which must meet with the approval of the Bank. On the other hand, any balance remaining out of the assigned revenues after payment of coupons and provision for the Sinking Fund will be refunded to the Municipality by the Bank; but such a situation has not arisen since 1914.

During the War the bridge receipts were scrupulously paid into the Bank daily, in accordance with the terms of the contract, and this fact should be noted in strict fairness to the Turkish authorities. In the autumn of 1921 the bondholders appointed a committee in London, with a delegation in Constantinople, to protect their interests, and since that time current coupons have been paid in sterling out of the proceeds of current revenue.

On Sunday morning, May 29, at about 8 a.m., the municipal inspectors entered the National Bank's premises at Stamboul, as if in the ordinary course of their duty of checking the counting of the previous day's receipts, and took away the scales and other instruments used for that purpose without any previous warning, official or otherwise, and since then all payments to the Bank have ceased. On the following day the Bank received a more or less incomprehensible official confirmation by letter of the action of these subordinate functionaries, and there the matter stands. Representations have been made to Adnan Bey in a very friendly manner with the object of demonstrating the badness of the Turkish tactics in committing such a flagrant violation of their contractual obligations at such a moment, and emphasising the unfortunate effect which will be produced on Turkish credit in London.

The only further development has been the publication in the Aksham of certain declarations by the acting Vali, which not only completely evade the question of the manner in which the seizure was effected, but also betray an entire lack of comprehension of the nature of the contractual relations between the Municipality and the Bank. He appears to have confused two entirely separate transactions, for he talks of a loan concluded with the "Banque Perier." Such a loan was actually concluded after the municipal loan of 1909, and the "Banque Perier" group is guaranteed by a second charge on the same revenues. In view of the manner in which the rights of the 1909 Municipal Loan Bondholders are being maltreated, it will be interesting to know what treatment will be meted to the "Banque Perier" group. The situation seems to call for united Franco-British action.

It is no doubt due to this confusion of thought that the Vali arbitrarily decides that the payment of coupons of the Sterling Municipal Loan will be made in French francs, but from the point of view of legality or equity, he might equally well have fixed his fancy upon Maria Theresa dollars or Czechoslovakian crowns.

The Closing of the Y.M.C.A.

Another piece of ungrateful, tactless pin-pricking is the threat to close down the Y.M.C.A. here. The Americans, apart from their regular and long-established educational institutions—the Robert College and the Constantinople College—have done a good deal of admirable work in organizing Y.M.C.A. institutions which help the shockingly educated youth of this city to complete their business and general knowledge by means of day and evening classes in shorthand, book-keeping, type-writing, arts and crafts, languages, and so on, and their efforts have met with considerable success in that many young people greedily avail themselves of the facilities offered. Now the charge of religious proselytism is being trumped up against them, and the further technical charge that, as they have made no application to the Government to carry on their work, they are illegal institutions.

The Patriarchate Incident.

An affair of ugly portent took place the other day at the Greek Patriarchate at Phanar, which was invaded by a Greek mob from the Panaghia Church in Galata, threatening violence to the Patriarch's person if he did not resign within two minutes. The mob was led by a certain Damianidis, a Greek speaking Turkish, and it required the efforts of a considerable body of police to clear out the unruly crowd of about 250 persons from the precincts of the Patriarchate. Without going into the merits of a Greek ecclesiastical dispute, it is most regrettable that a personage of the standing of his Holiness Meletios IV. should be subject to such indignities, and the occurrence in present circumstances makes one think what might happen in the future.

The King's Birthday.

To turn to more pleasant matters the official celebrations of the birthday of H.M. King George V. were a brilliant success. In the morning a magnificent military spectacle was provided by the 1st Guards Brigade in the enclosed stadium of Taksim Barracks. In the presence of the Commander-in-Chief, the ceremony of Trooping the Colour of the Irish Guards was performed by detachments from the Irish Guards, the Grenadiers, and the Coldstreams, and the music was provided by the massed drums of the Guards Brigade. It went off without the smallest hitch, and was a brilliant example of a complicated series of movements carried out in a very confined square. A large number of invited guests followed the ceremony with interest and enthusiasm, and many of the British colony regretfully supposed that it was the last time they would see anything so stirring in Constantinople.

In the afternoon a large number of representatives of the British naval and military forces and of the civil community attended a garden party in the grounds of the British Embassy, where their hosts were the Acting British High Commissioner (who is to be congratulated sincerely on his C.M.G.), the C.-in-C. Mediterranean Station, and the G.O.C. in C. Allied Forces of Occupation. In the evening the ships of the Allied Fleets in the Bosphorus were beautifully illuminated.

YUGOSLAVIA.

Liubliana, June 6.

The Internal Situation.

The internal situation has remained unchanged. It has grown neither better nor worse, unless its being stationary is looked upon as deterioration. There have been signs pointing to an improvement, especially when, incidentally to the debate on the verifications, M. Davidovitch referred in generous and cordial terms to an agreement between Serbs and Croats. But in M. Raditch's reply there was no answering ring of cordiality, and so the Radical mood for agreement has been somewhat damped, though not extinguished. The appearance of the Raditch deputies in the Skupshtina would mean that the Radicals would no longer command a majority there, and so they are compelled to keep open possible lines of retreat in all directions. Nothing is done to persuade M. Raditch to put in an appearance in Parliament. Nor, on the other hand, is anything being done that could permanently prevent a Radical-Democrat Coalition. For such a Coalition may yet become a matter of necessity. If M. Raditch sticks to his programme that there must be a fresh General Election in the autumn, at which his third manœuvre—his great manœuvre, as he puts it—will be brought off successfully—i.e., when he will reap not only the suffrages of the Croats, but those of the Slovene and Serbian peasants as well: and if the Radicals persist in refusing to share the view that there must be a General Election when it suits M. Raditch, then a Radical-Democrat Coalition alone will serve to trump M. Raditch's best card, to wit, his appearance in Parliament. And this line is perfectly practicable, for in conjunction with the Democrats the Radicals can command a majority.

The Government Programme.

The Government has at last declared its programme. It shows distinctly that the Radicals are still intent on profiting by the present complication, and would fain continue to govern single-handed by exploiting Revisionist hostility towards the Democrats. Certainly the programme lays stress upon the fact that the Government will stand by the Vidovdan Constitution; but there is not a word about putting it into force. It is noticeable throughout that all dangerous questions are carefully avoided and great pains taken to insist upon the purely business part of the Government programme. As a result, nobody was pleased with the Declaration, because it fulfilled nobody's expectations. On the other hand, it was calculated to offend nobody beyond remedy. It was all the more easy for the Radicals to lay stress upon the purely business aspect of the Government, as most of the Bills before the House are simply State necessities. Yet the Government programme will not be easy to carry out, as the public fears new taxes, however urgent the need for them.

Slowly the way is being paved that will lead to agreement. Gradually the soil is being prepared for resolute legislative action, which is possible, however, only to a Government which has kept command of its lines of retreat. And the Radicals know how to turn this situation to best account.

Government and National Minorities.

Yet one thing must be set down to the credit of the Radicals. They have known how to win the regard and loyalty of the national minorities for the Government. The Radical leader boldly declared in Parliament that the Government would protect all nationals, Germans no less than Serbs. On the occasions of sundry recent incidents in Styria the Government more than kept its word—with the result that in Yugoslavia the national minorities do not go in for action hostile to the Government.

The Rise of the Dinar.

Within the last week there has been a notable rise in the dinar. A week ago it was quoted at 5.85 in Zurich; now it stands at 6.90. The main reason for this improvement must be sought in the prospect of an excellent harvest. Indeed, the possibility of a record harvest is freely mentioned. Furthermore, Yugoslavia's trade balance has greatly improved, thanks to the Minister of Finance, M. Stoyadinovitch. A third reason is that M. Stoyadinovitch stuck to his policy of deflation, undeterred by the acute money crisis which is pressing hard upon the country's industry. According to the Finance Minister's statement, this improvement of the dinar has not been produced artificially; on the contrary, an all-too-rapid rise has been purposely prevented by the purchase of foreign stock on the part of the National Bank.

Negotiations with Italy.

Negotiations with Italy have been reopened. Although Fiume is no longer the scene of the discussions, no appreciable progress is being made. There is goodwill on both sides, only, so far, no method has been discovered whereby a little yielding could be made acceptable to both parties.

Relations with Bulgaria.

Yugoslavia's relations with Bulgaria are visibly improving. M. Stambolisky's energetic attitude towards the Macedonian irredentists created an excellent impression throughout Yugoslavia. The appointment of Consul-General Nejkov, who conducted the negotiations at Nish, to the post of Minister in Belgrade, will certainly bring about still further improvement in the relations between Bulgaria and Yugoslavia. For the same reason it is inconceivable that a Balkan Alliance—such as is now being discussed—could be realised with Greece to the exclusion of Bulgaria. Good, nay, friendly relations with Bulgaria are advocated chiefly by the Yugoslav Peasant Parties, and the great congress of the Bulgarian Agrarian Party in Sofia will be attended also by representatives of the Serbian as well as of the Slovene Peasant Party.

BRITISH MUSIC IN ZAGREB.

On May 25 a concert of contemporary British music was given, for the first time, by the Zagreb Conservatoire. The programme, consisting mainly of works of our younger school, was fairly "advanced," and it says much for Zagreb's artistic proclivities that the concert should have been such a success. We understand that the instrumental part of it was done excellently, but that the songs suffered in their Croatian translation; we have also received the suggestion that some English conductor should visit Zagreb to show how British music should be given. The programme contained four of Bantock's "Songs from the Chinese," Bax's "Elegiac Trio," Bliss's "Ragwort," "Dandelion," and "Madame Noy," and Goossens's "Tea Time," "Persian Idylls," and "Five Impressions of a Holiday."

THE CAIRO CONSPIRACY TRIAL.

We have received from Cairo a telegram signed by three doctors of the names of Abushady, Naguib, and Iskander, and by a lawyer, Elbi Ali, which runs as follows:—"Your Cairo correspondent reported that the recent arrests related to the revelations of the actual trial. None of those recently arrested were ever mentioned in the trial."

Presumably the reference is to our Cairo correspondent's letter in our issue of May 17, in which he said: "As a result of these revelations several important arrests have, in fact, been made, and interesting developments are expected."

CYPRUS AND GREECE.

We have received from the Greek Press Bureau at Limasol, Cyprus, the following telegram:—

A large national assembly, consisting of all the superior clergy, mayors, representatives of the municipalities, of the political and social clubs and societies, and of 300 representatives coming from all parts of Cyprus, was held at Nicosia, and unanimously voted in favour of union with Mother Greece. If England should again unjustly reject such union, the assembly claimed such political liberties as to make her mistress in her own house. A special mission is leaving Cyprus to hand a resolution to the Home Government. Another resolution was unanimously passed requesting M. Venizelos to advocate before the British Government the wishes of Cyprus. The assembly, singing the Greek National Anthem, dissolved in order.

Bulgaria and Her Troubles.

After discussing the question of Bulgaria's outlet to the Egean, the Manchester Guardian of June 8 says that much more difficult than this is her problem of internal politics:—

Civil war has for weeks been on the verge of outbreak. The contest might a little fancifully be described as one of Fascists versus Ulstermen. The ruling Agrarian Party, with its iron chief Stamboulisky, closely resembles the party of Signor Mussolini in both its better and its worse aspects. Although it has an overwhelming majority in the Chamber, it is to be feared that it represents at best a large minority of the electors: election methods in the Balkans are rough-and-ready. In one respect, however, it diverges radically from Fascism: it is strongly anti-nationalist. For this very reason it is regarded with hatred by the "patriotic" elements of the Opposition (most of whose leaders are safely immured behind prison walls), and, above all, by the Macedonian-Bulgar refugees who, to the number of 300,000, are running loose in Bulgarian territory. We have compared these super-patriot rebels to the Ulstermen because the reason for their disaffection is resentment at the acquiescence of Sofia in the separation of their province from the Bulgarian dominions. The Agrarian Government knows as well as anybody that the present partition of Macedonia is outrageous, since it submits millions of Bulgars to a hated alien rule. But it will not move a finger to support any revolt against this régime. In revenge for this the Macedonian refugees have set up a secessionist Government in parts of South-Western Bulgaria, where they levy taxes and administer justice after their own sweet wills. The Agrarian Government, which disposes of only the puniest military forces, controls a party organisation known as the Orange Guards, ready to defend its cause when the moment comes. None can tell when that will be, but it will be a tragic conflict, for it is impossible not to sympathise in some measure with each side.

The Policy of Croatia.

In the Daily News of May 30 Mr. Randolph Haig writes thus on the policy of absenteeism which M. Raditch, the Croatian leader, has adopted with regard to the Belgrade Assembly. After describing his various moves, such as standing for the Yugoslav elections and then refusing to sit, Mr. Haig continues:—

It is a supreme example of what the Chinese philosopher calls "acting by inaction." He finally formed a federalist bloc with the Slovenes and the Bosnians, who also had found the oppression intolerable, which gave him the support of not seventy, but nearly a hundred and thirty seats. Imagine the feelings of a Prime Minister who not only had to deal with an official opposition, but lived under the threat of a hundred and thirty members not sitting in the house who might at any moment arrive and vote against him!

So the situation now virtually is, after four years of this silent struggle, that it has become impossible for any Government to govern without his leave; and the Prime Minister has been forced, secretly at any rate, to recognise the fact. Raditch, "acting by inaction" at Zagreb, has become the most important factor in the politics of the whole State. What will happen? It is hardly likely, in the present disturbed state of Europe, that the picturesque Croats could establish an absolutely independent republic of their own; but it is very much to be hoped that Raditch's policy of wide and loose federalism, pacifism, non-coercion, free trade, and the cultural and economic amelioration of the lot of the Central European and Balkan peasant will spread. Indeed, it seems the only hope for those distressed countries.

The Bulgarian Revolution.

The Manchester Guardian is frankly anxious about the results of the revolution in Bulgaria, beginning an article on the subject thus: "With the fall of M. Stambolisky in Bulgaria one of the few apparently solid pillars of the edifice built by our treaty-makers on the volcanic soil of post-War Europe has crumbled in a night." It explains the fall of the ex-Premier by the unjust settlement of Macedonia, refugees from which country, it thinks, have forcibly compelled the resignation of M. Stambolisky. This revolution may have unpleasant results elsewhere than in Bulgaria, for, whereas the ex-Premier had broken down the enmity naturally felt towards him at Belgrade and Athens, the new Government is composed of elements possessing a strong and indignant "patriotic" feeling, and almost certainly the new Premier will not prove himself the same cool, reasonable, and friendly negotiator that his predecessor had always shown himself. Nor is it probable that the exemplary abstention shown by M. Stambolisky from flirting with Moscow and Angora will be observed by his successor. In fine, the downfall of M. Stambolisky at this most critical time is, it thinks, a grave misfortune.

Russia and the Caucasus.

In the Daily Telegraph of June 7 M. Vladimir Poliakov discusses the war plans of Soviet Russia. After pointing out that there are two Red Armies—one existing on paper only and the other in reality—he discusses the various fronts, such as Poland, Roumania, Esthonia, and so on. He then turns to the Caucasus, in which, he says, the idea of aggression has not been wholly relinquished:—

The Bolsheviks have concentrated in the Caucasus some of their best troops under efficient commanders. This force has been kept busy in putting down Separatist movements in Georgia, but its leaders have not lost sight of a potential campaign against a foreign enemy. In the same way as Russia, although now dominated by the Bolsheviks, refused to accept the independence of Georgia, the Red commanders refuse to submit to the idea that Kars and other places gloriously conquered by the Russian armies have now returned into Turkish hands. The Caucasian army has two plans of action. One is directed against Turkey, in spite of the existence of a treaty between Moscow and Angora, and would bring about a swift reoccupation of the ceded territories, with a possible move afterwards against Erzeroum. The other plan foresees an expedition into Northern Persia, with the occupation of Teheran and Tabriz. This expedition is discussed in connection with certain plans for action against India.

FIGURES OF ANCIENT EGYPT.

"AND IN THE TOMB WERE FOUND—" By Terence Gray. (Cambridge: Heffer. 7s. 6d. net.)

Mr. Gray is obviously obsessed with the idea of Ancient Egypt. He has had the idea of finding expression for this feeling in writing plays which deal with the chief figures in different dynasties. So he gives us "a character study of Khufu . . . a suggestion of how the great pyramids came to be built." In another play, Yammounem-hati, the founder of the XIIIth Dynasty, appears and speaks his "instructions" to his son. Another is an attempt to give an interview between Ramésès the Great and Moses as seen from the Egyptian point of view. In this Mr. Gray seems most nearly to have been successful. The longest play, which gives its title to this volume, is inspired by an extract from a report of the Society of English Archaeologists: "And in the tomb were found the embalmed bodies of a man and a woman, both nameless. When unwrapped none of their perishable organs were found to have been removed, and their features were distorted with such an expression of agony as may not well be described. Near by were discovered the bones of a boy." He has woven this in with a picture of Egypt after the long period of rule by the Shepherd Kings and of the beginning of the struggle for freedom by the founders of the XVIIIth Dynasty. Mr. Gray's power of poetical expression is not quite equal to carrying out the exalted romance of his design. The result is a little sickly and stuffy.

We do not know whether Mr. Gray has, in this drama, succeeded in expressing his own vision of Ancient Egypt, but the chief impression which it left in us was that of the complete impossibility of conveying, in any kind of modern form, anything so extraordinarily remote in time and outlook as this period of Egyptian civilisation.

This is not to suggest that Mr. Gray is inclined to rush on without realising his difficulties. The book is quite overwhelmingly full of apologies, notes and explanations of all kinds. He shrewdly remarks that probably his readers "will not have more than a vague comprehension of the course of Egyptian history," so that the notes and explanations are, of course, necessary. They seem at first to be given in rather a confusing manner, but they do give much information and so do the stage directions. For the purpose of explaining his system in writing the plays, the ingenious Graph showing the rise and fall of the periods of Egyptian civilisation is most effective. At the end of the book are translations of Egyptian Love Songs, which have both interest and beauty.

As a method of imparting information about what is known of the history of Ancient Egypt in a pleasant and easily understood manner, there is something to be said for Mr. Gray's method. But, in spite of his knowledge and his obviously tremendous enthusiasm, he has not succeeded in breathing life into these long-dead kings and queens. Sometimes he acknowledges this himself, and it seems to us that, in these circumstances, it would have been better to use some other form than that of drama—unless, indeed, we are to imagine these heroic figures of a great civilisation as represented by marionettes.

IN FITZGERALD'S FOOTSTEPS.

"THE 'KHAMRIYYAH' OF UMAR IBN AL-FARID." Paraphrased by L. Chalmers-Hunt, M.A. London: Simpkin Marshall, Hamilton, Kent and Co., Ltd. 3s. 6d. net.)

In an Introduction to this book Mr. W. H. Draper suggests that where Fitzgerald dared to tread, Mr. Chalmers-Hunt does well to attempt to follow. The remark within limitations is justified. Mr. Chalmers-Hunt follows Fitzgerald very closely indeed, alike in form and in diction. To the original of Omar he has adhered much more faithfully than did the English poet, though in certain cases he has had, for the sake of clarity, to expand the original verses of the "Khamriyyah." Now in this sense the work that he has performed is distinctly useful and creditable. In these days, when there is so great a necessity of understanding the true Eastern attitude towards life, and, too often, an equally lamentable misunderstanding of it, it is well that our knowledge should be increased of Omar, an admirable exponent of that attitude; and towards such an exposition Mr. Chalmers-Hunt makes a definite contribution. We would not suggest that there is magic in his verse, or that there is any of that music which makes, even to ears totally ignorant of Oriental philosophy, the lines of Fitzgerald unforgettable, but he does unmistakably retain and present the flowing spirit of the original poetry.

In a little "Foreword about Sufism" which is full of knowledge, Mr. Alexander Sefi states that the time is peculiarly ripe for a fuller appreciation of the Sufism of Omar's "beautiful poetry and philosophy," in which, "on the whole, the much-sought Truth seems to be found." This is additional evidence of the importance and aptness of Mr. Chalmers-Hunt's paraphrase.

To the other poems in this book we cannot accord much praise. Already in the "Khamriyyah" we had noticed the tendency to slip into such hackneyed banalities as are contained in lines like "Its call would summon weary hearts to rest," "Created worlds rolled onward thro' the night," "Where hearts reach out for love that's strong to save," and "And pass beyond Death's bourne to cloudless skies"; and this habit of using clichés becomes intolerable in the shorter poems. Few of the verses rise above the "ballad" type of the concert hall; and one or two are worthy of Ella Wheeler Wilcox in her highest moments of moral uplift. There is something, for instance, called "The Handicap" which begins:—

"What is it counts in the long, long run,
When we start upon life's race?"

and ends in the way appointed to all such questions:—

"It's just that rare sacrifice of self
That counts in the long, long run."

There is in this book too much of this sort of thing.

In the "Arabian Love Lyrics" we fare little better, meeting wearily with the "blissful hours," the "red lips," the "love divine," and all the stock-in-trade of worn lovers. In short, it is by his rendering of the "Khamriyyah" alone that we prefer to remember Mr. Chalmers-Hunt, and it is on these lines that we hope he will continue his efforts. His is not the creative art, but as an interpreter he has achieved a fair measure of success.

THE BULGARIAN COUP D'ÉTAT.

If revolutions must come, it is well that they should come swiftly and smoothly. Bulgaria went to bed last Friday night politically Agrarian and woke up to find herself governed by the "Bourgeois" parties. What other States prefer to accomplish by elaborate elections has been achieved in Bulgaria by the expedient of arresting the members of the Government at five o'clock in the morning and declaring the Opposition in power. That the success of the coup d'état is not assured until it is known that the peasantry, which at a General Election last April secured 212 out of 245 seats, accept the change, goes without saying, and in this connection it will be noted that on the third day M. Stambolisky was still "at large." But it will be remembered that the Bulgarian peasant, although capable of intense patriotism, is a keen individualist, far more devoted to work than to politics, and generally inclined to let the towns play the political game, if only he himself can be left to his own devices. Under the masterful and masterly leadership of M. Stambolisky the Agrarian or Peasant Party became a great force in the country, as its electoral records in the last three years show. Already, however, serious dissensions had manifested themselves in its ranks, and it was clear that the Agrarian political machine was being subjected to a strain far beyond the voluntary capacity of its component units. If a large majority of the peasants is content to acquiesce in the coup d'état, their attitude should serve as a warning to the new Administration that the country has had a surfeit of party politics and wants merely ordered government with a minimum of interference with the normal life of the people.

The late Prime Minister, M. Stambolisky, had won for himself such well-deserved respect and admiration abroad that foreigners found it difficult to credit all the allegations of his shortcomings in the sphere of domestic politics. In the realm of foreign affairs he grasped with a swift instinct the fact that Bulgaria's sole chance of salvation lay in accepting the logic of her defeat in the War and in attempting to undo the harm by rehabilitating herself in the eyes of the Allies. To this end, in spite of the advantages that her co-partners in defeat, Turkey and Germany, had derived from a recalcitrant policy, Bulgaria, under M. Stambolisky, set herself to "play the game" by the Allies and to adopt a correct and, if possible, friendly attitude towards her neighbours. At the same time, there could be no charge against the Government of undue subserviency, as it lost no opportunity of protesting, emphatically but courteously, against what it regarded as injustices done to Bulgaria; and in the end M. Stambolisky had the satisfaction of being able to announce that he had secured the reduction of the Reparations Debt to a quarter of the original amount. Internally the course of affairs proceeded less smoothly. Neither the Prime Minister nor the Agrarian party could rise superior to the tendency, so common in the Balkans, to legislate against political opponents rather than with a single eye to the good of the country. The prosecution of the Radoslavoff Cabinet was a natural reaction to the disappointment over Bulgaria's defeat; but as soon as the decision was taken to indict the members of other Ministries, post-War as well as pre-War, it was evident that the Government, or the Party, was embarking on a political vendetta. So widely did the net seem to be spread that the conviction gained ground in Bulgaria that M. Stambolisky was aiming at the elimination of the greater part of the intelligenzia of the country as a means of ridding his party of the criticism to which his administrative inexperience exposed it. Finally, and perhaps for the Prime Minister himself most serious of all, came the breach with the Macedonians. In deciding upon his policy to cultivate friendly relations with his neighbours, M. Stambolisky had probably overlooked the fact that, in order to be on good terms with the Serbians, he would have to turn a blind eye to their treatment of Macedonians. He was sharply recalled by the latter to the realities of the position; but he was already committed to his policy and refused to turn back. For the Macedonians this was the signal for a declaration of war on the Bulgarian Cabinet, which had the effect of making M. Stambolisky increase the precautions for his personal safety, and at the moment of the coup d'état he was in the security of his native village. The new Government repudiates, no doubt, quite sincerely, any inspiration from or connection with the Macedonians; but it is inevitable that the charge of having "betrayed" the Macedonian cause should have enhanced the Prime Minister's unpopularity, if only for the reason that a large section of the Sofia population is of Macedonian origin.

In a matter which is exclusively of Bulgarian concern foreigners will have no wish to appear to take sides. M. Stambolisky was welcomed in Great Britain and other Allied countries because he represented a Bulgaria prepared to honour her treaty obligations and to live on friendly terms with the rest of Europe. Any other Bulgarian Prime Minister will be welcomed on the same terms. If with the foreign policy associated with M. Stambolisky's name the new Government can combine a home policy that promises internal peace, a contented people, and the economic reconstruction of the country, it will deserve the greater praise and respect. It has the advantage of the experience of the weak points in the previous régime, and if it should attempt to imitate them, it will assuredly work its own downfall. As an Opposition it has been subjected to severe persecution; it will do no good to itself or to the country by turning the tables on its political opponents. It is handicapped by being a coalition of political groups instead of a single party; let it see to it that one and all are inspired by the determination to hold together and work together, not for individual or selfish interests, but for the common good of the country. The task ahead of any Government in Bulgaria is a difficult one. As has already been shown, there is a sharp conflict of interests in the rendering of justice to the Macedonians and the maintenance of cordial relations with Yugoslavia. The problem can be solved only on broadminded lines, and to this end the goodwill won for Bulgaria abroad by M. Stambolisky's Government may stand its successor in good stead.

KURDISTAN: PERSONALITIES AND POLICIES.

With the occupation at the end of April by a column of Arab levies of Rowanduz, in the north-eastern angle of Irak—a town which for the last eighteen months has been, in the hands of a small Turkish force, a centre of Turkish intrigue—the chequered history of Southern Kurdistan enters upon a fresh stage. When the demarcation of the frontier between Turkey and Irak, which has been left by the Lausanne Conference as a subject for separate negotiations between the Turks and Great Britain, comes to be fixed, the main point at issue will be whether a good case can be established for a boundary that divides Southern from Northern Kurdistan, or whether the Turkish contention that Kurdistan is one and indivisible, and is anxious to be incorporated with Turkey can be substantiated. It is of interest, therefore, to follow the different movements in Southern Kurdistan, which seem to have any bearing on an ultimate settlement of the Kurdish problem.

British military authorities came into touch with the Kurds during the War in the winter of 1917, when Khanikin, near the Persian frontier, was occupied. Before the final advance against the Turks in Irak in 1918 relations had been established with Kurdish chiefs in the Kifri district, and with Sheikh Mahmud, the leading man of Suleimaniyeh. Of the latter Miss Gertrude Bell, author of the Review of the Civil Administration of Mesopotamia issued by the India Office in December, 1920, wrote:—"Sheikh Mahmud is the great grandson of a Kurdish holy man of high reputation, Kaka Ahmad, who lies buried in a shrine at Suleimaniyeh, formerly much resorted to by Kurdish pilgrims. His descendants, the Barzinji family, have relied exclusively on the merit acquired by their ancestor, and it has proved sufficient to procure for them a predominant influence. Sheikh Mahmud's position, except for his religious prestige, depended chiefly on the reign of terror he had imposed before the War and the wholesale murder and rapine done in his name." It was to him that the Turkish garrison surrendered in the autumn of 1918, and he sent letters to Baghdad appealing to the British Government not to exclude Kurdistan from the list of liberated peoples. He was the most powerful factor in local politics, and could not be neglected. Accordingly, when a British political officer was sent to Southern Kurdistan, Sheikh Mahmud was appointed Governor of the Suleimaniyeh district, and the tribal leaders were encouraged to enter into a Southern Kurdish confederation under him. Their action in this matter was intended to be guided entirely by their own free will; but a number of tribes at once threw in their lot with Sheikh Mahmud, not out of any regard for him, but merely because they imagined that it was the wish or the instruction of the British. The arrangement suited Sheikh Mahmud, and he was active in spreading his authority as widely as possible. At the same time he had no intention of carving out his share of the implied bargain, which was that he should maintain order and lead the country peacefully forward on the path of economic progress. He aimed at becoming ruler on his own lines of the whole of Kurdistan, in spite of the fact that a number of tribes had definitely refused to accept his leadership. In March, 1919, it became necessary to appoint a Political Officer to Suleimaniyeh with a view to inculcating a sense of proportion in this over-ambitious chieftain. Two months later Sheikh Mahmud showed his hand; a rising took place in the town, the political and military officers were arrested and confined to their houses, and a convoy on its way to Suleimaniyeh was captured. The outbreak, however, did not spread; both Mahmud's unpopularity and the lack of unity among the Kurds were against it. A British force was sent to the relief of the town, and on June 18, 1919, Sheikh Mahmud was defeated, wounded, and taken prisoner. In Baghdad he was condemned to death, but the sentence was commuted to ten years' imprisonment, and Mahmud was sent to India.

Two Kurdish leaders were prominent for the support they gave to the British in connection with the Suleimaniyeh rising—Babekr Agha, head of the Pizhdur tribe, and Saiyid Taha, hereditary Sheikh of Shamsdinan, who has recently been appointed Governor of Rowanduz. Babekr's services were suitably recognised by the Government. His loyalty during Sheikh Mahmud's outbreak won for him the genuine esteem and liking of many a Political Officer, and it is satisfactory to know that he still remains an important factor in Kurdistan, on whose friendship the British authorities can rely. Of Saiyid Taha, Miss Bell writes in 1920, that he—"Is a man of considerable influence, political and spiritual, in North-East Kurdistan. His grandfather, Saiyid 'Ubaidullah, was famous for an attack which he led in 1876 against Urumiyah in Persian territory, where the family owns large properties. 'Ubaidullah was interned at Constantinople with his son Abdul Qadir, who is the leader there of the Kurdish National Party. Another son, Sadiq, who remained in Kurdistan, was a well-known oppressor of the Christians. His son, Saiyid Taha, had been before the War the honoured guest of a Russian Consul, and there was at one time an idea that he might be used as the figurehead of a nominally independent Kurdistan under Russian auspices; nevertheless, he managed to keep in good odour with the Germans, and the Russians, mistrusting him, destroyed his house at Neri, where they crossed the frontier in 1916. He is related by marriage to Simko, chief of the Shikak, and is on good terms with him. Simko has fought in turn the Russians, the Turks, and the Armenians, and is notorious for having murdered in cold blood the Assyrian Patriarch, Mar Shimun. The two men, Saiyid Taha and Simko, are opportunists of the kind which Kurdistan breeds in plenty, remorselessly pursuing their own advantage."

As one of the reasons for Kurdish unrest was the fear that the British meant to punish the Kurds for their treatment of the Christians (Armenians and Assyrians) during the War, a letter was given to Saiyid Taha by the Acting Civil Commissioner of Irak, at the time of Sheikh Mahmud's outbreak, informing him that His Majesty's Government had no intention of adopting a vindictive policy towards Kurds in regard to acts committed during the War, but was prepared to grant them a general amnesty. The letter added that "the interests of the Kurds are by no means being lost sight of at the Peace Conference." In June, 1919, Saiyid Taha was offered a position, in regard to the north-eastern portion of the Rowanduz district, and the fertile lowlands of the Dasht-i-Harir, similar to that given to Sheikh Mahmud at Suleimaniyeh; but he sent no definite reply, and in August the proposal was withdrawn. Saiyid Taha, however, maintained cordial relations with the British, and remained loyal at the time of an outbreak in the Akrah district in October, 1919.

The policy of the British authorities in Irak in regard to the Kurds was to leave them to be governed by their tribal chiefs with just such measure of supervision or advice as might be required to keep the peace in the country, and to encourage it on the path of progress. Such a policy, however, reckoned without its host, the tribal leader. "The position of the average Kurdish Agha," wrote Colonel Nalder after the events of 1919, "is incompatible with our own or any other Government. Like a feudal baron of the middle ages, he keeps a body of armed retainers and tyrannises over the cultivators at his will. . . . Such men cannot but view the advent of any form of settled government with concern." By this time a very clear distinction had been drawn between Northern and Southern Kurdistan, as it was evident that only the latter could be in any way associated with Irak. During the rebellion of 1920 the Kurds played their part more or less wholeheartedly, and no attempt was made at first to re-establish British-Arab authority beyond Erbil. During the last two years, however, it has become apparent that a section of the Kurds favours association with Irak always with some steadily increasing form of Home Rule. From the border tribes from Rowanduz to Suleimaniyeh little was to be expected, and last September the British withdrew to the line Erbil-Kirkuk-Kifri. At the same time they brought back Sheikh Mahmud from India and set him up in his own town, on the principle that the district would be better with someone whose authority would be recognised than without a leader at all. Sheikh Mahmud resumed his old habits at once, and would seem now to have made enemies of his own relations and of others who recommended his return from exile. His actions have served to discredit Nationalism, which is identified with increased power and ambition for the individual chiefs, and to spread the favour with which association with the Irak is viewed among the Kurds. Of pro-Turkish sympathy it may be said that practically none exists, as the Turkish officer at Rowanduz learned during his long stay, with the result that the appearance of the Arab levies was the signal for his withdrawal without firing a shot. According to the latest advices, Sheikh Mahmud has offered his submission to the Arab Government, and has been informed that he will be pardoned on condition that he takes up his residence permanently in Baghdad. Under the Governorship of Saiyid Taha, Rowanduz will now accept the new order, although it is not to be expected that the Kurds will change their general habits with any marked alacrity. If the Arab Government proceeds with the elections there is no reason why they should not be applied with tolerable success to Erbil, Kirkuk and Kifri.

If the Turks were capable of dispassionate reasoning, they could easily convince themselves that their plans for "absorbing" the Kurds are doomed to failure. Northern Kurdistan alone will give them more trouble than they can easily cope with; the inclusion of Southern Kurdistan will effectually checkmate them. A measure of Home Rule may possibly keep the Northern Kurds associated with Turkey, as it may the Southerners with Irak. If their claims to Kurdistan carried any conviction among the Turks themselves, they would welcome an arrangement by which Turkey and Irak agreed to carry out each its own policy in regard to the portion of Kurdistan allotted to it for a period of years, and then to allow the two portions to decide for themselves whether they would continue in the same position or as a united Kurdistan come wholly under Turkey or Irak. The Turks' contentions, unfortunately, are not always identical either with their knowledge or their beliefs.

A message from a French source in Beyrout says that Turkish bands have crossed the Syrian frontier and pillaged houses. It adds that special bodies have been formed from among the inhabitants to repulse the invaders.

Bulgarian Reparations.

The agreement with regard to Bulgarian Reparations which was arrived at in the spring between the Bulgarian Government and the Inter-Allied Commission, was duly ratified in the Sobranje on June 6. This phase of the settlement was not reached with unanimity, for the agreement was strongly attacked by the Opposition, and this fact, in view of subsequent developments, is bound to give rise to a certain amount of doubt as to whether the question can be regarded as finally settled. The new administration has, however, issued a statement to the effect that the policy of the country is unchanged and that it will honour its obligations to the Allies, and we are therefore justified in hoping that we can write finis in respect of this phase of the Reparations question.

The Greek Exchange.

The rise in the Greek exchange was much too rapid to be permanent, and its subsequent fall to its present rate of round about 157 per £1 sterling will have occasioned no surprise. The depreciation will serve to alleviate the crisis in Greece resulting from the sudden rise, the effects of which have naturally been pronounced, though, fortunately, not to the extent suggested by the early reports. As I have pointed out, the improved financial position of the country was one of the reasons for the upward movement of the exchange, but a contributory cause of no slight incidence would appear to have been extensive purchases of Greek tobacco by American firms. Now that the effect of the various factors has been discounted, so to speak, it is to be anticipated that a period of temporary stabilisation will ensue, provided no unforeseen developments occur, but in view of the general situation in Greece, which is satisfactory, it would not be surprising if the rise were to be resumed at a not very distant date.

The Indian Outlook.

The reduction of the minimum rate of discount of the Imperial Bank of India from 8 per cent. to 5 per cent. within two weeks draws very pointed attention to the marked improvement in business conditions in India. For some time now the situation has been getting gradually better, and the extremely favourable crop forecasts indicate that if the monsoon is up to the average, the Indian market will once again prove its value to this country. The lack of buying from India has, of course, been one of the most potent causes of the depression in Lancashire, and the renewal of demand on an extensive scale would have a very far-reaching effect.

The Supply of Cotton.

The first report on the American cotton crop is relatively favourable, the figures being 1.4 per cent. in advance of those of last year, which were far superior to those of the two previous years. If one is to take the present position as an indication of the ultimate yield, then the outlook can be regarded as fairly satisfactory, but a good deal can happen between now and the gathering of the crop, and the experience of past years should have steeled us to bear with equanimity reports of the varying vicissitudes of the crop that will doubtless be forthcoming. The time will come, and that at no distant date, it may be hoped, when the changes and chances of the American crop will be a matter of very minor concern to Lancashire, but to-day we are still dependent on America for our cotton, to what an extent would soon be brought home to us in the event of the world demand for cotton goods reaching the normal.

Suez Canal Results.

At the general meeting of the Suez Canal Company—a report of which will be found in another column—a very satisfactory account was given of the results obtained by the company in 1922. The development of the traffic resulted in a large increase in the company's receipts, while the expenses were slightly below the figures for 1921. The increased traffic permitted a reduction in transit rates of 25 centimes as from March 1, and since the reduction took effect the traffic has been so well maintained that the receipts at the present time are much higher than on March 1. The total receipts for 1922 amounted to 305,455,608 francs, and the amount available for distribution was 192,641,126 francs, the net return to the shareholders being 320 francs per share, which represents an advance of 75 francs on the 1921 distribution.

The Alexandria Water Company.

The Alexandria Water Company has again had a very satisfactory year, the revenue for the twelve months ended March 31 last showing an increase of £21,132 on a total of £237,843. On the other hand, the expenses showed a decrease of £7,214 to £102,922, and the balance of the profit and loss account, after making depreciations and allowances and deducting the interim dividend of 4 per cent., was £87,520, which has permitted the payment of a total dividend of 13s. 3d. per share for the year. The company reports a further notable increase in consumers, and the completion of its extensive development programme will place it in a very favourable position.

OIL DEPOSITS IN ASIA MINOR.

By J. G. AGABABIAN.

The tertiary formation contains the greatest mineral wealth of Turkish Armenia. In it are found salt and metal deposits, the exploitation of which made the ancient prosperity and renown of the country, as well as numerous deposits of oil and virgin lignite. Geological investigations of recent years established deposits of petrol, lignite, and salt according to the following normal section:—

1. At the base there is a thick group of saliferous strata of tolerably fine sand, clay, marl, and gypsum; here the salt is found in local concentrations—often very important ones.

2. Above this comes a group of ferruginous beds of conglomerates, sandstone, sands, and clays; this group is distinguished by its red colour and its considerable thickness, amounting to several thousands of metres.

3. Higher still there are strata of sandstone, clay, barren or combustible, schists and lignite.

4. The preceding groups are surmounted by a marine formation of marl and limestone, transformed in certain places, as, for instance, between Erzeroum and Mamakhatoun, into marble.

The two lower limits of this succession of strata appear to correspond to the end of a tertiary marine regression, and the upper ends to a later transgression of the same period. In contradistinction to the salt and lignite located in the first and third groups, the oil, thanks no doubt to the ease with which it moves, is met with almost throughout the formation. The outcrops of the four preceding groups present variations of thickness and composition, accompanied by local prevalence of salt, lignite, oil, or gypsum.

The succession of the four groups enumerated constitutes in the same way the characteristic and general feature of the oil, saliferous, and lignite deposits of the tertiary formation throughout Eastern Anatolia.

It is interesting to note that analysis of the geological sections, both ancient (Abich, De Morgan) and recent, allow us to include in the area of the extension of these fundamental conditions of the formation of the deposits not only the oil-bearing regions adjacent to Trans-Caucasia and Persia, but also those situated at a distance in Roumania and Galicia to the west, in Kuban, Grozni and Emba to the north, in Ferganah and the whole of Central Asia to the east, and, last of all, in Mesopotamia and Syria* to the south.

The following notes give a résumé of the data established by investigations on the spot of six oil-bearing outcrops of Eastern Anatolia out of a total of fifteen deposits noted:—

1. The Korzote Deposit.—The petroliferous deposit of Korzote is situated 12 kilometres from the north-east angle of Lake Van and 6 kilometres from the village of the same name in the Valley of Naphti-dzor; 40 kms. of carriage road link it with Sevali, a station on the railway, the construction of which has not been finished for a length of 50 kms. between the station named and Lake Van. The completion of this line would place the Korzote deposit in railway communication with the Trans-Caucasian system as well as with the Black Sea and the Caspian. The deposit presents petroliferous outcrops of a series of strata of very fine sandstone, marl, and bluish clay, inclined at an angle of about 35 degrees and covered with lava streams. The whole is cut transversely by the narrow valley of a stream; the oozing of oil is noticeable at the bed of the stream and below the lava for some 20 metres; still lower it is hidden under a bed of vegetable matter, but may be continued for some 200 metres along the valley.

Remains of several oil wells enable us to establish the presence of an ancient gallery which has been excavated at the point of contact of the petroliferous beds with the lava. According to the inhabitants of the village, this gallery is a few score metres long, and must have yielded at the outset up to 600 kilograms of oil a day. In 1917 it was cleaned out by the Russians, but yielded very little oil; its age, length, and position in any case do not offer favourable conditions from the point of view of obtaining oil. At the same time and a little after the cleaning of this gallery steps were taken, under the direction of a specialist from Baku, to explore the deposit by boring. But, unfortunately, the withdrawal of the Russians interrupted the work. This Korzote deposit is alike interesting for its considerable thickness, the nature of its petroliferous beds, the richness of its outcrops, and the quality of its oil.

2. The Katranli Deposits.—The petroliferous outcrops of Katranli occupy a very large extent of ground near the village of the same name, situated 40 kms. south of Erzeroum, on the south slope of the Palantenkian chain, on the banks of the river Cheitan-Deressi. Here the oozing of oil is noticed in the river at the foot of a small hill formed of beds of sand, sandstone, clay, and conglomerate; these beds are inclined at an angle of from 20 to 30 degrees. The first investigation of this deposit, with the aid of shallow wells, was undertaken by the Turks. During their occupation the Russians excavated a series of new wells, and in 1917 they undertook boring operations, which may have yielded up to 300 kgs. of oil a day. This oil contained much gas, and was of a clear greenish colour.

3. The Magalissor Deposit.—This petroliferous deposit was found in the district of Kaniskale, on the northern slope of the Kamour-Dagh between the villages of Magalissor and Divani-Hussein. Oozings of a somewhat heavy oil and of brackish water are noticeable at the bottom of the valley in a transverse direction to its own along the fracture of fine sandstone; from one part to another of this fracture the beds are raised at angles from 30 to 60 degrees in such a manner as to convey the impression of a broken anticlinal. The area of the oil oozing extends for a length of some 60 metres over a breadth of about 20 metres. This deposit has only been explored with a dozen or so wells, the depth of which is only 4 metres.

4. The Naphtig Deposit.—This deposit is situated on the slope of the Khamour-Dagh, near the village of Naphtig, in a long deep valley. This valley has been caused by erosion in the middle of calcareous strata and an underlying group of beds of marl, clay, schist, and clay sandstone. The angle of inclination of these beds is in the neighbourhood of 40 degrees. The valley probably only represents one of the wings of a great upheaval of petroliferous beds in this region, or of a broken anticlinal, of which the opposite wing remains undiscovered. Here are found oozeings of oil and brackish water, accompanied by escapes of sulphuretted hydrogen located in the outcrops of an underlying crop of beds on the two slopes of the valley of Naphtig. The petroliferous outcrops of one of these slopes are separated from those of the other by a gap of two or three kms. of rocks covering the top of the underlying petroliferous beds. The group on the slope nearest the valley alone has been subjected to superficial investigation. Here are observed a few wells of one or two metres deep, containing brackish water obtained from a thick bed of heavy oil.

The deposits of Magalissor and of Naphtig have the following characteristics in common:—(a) Localisation of oil in the beds corresponding to Group 3 of the general section given at the beginning of this article. The group of conglomerates and red sandstone as well as that of the marl and chalks are represented at Magalissor and at Naphtig in a very characteristic manner, while the place of the lignite group is occupied by sandstone and petroliferous clays. This similarity and the short distance between the petroliferous outcrop of these deposits suggest a common origin, or that they are one and the same. (b) The presence of volcanic manifestations: at Naphtig in the form of abundant springs impregnated with lime and iron; at Magalissor in the form of dykes and ash. The chain which separates the two deposits is itself covered with streams of tertiary lava.

5. The Pelluk Deposit.—This deposit is situated 4 kms. to the north of the village of the same name and 30 kms. from the Mamakhatoun, on the north-east slope of the Dumand-tepe. Its geological constitution presents in descending order the following succession of beds: Calcareous marl, saliferous clays, conglomerates and sandstone. This succession should contain a fossilised marine fauna. Oil impregnates the sandstone or sands at the base of the lower group. Prospecting wells excavated in these beds during the Russian occupation yielded daily nearly 32 kgs. of light oil of excellent quality, but the abandonment of this front led to the interruption of the works.

6. The Hassan-kale Deposit.—The zone of the thermal carbonated springs of Hassan-kale show outcrops of bitumen and of thick viscous tar with a strong smell of asphalt. A rough analysis gives the following percentages:—C, 58.87; H, 8.88; N, .74; O, 27.46; S, .25; ash, 3.80. The Russians began to explore this deposit in 1917 with the help of a boring which, at a depth of about 17.04 metres, encountered chalk containing bitumen. At this depth the boring was abandoned.

The above description, although brief and incomplete, enables the following conclusions to be drawn:—(1) Eastern Anatolia possesses oil-bearing deposits interesting for their geological conditions and their situations. (2) Up to the present these deposits have only been subjected to superficial investigation, quite insufficient to establish their value from an industrial point of view. (3) Deep boring should be undertaken with a view to establishing the worth of the deposits.

ENGINEERING TOPICS.

(By Our Engineering Representative.)

The New Dunlop Aerocore Tyre.

I understand that the Dunlop Rubber Company, Ltd., have for some time past been experimenting with an aerocore tyre, designed to fill in some measure the gap which exists between pneumatic tyres and solids. The shock-absorbing qualities of the pneumatic and the durability of the solid tyre are, I understand, very successfully combined in the new Dunlop production. The tyre is of special design and has a hollow centre—in which air is hermetically sealed. The tyre incorporates a metal base, which varies according to the type of vehicle or wheel for which the tyre is intended. The walls and tread are of great strength, and in appearance the tyre is remarkably distinctive, a very effective non-skid tread being incorporated in the design. It is impossible, of course, for the air in the sealed chamber to escape, and this, in conjunction with the flexibility under stress due to the peculiar design of the tyre walls, ensures permanent cushioning capacity without tendency to "roll." A point which will find favour with those owners formerly using pneumatic tyres is that the carrying of a spare as a reserve against possible punctures or bursts is not necessary.

At present it is being produced to replace, without any wheel or rim alteration, the standard 32 in. by 4½ in. straight side pneumatic tyre when used with a demountable rim. All that is necessary when fitting the Dunlop aerocore tyre is that the straight side tyre, together with its demountable rim, shall be removed and the aerocore tyre put into its place. The base of the aerocore tyre in every way replaces the base of the demountable rim taking the pneumatic tyre, and the bolts, wedges, etc., which already exist on the wheel are used. For Ford ton trucks the tyre is produced with rim fitments, displacing either the Kelsey or Hayes type of rim, both of which are in use as standard on Ford tonner rear wheels. The design of the tyre is such that it causes no appreciable difference in gearing or clearances. The extreme ease of fitment and the combination of great cushioning capacity with durability and immunity from punctures are potent arguments in favour of this new tyre. I understand that the tyre is also being produced in other sizes for heavier commercial vehicles, and that supplies will shortly be available.

PALESTINIAN INDUSTRIES.

By the courtesy of Professor Dunstan the Imperial Institute is housing for a fortnight an exhibition of pottery, glass, and other products of Palestine's native industry, the manufacture of which is being fostered by the Pro-Jerusalem Society. The pottery collection includes a number of vases, bowls, plates, and other articles, and is noticeable for the attractiveness of the colour schemes. There is also a small but very striking collection of glass of a beautiful blue tint made at Hebron. In the case of the pottery, as of the glass, the secrets of manufacture or of colouring are held in native families and zealously handed down from father to son. The Pro-Jerusalem Society was founded by Mr. Ronald Storrs, Governor of Jerusalem, for the purpose of saving the antiquities of the city, preserving its amenities and fostering local arts and crafts.

The exhibition, which is free to the public, was opened on Monday by the Honble. W. Ormsby-Gore, M.P., Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies. Professor Dunstan and Mr. Ronald Storrs also spoke. It is hoped that a large number of people will avail themselves of the opportunity afforded of seeing the products of Palestinian handicraft and of supporting the efforts of the Pro-Jerusalem Society. All the objects exhibited are for sale. The exhibition remains open until June 25.

Stock and Share Markets.

GILT-EDGED DULL.

Rather Irregular Tendency.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

In these times one week on the Stock Exchange is very much like another (always provided, of course, that there is no extra sensational occurrence to gladden the hearts of the bulls or the bears), and the lapse of a week in my commentary on the markets has been immaterial, seeing that the week in question was quite devoid of incident. So much cannot be said for the past week. Developments at Lausanne are again such as justly give rise to philosophic doubts as to the imminence of a settlement, as it is evident that over some of the important questions the Turk is as intransigent as ever. Then the Bulgarian revolution has come to remind us of the eternal uncertainty of Near Eastern affairs; and these and other unfavourable factors have been more than sufficient to counterbalance the effect of the improved outlook in regard to the reparations question and the feeling of confidence that under Mr. Baldwin we are about to realise the tranquillity that was promised us. The result is that the markets have lost their buoyancy, and yesterday closed on a dull note, which, of course, was more in evidence with Government securities as a result of the competition of the Austrian loan.

Austrian Loan Success.

The success of this loan was very notable in view of the considerable amount required, and it shows very plainly that there is plenty of money available at the present time for sound securities. There was a queue waiting for prospectuses on Saturday, while yesterday saw a veritable rush to obtain some of the loan, with the result that the lists for cash applications were closed at 11.15, at which early hour it was believed that the desired amount had been covered several times over. The Port of Calcutta Loan, for which subscriptions were invited yesterday, was also a rapid success, the lists being closed at 3 p.m. The results of these two loans will no doubt lead to the appearance of a number of others before long, among which, one may hope, there will be several for the Near East.

Gilt Edged Lower.

Gilt-edged have been particularly affected by the prevailing conditions, and prices are lower almost all along the line. Consols are 59 x.d., War Loan Five per Cents. are 101 3-16, Fundings are 93½, while the Conversion Loan is 80½. Indian stocks have been comparatively firm. The Three per Cent. Loan is 61½ x.d., the Five and a Half per Cent. Loan is 104½, while the Seven per Cent. Loan is 123. The Sudan 4½ per Cent. Guaranteed Loan is 100.

There has not been any particular activity in the market for Foreign Government securities, but on the whole the tone has been fairly firm. French stocks have been steady, with War Loan Fives at 29½, and the Four per Cents. at 23½. Italian Rentes are about the same at 22, while German Three per Cents. have risen to 15s. 6d. In Near Eastern securities Greek securities have continued to make a firm showing, with the Four per Cent. Monopolies at 44½. Turkish Unified have been rather variable, but closed yesterday on a firm note at 26½. Czecho-Slovak Eight per Cents. have met with some support and close at 96½ after being a point higher.

Industrials Quiet.

In view of the existing conditions, it was not to be expected that there would be much activity in the Industrial group. A very quiet tone has ruled, and the tendency in a number of directions has been towards dullness, business being more restricted than ever.

Textiles have been fairly firm, Coats being 68s., while Courtaulds are 67s. 9d. Iron and Steel shares have been very dull. Armstrongs are 17s. 10½d., Baldwins are 20s., Guest Keens are 42s. 9d., and Vickers are 14s. Shipping securities have been quiet. P. and O. deferred are 325, Cunards are 20s. 6d., Furness Withys are 36s., while Khedivial Mails are 1 13-16.

A rather dull tone has prevailed in Banking descriptions. Chartered of India are closing firm at 19 15-16, while National of India are 46½. Imperial of Persia are 7½, British Trade Corporations are 2½, P. and O. Banks are 14½, Agricultural of Egypt are 6 3-16, while National of Egypt are 21 15-16.

Egyptian securities have been quite steady. Beheras are 7½, Gharbich Lands are 1½. Sidi Salems are 13-16, while Union Foncières are 2. Sudan Plantations have risen to 6½, while Kassala Cotton are 13s.

Oils Depressed.

The Oil market has been distinctly dull, as is invariably the case when conditions on the Continent are such as to give rise to uncertainty. There were, however, a few bright features yesterday, notably Phoenix, which rose to 1 7-32, and Anglo-Persian Ord., which hardened to 4, a result possibly of the report from Baghdad that the company struck oil last month in Mesopotamia near Mandali, in the transferred territories—namely, the area transferred from Persia to Turkey by the frontier delimitation. The Turkish Government in 1913 confirmed the concessionary rights of the company in this area. Burmahs, at 5 3-16, are rather lower, Shell Transport are 3 15-16, while Mexican Eagles are 1 3-16. In the Egyptian group Anglo-Egyptian B are 1½. Among Roumanians Steaua Romanas are 9s. 9d. Dacia Romanos are 31-32, while Hamilton's Concessions are 1s. 9d.

DEVELOPMENT OF HYDRAULIC POWER IN MACEDONIA.

The Federation of British Industries learns that the Greek Government have proclaimed a competition for the exploitation of the hydraulic resources of the river Voda, near Vladova in Macedonia. The firm securing the concession would have a monopoly of the supply of electric power to the town of Salonika, and also to certain other centres in the vicinity. The main heads of the concession are: 1. Exploitation of the hydraulic resources of the river Voda for the production of electrical energy. 2. The supply of electrical power to the town of Salonika in the first place, and also to certain other centres of consumption. 3. Lowering of the level of the lake of Voda. Detailed plans and tenders with terms of exploitation must be lodged by December 1, 1923.

Anglo-Persian Oil Company.—The transfer books and register of the 5 per cent. debenture stock will be closed from June 18 to 30, inclusive, for preparation of interest warrants for the half-year, payable June 30.

A Reuter message from Cairo, dated June 6, states that, according to reports in the newspapers, the Cabinet has considered a proposal of the Suez Canal Company to plan a new city on the eastern bank of the canal, to be called Port Said East. The company proposes to advance 10,000,000 francs without interest for this purpose, which sum is to be refunded from the sale of the lands.

Agricultural Conditions.

The following extracts are taken from a report by H.M. Consul-General at Beyrout:—

In a thriving agriculture Syria undoubtedly finds its most stable and reliable source of prosperity. The principal crops include wheat, barley, peas, beans, lentils, sesame, tobacco, liquorice root, oranges, lemons, water-melons, figs, and apricots (dried and preserved), the mulberry tree (cultivated for the silk and cocoon industry), olives (cultivated also for the olive-oil and soap industry), almonds, and apricot kernels. After meeting local requirements any surplus of these crops is exported. In addition, many other grains, fruits, and vegetables are grown in the country, but are for local consumption only.

A comparison of the amounts produced and exported prior to the war with post-war quantities reveals a striking decrease. The reasons for the present decreased output are (1) the large decrease in the population of the country, due to the fact that about 200,000 persons in the Beyrout and Great Lebanon districts are locally estimated to have died of starvation between 1916 and 1918; (2) the closing down of the Russian and Anatolian markets, which prior to 1914 were big buyers of Syrian produce; and (3) railway freights, which are three or four times the pre-war level, greatly increase the export prices of all produce; in fact, many merchants find it cheaper to send their goods from the coast to the interior and vice versa by road.

The country is normally without rain for six or seven months on end during the year—from April to October—and therefore suffers frequently from drought, and the abundance or otherwise of the crops depends on whether the rainfall is evenly distributed during the rainy season or not. As far as the prospects for 1923 crops can be gauged, good harvests are expected, as rains have been plentiful and well distributed during the winter, which has been very mild.

The soil of the country is generally rich, although a large percentage of the area of the country is mountainous and barren. Approximately 7 per cent. only of the country is under cultivation, although it is estimated that 27 per cent. is cultivable. Schemes are in hand regarding afforestation and the introduction of agricultural machinery into the country, and it would appear that much scope exists for the development of agriculture. While the outcrop of rock in many of the mountainous parts of the country renders its cultivation by modern methods difficult, in the plains like the Hauran, the flat country around Hama, Homs and Damascus, and in the northern part of the country the use of modern appliances has been introduced partially. There is an undoubted opening for agricultural machinery, and trials of such machinery have taken place under official auspices. Native farmers, however, are conservative, and, except in the case of large landowners, have little money, while there is always the difficulty of repairs in case of a breakdown. The creating of agricultural banks, which would advance the sums necessary to purchase tractors, etc., and would assist the farmers in keeping them in good running order, seems intimately connected with this question.

Grain Crops.

Wheat is grown in most parts of the country. The annual production varies, but as compared with the 1922 crop of nearly 350,000 tons, the present year's crop is estimated at not less than 500,000 tons. The country had a producing capacity of barley before 1914 of nearly a million tons. In 1922 the total crop was estimated at about 180,000 tons; in 1923, with excellent prospects, the total is expected to exceed 300,000 tons. Several kinds are considered excellent for brewery and distillery use in the United Kingdom, and shipments, which were considerable before 1914, were recommenced during 1922 in a small measure. Flour is milled throughout the country, generally by primitive means, modern mills and machinery not being numerous. The flour produced frequently contains impurities, grit, etc., as the importance of cleanliness is not realised by native millers. Though very finely ground, it is often not pure white in colour, and frequently contains admixtures of barley flour and maize flour.

The yellow maize, known as Indian corn, and locally as "dari asfar," and white maize, or millet, known locally as "dari abyad," are grown in various parts of the country. Peas, beans, and lentils are extensively grown throughout the whole country, and in good years large amounts are surplus to home requirements and exported. Tobacco is grown on a small scale for home consumption. Tumbeki, a form of tobacco used in nargileh pipes in the East, is also grown in many parts. The production in 1922 of cigarette tobacco amounted to about 100 tons. The black Lattakia tobacco produced is chiefly exported to the United Kingdom. The Tombac production in 1922 is estimated at 72,000 kilogs., as against a normal crop of 250,000 kilogs.

Except for the large quantities of cotton which are grown in the region around Idlib, near Aleppo, the cultivation of cotton in Syria is still in the experimental stage. Most of the cotton woven in the native looms in Aleppo, Homs, and Hama is grown outside the borders of Syria in Anatolian territory. It is probable that more cotton could be grown in the country, particularly to the south-west of Homs, but the experiments now being conducted are not yet completed.

The olive is extensively cultivated in many parts of Syria, chiefly along the Mediterranean coastal belt. Small quantities are available for export in the event of a good harvest being gathered. Generally speaking, however, the bulk of the surplus olives is pressed, and olive-oil is extracted from them. Although several hundreds of the largest olive-oil makers have modern machinery installed, the majority of the smaller presses in Syria are still very crude; for this reason, most of the oil produced is not pure or refined. After meeting local requirements, an amount averaging 200,000 to 250,000 quintals is exported annually.

A large quantity of the olive-oil produced is employed in the manufacture of native soap. This soap is hard and generally free from alkali, and is preferred locally for its economical properties, as although it does not lather readily it lasts longer than other soaps. The harvest of the olive crop varies from year to year more than other crops; it is considered unusual for the same trees to bear fruit for two years in succession.

The mulberry tree is extensively grown for its leaves, which serve to feed the worms, which in their turn produce silk. Eggs are imported annually, the local silkworm having died out a few years ago; the estimated import of eggs in 1922 was 70,000 boxes, each weighing 25 grammes. The chief centre of the industry is the State of the Lebanon, where a certain amount of spinning is also done. The weaving of silk is confined almost entirely to Homs, Hama, Aleppo, and Damascus.

Fruit Industry.

Oranges and lemons are grown, but only in the districts around Tripoli and Sidon is the production in excess of the local demand, and a surplus available for export. The quantity exported from Tripoli in 1922 was 107,500 cases. Figs and apricots are grown in sufficiently large quantities to make their export possible, and the export trade in 1922 is estimated to have been 13,000 kilogs. of figs and 288,000 kilogs. of apricots. Quantities of apricots are exported in the form of paste, and the amount exported in 1922 was about 1,500,000 kilogs. Apricot kernels are collected for export, and are considered excellent for their oil-bearing properties, the residue after crushing being used in the composition of cattle food. The average annual yield amounts to about 16,000 to 24,000 cwt.

FOREIGN EXCHANGES.

Fluctuations in Near Eastern Rates.

Movements in the Continental exchanges have not been very pronounced during the week. On the whole the rates are rather firmer as a result of the expectation of joint Allied action in regard to reparations. Near Eastern exchanges have been rather variable. Greek drachmae have fallen back to 157½, while Yugoslav dinars are 415, as against 380. Turkish piastres are rather better at 690, while Bulgarian leva are 405, as compared with 445. Roumanian lei are ten points weaker at 910.

GREEK SHIPPING CONDITIONS.

The Journal de la Marine Marchande in a recent article on Greek shipping conditions points out that the trade depression in Greece has been reflected in the crisis through which the Greek shipping industry has been passing. The lack of freights and two strikes in 1921 for increased wages contributed to the tying up of fifty vessels in the Piræus. In the first half of 1921 Greek shipping companies were threatened with bankruptcy, but the war in Asia Minor led to the requisitioning of a number of ships, and the companies were thus able to utilise some of their ships whilst waiting for improved conditions. The growth of trade with the Black Sea gave them their opportunity, and at present a number of Greek vessels are plying between Constantinople and Russian ports. While the freights are not remunerative, they are enough to cover expenses and show a small profit. The coasting trade is still severely affected by the trade depression. Salonika is the one port which has not been affected by the prevailing conditions, and the traffic there has been equal to, if not better than, that of previous years. 865 vessels of an aggregate tonnage of 873,000 tons visited Salonika in 1922, the cargo unloaded amounting to 274,681 tons. The chief countries trading in the port were Greece with 460 vessels of 154,533 tons, Italy with 134 vessels of 229,417 tons, and Great Britain with 150 vessels of 262,062 tons. The results obtained during 1922 at Salonika, in spite of the prevailing difficulties, it is emphasised, afford ample proof of the vitality and commercial ability of the business men there.

NEW FURNESS, WITHY MOTOR SHIP.

On the 31st ultimo at the Haverton Hill shipyard of the Furness Shipbuilding Co., Ltd., the launch took place of the twin-screw motor ship "Sycamore," which the company has built for Messrs. Furness, Withy and Co., of Liverpool. The vessel has been constructed to meet the requirements of the owners' Mediterranean service, and has been built to Lloyds' highest class. The principal dimensions are:—Length, 363 ft.; beam, 52 ft.; depth moulded, 26 ft. 11 in., the dead-weight capacity being over 6,000 tons on a moderate draft. The vessel will be equipped with twin-screw Diesel engines of the Richardsons Westgarths Beardmore Tosi type, each engine having six cylinders 620 mm. diameter by 975 mm. stroke.

ZAGREB SAMPLES FAIR.

Reporting to the Department of Overseas Trade on the Second Annual Samples Fair held recently, H.M. Consul at Zagreb states that in all 647 firms exhibited and 104 applications for space had to be refused. According to the sixteen sections into which the exhibitors were divided, the following trades were represented: Leather, 45; wood, 43; brushes, etc., 9; glass and porcelain, 15; surgical and optical, 7; paper and printing, 44; jewellery, 13; metals, 191; fancy goods, 33; textiles, 92; national work, 9; furs, 2; agricultural products, 43; chemicals—drugs, 36; chemicals—agricultural, 25; building, 17; various, 23.

By nationalities the firms exhibiting were as follows:—Yugoslav, 471; French, 62; Austrian, 46; Czechoslovak, 34; German, 22; American, 2; British, 2; Italian, 2; Swedish, 2; Swiss, 2; Hungarian, 1; Roumanian, 1.

Many of the firms listed as Yugoslav, however, were little more than agents for foreign firms, and since the Association of British Manufacturers, Ltd., for example, represent a considerable number of leading British firms, it may be taken that the foreign representation was greater than the figures above show.

The lines in which the best business was done were metals, and, following at a considerable distance, textiles, chemicals, leather and wood, in the order named. Business may be said on the whole to have exceeded expectations, and in spite of the great obstacle of the general distrust as to the stability of the dinar and the actual money stringency, it is computed that orders amounted to somewhat over 250 million danars, which, in a time of comparative stagnation, may be considered very satisfactory.

Among foreign exhibitors the French representation was very largely increased, about 50 firms being represented, as against five last year. Their exhibits, however, were mainly silk cushions, ladies' hats, trimmings, feathers, combs, perfumery, etc., which gave occasion for one visitor to remark that it was "a good show for women, but hardly a place for a serious business man." It is understood, however, that the French firms are satisfied with the business done. The Czech firms were also said to be satisfied, though their exchange and production costs are much against them. The Austrians, as a result of six months' stability, report some 20 per cent. better business than last year.

The Associated British Manufacturers report satisfactory orders, totalling over £5,000, and a very large number of enquiries. The metal products shown by these firms appear to compete satisfactorily with German and Czech goods, while in tin goods their prices are quite the lowest. British textiles are also reported to have done well.

The Eastern Company of Transport and Insurance, Ltd., announces that it has acquired the business of the Alliance Transportation Company, Ltd.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Quiet, but Steady.

The Commercial Co. of Egypt in their report for the week ended June 1 state:—

Since our last report the futures market has been quiet but steady. There is not much to say on the market this week; few transactions have taken place, the bulk consisting of purchases of July against sales November for account of commercial houses. Ashmounis have shown their customary strength, and the difference with Sakellarides has further slightly narrowed. The first Bureau report this season on the condition of the American crop will be published to-night, and known here to-morrow morning, in view of which, although it is a Saturday, our futures market will exceptionally open from 10.30 a.m. to 12 noon. The recent recovery in Americans has probably discounted the bad crop news, but should the publication of a low Bureau figure produce a further advance, our market is bound to be affected, as our prices are very cheap compared with Americans, and any rise in the latter would be fully responded to here. The demand from abroad has again been rather limited, but the Continent has shown more disposition to buy. Arrivals from the interior have practically ceased, and as only a very small quantity now remains up-country, little movement from that quarter is to be expected before the marketing of the early new crop Ashmouni at the end of August. The local statistical position has further strengthened; this week's stock stands at 1,544,006 krs., against 1,613,938 krs. a week ago, and 2,012,516 krs. a year ago.

Spot.—We have had a quiet week at Minet el Bassal, and sales amount to about 5,200 bales, of which we estimate 3,300 bales Sakellarides, 1,850 bales Uppers, and 50 bales Brown. The Spot market in Uppers is exceedingly narrow, and difficult to operate in.

Sakellarides.—The majority of the business done has been in medium and lower grades, and little attention has been paid to the better styles. Prices of spot against contracts show very little change from last week, except for fair, which is a little cheaper.

Uppers.—All styles have changed hands, but most of the business has been done in the grades from fully good fair upwards. Prices of spot against contracts are generally appreciably dearer than last week.

Brown.—A small business has been done at generally hardening rates.

Crop 1923.—The weather is favourable, and the crop is progressing satisfactorily.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Business on Good Scale.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended June 7:—

The improved inquiry noticeable at the end of last week has been well maintained, and a good business has taken place, mostly in Sakellaridis of the F.G.F. variety, at prices varying from 75 to 125 on contracts. The break in the American markets over the week-end had the usual unsettling effect, but our Egyptian market has shown rather more resistance to these outside influences, and spot prices have held up fairly well, showing, in fact, an advance on the week. We are still very dependent, however, on the course of the American markets, and until the stock in Great Britain becomes considerably reduced or the growing crop in Egypt suffers severe damage, we fear that present conditions in this respect are likely to continue. Apart from the Fully Good Fair Sakel mentioned above, the inquiry has been chiefly concerned with Uppers about Good Fair in grade, for which 15½d. to 16½d. has been asked. Rather more of this cotton has been seen in the open market of late, but it is not produced in any quantity, and it is difficult to say what the available supply here may be.

A better inquiry for Brown cotton, 16d.-17d., has been in evidence, and a little more business has resulted. The better grades of Sakellaridis and white cotton have been neglected, and the quotations of Fully Good Fair Sakellaridis and the grades above have contracted 20 points as compared with the lower qualities. A better business has taken place in Sudan cotton. Very little Tokar Sakellaridis appears to be available here, and holders are finding little difficulty in placing consignments except where exorbitant limits are exacted. Low cotton, 10d.-12d., and Scarto, at about 6d., continue in request in a small way.

Crop news, whilst not unduly optimistic, is certainly not unfavourable, and, reading between the lines, we are inclined to think that a crop rather over the average than under it is being produced. Generally speaking, the whole crop at present is about ten days late. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending 1st inst. were returned as 6,823 bales. Weekly estimate of sales 8,000 bales (including 790 bales Sudan). Quotations are raised 20 points, with the exception of Fully Good Fair and above in Sakellaridis, which are unchanged. Fully Good Fair Sakellaridis to-day 16.40d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Market Very Quiet.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended June 9 states:—

The more cheerful conditions reported after the Whitsuntide holidays have not been maintained, and the past week has been a quiet one in all sections of the market. It cannot be said that the endeavours of the Master Cotton Spinners' Federation to fix minimum prices for American yarns have yet met with the success that was hoped for, and the market recognises more and more that artificial schemes are at the best only palliatives. What is most needed to improve the demand from overseas markets is lower prices and confidence in their stability.

Yarn.—Whilst both the American and Egyptian sections have been dull, the position of the former has been the more unfavourable of the two as for so long past. It is reported that a few moderate orders have been placed for certain special varieties used in the Levant, but with this exception there is practically nothing to report.

Cloth.—The improvement in demand from China which was reported last week has quietened down very considerably, a check having been administered by the rise in the price of American cotton, and probably in some degree by the fall in silver. India remains dull and disappointing, only occasional lines having been put through for Bombay and Calcutta. At the close of the week the report that the monsoon had burst put fresh hopes in the market, and further reports on this subject are awaited with considerable interest. Hardly any orders are forthcoming from Egypt, as prices there are said to be below the cost of replacement. The Levant, South American, and miscellaneous markets seem disinclined to operate, and the home trade enquiry has been featureless.

Raw Cotton.—The American Agricultural Bureau's report on the condition of the growing crop mentioned last week has been without much effect on values here. From now onwards the usual seasonal see-saw reports may be expected, but the market has not yet forgotten the glaring disparities between official estimates and actual facts which have occurred in the past. Towards the end of the week "spot" transactions increased rather considerably, though doubt is expressed as to whether the bulk of the purchases have been on behalf of actual spinners. American cotton held in Liverpool continues to show a reduction, and the present stocks are the lowest for many years. Closing prices are as follows:—American fully middling, 16.43; Egyptian fully good fair, 16.40.

NEW COMPANY.

Anglo-Roumanian Industries.

The Incorporated Anglo-Roumanian Industries, Ltd., has been registered, with a nominal capital of £200,000 in 50,000 "A" participating preference, 125,000 "B" participating preference, and 20,000 ordinary shares of £1 each, and 100,000 deferred shares of 1s. each. Objects: To adopt an agreement with Lieut.-Colonel L. Delphin, D.S.O., M.C., and M. Leon See, and to carry on the business of bankers, concessionaires, miners, metallurgists, extractors, and dealers in petroleum, etc. The first directors are Lieut.-Colonel L. Delphin, 53, Berkeley Square, W.1, civil engineer; Sir John Stavridi, 40, Old Broad Street, E.C.2, solicitor; Sir Walrond Sinclair, 11, Chelsea Embankment, S.W.3 (director, Henry Boot and Sons, London); R. L. Naville, Garrick House, Richmond Green, Surrey, banker; C. E. O. Duncan, 11, King Street, St. James's, S.W.1, consulting oil expert. Registered office, 40-43, Norfolk Street, Strand, W.C.2.

The traffic receipts of the Egyptian Delta Light Railways for the ten days ended May 10 amounted to £E5,290, making the total from April 1 £E24,647. For the corresponding periods of 1922 the figures were £E7,200 and £E32,733.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS

Haiifa, May 12.

The market for cereals and sesame remains as strong as in the previous week. This position is due especially to the liquidation of stocks in Syria, etc., where the tendency is also very firm.

Hamadan, May 12.

Wheat is selling at 300 krans per khawar of 400 kilos. Barley is selling at 230 krans per khawar of 400 kilos. There is a steady demand. There is no change in the sugar market, and business is very small. Generally speaking the Hamadan market situation is bad owing to the prevailing scarcity of silver and the consequent inability of the importers to dispose of their merchandise.

Mosul, May 12.

The barley harvest commenced some days ago, and the yield is expected to be that of a good year. Agriculturists are unanimously of the opinion that the wheat crop will be equally abundant.

The export of wool is being carried on energetically. The price is double that of the previous year. Representatives of some Basrah houses who have arrived at Mosul have been actively buying wheat. Despite these large purchases the price remains low in view of the good forecasts for the approaching crop. The market for cattle-drawn reapers of English and German manufacture is very active. The employment of these machines in this province tends to become more and more general. The sheep exported in January to Syria have been sold at a profit ranging from 10 to 15 per cent.

Constantinople, June 2.

The report for May states:—Taken all round, this market has not undergone any appreciable change worthy of note. Some activity has, however, been produced by the measure taken by the Angora authorities of abolishing the tax on imports coming from Constantinople, which has given an impetus to buying, especially on the occasion of Bairam. Nevertheless, traders generally are keeping their operations within prudent limits, and are not ordering more than is required for their immediate needs. Turkish merchants alone have been active with a view to developing their business and creating new relations. Several merchants of Anatolia have established themselves at Constantinople, while others have opened branches with a view to facilitating their transactions with the interior without foreign intermediation. The monetary stringency continues to make itself felt here, despite the tendency of the banks to accord some facilities, while not departing from the reserve which the conditions have imposed on them.

YUGOSLAV HARVEST PROSPECTS.

A report issued by the Yugoslav Ministry of Agriculture states that the coming harvest prospects are so far extremely favourable. Wheat is in excellent condition, and it is anticipated that the wine output will be far in excess of that of recent years. Fruit trees have suffered only from isolated storms, so that the prospects of a good fruit yield are also favourable.

H.M. Consul-General at Algiers states that, in his opinion, some good service might be rendered to British trade by the supply of catalogues of the undermentioned manufactures:—Cotton, woollen, and linen goods; gas and oil engines; agricultural machinery and implements; motor-cars, motor-cycles, and bicycles; iron and steel goods for constructional purposes; sanitary ware; heavy chemicals; provisions.

Company Meetings.

ALEXANDRIA WATER COMPANY.

Increased Revenue.

The following is the report of the directors, with statement of accounts as at March 31, submitted to the shareholders at the forty-fifth annual general meeting, held at Alexandria on June 1:—

The directors, in submitting to the shareholders their annual report and statement of accounts for the financial year ending March 31, 1923, have pleasure in congratulating them on the continued progress of the company. The total revenue amounts to £237,843, an increase of £21,132 on the previous year's total of £216,711. This improvement is largely due to a very satisfactory increase in the number of consumers of filtered water, whilst the receipts from the port have benefited from a considerable increase in the number of tourist steamers calling at Alexandria, and those of the high-pressure service from the large number of sprinklers and drenchers which have been installed during the past year. On the other hand, the consumption of the British Army continues to decrease, and this is reflected in the receipts under the heading "Government." Owing to the continued fall in the price of alum, the cost of filtration is decreasing, and the board intend to reduce shortly the temporary addition of 4 per cent. on filtered water accounts.

Increase in Consumers.

Despite increases under several headings of expenditure, due to the increased business of the company, the total working expenses have fallen by £7,264 to £102,922, thanks to a decrease of £11,487 in the cost of fuel. Since July last, when our stock of liquid fuel was exhausted, the steam plant has been run on coal, but, owing to the recent rise in price of the latter, the total cost of fuel in the new financial year is likely to increase. The Diesel pumping plant continues to give highly satisfactory results. 2,861 new consumers have been added during the twelve months, and the number now amounts to 50,366. The total quantity of water pumped has increased by 683,384 cubic metres to 24,390,261 cubic metres, practically the whole of the increased consumption being in filtered water. In the profit and loss account £19,754 has been written off as depreciation of machinery and other wasting assets, in accordance with the rates fixed by the board, and £341 as depreciation of stock of material in hand. A sum of £8,000 has been put aside for provision for compensation claims, which have been somewhat lower than in the previous year, £541 as provision for doubtful debts, and the sum of £5,500 to cover the company's liability under the corporation profits tax for the year ending March 31, 1923. The amount to be paid by the company under this heading for the period to March 31, 1922, has not yet been adjusted, but is expected to be more than covered by the provision already made.

The Dividend.

The balance of the profit and loss account, after making the above depreciations and allowances, and after deducting the interim dividend of 4 per cent. paid on December 15, 1922, is £87,500; from which should be deducted 6 per cent. on the capital of £700,000, £42,000; leaving a balance of £45,500, of which one-half is due to the municipality, according to our convention, £22,750, and the other half to our shareholders, £22,750, which represents 3s. 3d. per share, and this added to the 6 per cent. above mentioned makes a total of 9s. 3d. per share for the dividend of June 15, 1923. The directors therefore recommend the shareholders to fix the dividend payable on June 15, 1923, at 9s. 3d. per share, making with the interim dividend of 4s. paid on December 15, 1922, a total dividend of 13s. 3d. per share for the year. The securities stand in the balance-sheet at the same figure as last year, and are at or below the market value of March 31, 1923. The sum of £29,993 has been spent on new works during the year, including machinery and filters, £555; buildings, £5,088; water mains, hydrants, etc., £20,024; water meters, £3,714. The new 30 in., 20 in., and 18 in. feeding mains, 2,353 metres in length, referred to in last year's report, have been completed, and constitute a great improvement. In addition, 11,850 metres of new service mains have been laid, and 1,636 metres added to our high-pressure fire mains at Minet-El-Bassal, including an additional 12 in. syphon pipe under the Mahmoudieh Canal. Good progress has been made with the new filtered water reservoir at the Rond Point works, which it is hoped to put into service during the coming summer.

New Works.

In view of the increased consumption of filtered water, the board have authorised the installation of two Jewell filters of 21 ft. diameter, which will necessitate the building of a third filterhouse and the construction of an additional settling basin. The supply of filtered water is to be extended to the village of Mandara, some three miles beyond the present eastern limit of our mains, and a new main is to be laid to a recently constructed quay at the port. Authority has also been given for the installation of additional pumping machinery at our high-pressure station and for improvements in the mains of that service to cope with the increased number of appliances now supplied. The cost of these works is estimated at £27,500, of which about £1,100 has been expended in the past financial year. Additional capital expenditure will also be necessary for the extension of service mains to supply new buildings, of which a large number are under construction.

SUEZ CANAL COMPANY.

Marked Increase in Traffic.

The sixty-ninth annual general meeting of the Suez Canal Company was held in Paris on June 4. The report of the board submitted to the shareholders stated that the traffic through the Canal in 1922 had resumed its pre-war activity. As a result of the industrial and commercial recovery which had begun in certain countries the maritime movement had surpassed the previous maximum. This result was truly remarkable, taking into consideration the existing circumstances. The increase in the traffic naturally resulted in a notable expansion of the company's receipts, while the expenditure, on the other hand, was slightly below that of 1921. The repayment of consolidated coupon bonds had relieved the company of a heavy charge, and the accounts for the year showed an exceptionally large surplus of receipts. It was therefore decided to propose a very appreciable increase of dividend, while still maintaining the prudent policy which had always guided the board.

The same amounts as on the last occasion had been allocated to the sinking fund for stock and to the fund for the construction of houses in Egypt; it had further been thought advisable to set aside out of the profits a sum of 25,000,000 francs to defray part of the expenses recently incurred in connection with the works programme. That policy would enable the company to avoid, at least to delay, for several years the issue of a loan, which had been already authorised, and would greatly reduce the amount required.

The Dividend.

It was proposed to pay a dividend of 320 francs net per share, a yield which, it would be noted, was almost exactly double that paid before the war. In making that comparison it should be borne in mind that part of the dividend was the result of the depreciation of the franc.

The rapid increase in traffic had permitted, from March 1, 1923, a reduction of transit rates of 25 centimes. It appeared opportune to them to follow the liberal policy hitherto adopted, thereby assisting the shipping industry, which was still passing through a serious crisis, and to contribute to the relief of the expenses which weighed on shipping. The progress in traffic which had justified the reduction had been so well maintained since the change that the receipts to-day were much higher than on March 1. Moreover, the high rates of exchange enabled at present the remittance of money from Egypt or from England to France on exceptional terms. It was a condition of things, however, which it was hoped might ere long be modified.

Increased Receipts.

The total receipts for 1922 amounted to 305,455,603 francs, showing in comparison with the results of 1921 an increase of 45,319,612 francs. Of this increase transit dues were responsible for 17,551,225 francs. Expenses in Egypt were about the same as in 1921. After making allowance for depreciation of investments, expenses, and provision for buildings, stock, and works, the surplus of receipts over expenses amounted to 193,797,839 francs, to which had to be added 949,707 francs brought forward, making a total of 194,747,547 francs. It was proposed to fix the profit for division at 192,641,126 francs, and to carry forward 2,106,420 francs. The division of the distributable profit of 192,641,126 francs would provide for the payment of a dividend of 341 francs 93.8 centimes per share. This dividend, increased by 25 francs for interest, represented a gross return of 366 francs 93.8 centimes, or a net amount of 320 francs, which exceeded that of 1921 by 75 francs per share.

It was interesting to note that, in spite of the increased dividend, the revenue paid to the British Government was much less than in 1913, and if the exchange on the day of maturity, in July next, did not vary from that of to-day the decrease would be 22 per cent.

Record Tonnage.

Four thousand three hundred and forty-five ships traversed the Canal in 1922, representing a total net tonnage of 20,743,245. This total surpassed by 468,125 tons the highest total previously reached, that in 1912. Compared with 1921 the increase in ships was 370, or 2,624,246 tons. The commercial navigation reached 18,787,824 net tons, an increase of 3,016,468 tons on 1921, but still 1,106,214 tons below the 1912 total. It was interesting to note the constant increase in the number of vessels burning mazout, the transits which were carried out represented 19 per cent. of the total movement of the year. The average time of transit was 15 hours 36 minutes, thus remaining very near the figure for 1921, the most favourable obtained up to the present. The number of passengers had considerably decreased, the total falling from 295,199 in 1921 to 275,031.

As regards the division of the flags of tonnage in transit, it is necessary to note the recovery of German shipping, which rose from 170,520 tons in 1921 to 735,129 tons. This last total is, all the same, much below that of 1913 (3,352,287 tons), which gave to the German flag the second place among the Canal's customers.

Notable among changes made in the board were the retirement of M. Cremer, representing the Netherlands; the appointment of M. Barrere, in place of Baron de Courcel; Sir John Davis, in place of Lord Downham; and Sir Robert Horne, to succeed Lord Kilsant, who had retired owing to the pressure of other activities.

TENDERS INVITED, ETC.

Tenders are invited for the following contracts, and must be made by the dates mentioned.

(Particulars of tenders marked D.O.T. are to be obtained from the Department of Overseas Trade, 35, Old Queen Street, S.W.)

Egypt.

Paper.—The Superintendent of the Government Press, Cairo, invites tenders for the supply of paper for the year 1923-24, as follows:—800 reams, cream wove, strong, smooth-surface writing paper, engine-sized, size 56 by 76 cm., weight 17.024 kilograms; 800 reams ditto, but light buff colour. June 25. (D.O.T.)

Inkstands.—The Central Stationery Stores, Ministry of Finance, invites tenders for the supply of inkstands lead, complete, with porcelain pots. July 19.

Yugoslavia.

Agricultural Implements, etc.—An enquiry has been received in the Department of Overseas Trade from Serbia for illustrated catalogues and particulars of agricultural implements and machinery, dairy utensils, and bee-keeping equipment, rakes, spades, tools, etc., for the use of agriculturists in that country. The enquirer is the organiser and inspector of various agricultural societies which have lately been formed by the groups of colonists introduced into Southern Serbia by the Government of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. It is aimed to organise the colonies into self-supporting and self-administrative communities and to provide them at the outset with the necessary implements, seed, live stock, etc. The organiser hopes that it may be possible for the organisation to purchase the necessary implements, etc., from British firms, and having spent some years in this country he realises the superior quality of articles and machinery of British manufacture. It appears that a very large number of small ploughs will be required as well as thirty small and fifteen large threshing machines. Dairying utensils and bee-keeping equipment are also likely to be in demand, together with tools, rakes, spades, etc. He is of opinion that if favourable terms were offered British firms would be likely to obtain a good share of the business. (D.O.T.)

COMMERCIAL BREVITIES.

The export of walnut and ash wood is prohibited from Roumania.

According to official statistics the Bulgarian tobacco harvest of 1922 amounted to 23,000,000 kilograms.

The export from Tunis of cordage, string and twine of hemp is prohibited, except to France and Algeria.

The production of the Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields for the week ended June 1 was: Gemsah, 33 tons; Hurghada, 3,124.

Sir Reginald H. Craddock, G.C.I.E., K.C.S.I., has joined the board of directors of the Central Provinces Prospecting Syndicate, Ltd.

Indo-Burma Oilfields (1920).—The production for April amounted to 4,588.8 barrels (3,288.2 barrels from Yenamma field and 1,300.6 barrels from Padaupkin field).

A notice has been published in the Egyptian Journal Officiel removing the excise duty of £E1 per metric ton on sugar manufactured or refined in Egypt.

The traffic receipts of the Suez Canal Company from May 26 to June 1 amounted to 3,400,000 francs, as against 2,840,000 francs for the corresponding period of 1922.

Steaua Romana (British), Ltd., are advised that the approximate fields' gross production of the Steaua Romana Company (Bucharest) for the month of May was 19,030 tons.

Messrs. J. Henry Schroder and Co. announce the numbers of 314 bonds of the Royal Bulgarian Government 4½ per cent. loan of 1909, which have been drawn for repayment.

The Bengal and North-Western Railway Co. has declared an interim dividend of 4 per cent., together with a bonus of 1 per cent., on the ordinary stock, payable, less tax, on July 23.

An Anglo-Afghan trade convention was signed on June 5 at Kabul, says a Reuter message from Simla. Its provisions give effect to the obligations of the treaty concluded in November, 1921.

The Government of India has prohibited, under the Sea Customs Act, the import of goods marked with the Royal Arms, manufactured in or exported from places outside His Majesty's Dominions.

The Delhi-Umballa-Kalka Railway Co. recommend a final dividend of 6 per cent., together with a bonus of 2 per cent., on the ordinary stock, making 15 per cent. per annum, payable, less tax, on July 23.

Reuter's Bombay correspondent states that a supplementary grant of fifty-six lakhs of rupees has been voted by the Bombay Legislative Council for construction work in connection with the Sukkur barrage scheme.

The directors of Westminster Bank announce the retirement on June 30, after forty-five years' valued service, of Mr. D. N. Youle, a joint general manager and manager of the Lombard Street office of the bank. Mr. W. J. Woolrich, at present an assistant general manager, has been appointed as his successor.

The Dacia Romano Petroleum Syndicate reports that during May its well No. 2 Moreni suffered from the usual sanding-up that occurs on this field. Although flowing uninterruptedly the production fell to 20 tons per day. The well is, however, clearing itself under its own pressure, and is now producing 50 tons per day, and it is hoped that this may gradually increase.

It is stated that in the course of an interview M. Coffinas, Greek Minister of Finance, said he estimated there would be a deficit on the year 1923-24 of 500,000,000 drachmæ, but that the Budget had been drawn up on a basis of 300 drachmæ to the pound sterling. Following a fall in foreign currencies, the deficit would really be much less.

Algerian Oilfields.—Reports from the Algerian property state that the production for April was 114 tons, and for the first three weeks of May 85 tons. Well No. 30 has now reached a depth of 103 metres; well No. 31 a depth of 93 metres. No. 22, deepening proceeding. No. 27 (which has been capped pending erection of tanks) is expected to come into production within the next few days.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Toujours Lausanne.

The second stage of the Lausanne Conference—the first began last November—has now been in progress for eight weeks; but for the moment is completely held up by the deadlock over the method of payment of the coupons of the Ottoman Public Debt. On this point the Allies have shown no disposition to yield the whole of the ground to the Turks, although willing to make a compromise. The Turkish delegation, however, apparently under explicit instructions from Angora, professes to be adamant. M. Venizelos has reflected the general ennui that has settled upon the Conference by suggesting that Greece should be allowed to make a separate peace with Turkey, in order that both countries may demobilise, and so save their already depleted exchequers. The proposal, however, does not meet with the approval of the Allies, and has been dropped. There can be no doubt that the indeterminate state of affairs is proving more trying to Greece than to any other country. Turkey is proceeding with her leisurely elections, but Greece, who is under obligation to have a General Election as well, is compelled to mark time until peace has been signed. The Revolutionary Committee has probably decided that its position is not improved by a prolonged period of enforced inaction.

Bulgaria and Her Neighbours.

In spite of the nervousness that the first news of the Bulgarian coup d'état produced in Serbia and the unfounded reports which appeared in the Belgrade Press, the Yugoslav Government has maintained a correct attitude towards its neighbour. The speech of the Foreign Minister, M. Nintchitch, in the Skupshtina two days after the event, left little to be desired. He appealed to public opinion in Yugoslavia to keep calm and to await events, and he quoted with approval the assurances already received from the Bulgarian Government that it had no intention to evade any of the country's international obligations. It came as a surprise, therefore, to learn that the Little Entente proposed, through the intermediary of Yugoslavia, to protest in Sofia against an alleged violation of the Treaty of Neuilly, and it is satisfactory to find that such a step is not to be taken. Events in Bulgaria may need watching, but it would be prejudicial to the good relations that ought to exist between the two States, if the Yugoslav Government protested against the new régime on insufficient evidence and before the latter has time to establish itself in the country.

The Death of M. Stambolisky.

Of M. Stambolisky it may sincerely be said that he deserved a better fate. His handling of Bulgaria's foreign relationships since the Armistice showed real statesmanship; it was a break with all Balkan tradition, and in striking contrast with the precedents set by the other States that had shared Bulgaria's defeat in the War. Unfortunately, the personal success that he gained abroad reacted on his home policy; he became more and more intolerant of opposition, and appears to have decided that he could manage home affairs single-handed as easily as he had done foreign affairs. In spite of many friendly warnings, he could not, or would not, realise that his administrative methods were causing as serious harm to the true interests of Bulgaria as they were prejudicial to his own interests. The personal hatred that he aroused was intense, and the knowledge of it probably caused him to wage war still more drastically against his opponents. A situation had arisen that recalled the fate of his prototype Stambuloff. With the success of the counter-stroke against his policy assured, it would have been difficult to fit in M. Stambolisky as head of a constitutional Opposition. His death, therefore, simplifies in one respect the situation for the new Government, whose genuine desire to avoid bloodshed is recognised. On the other hand, it may well increase the misgivings which the coup d'état has aroused in neighbouring countries. Of Stambolisky's determination to avoid a policy of foreign adventure there could be little doubt; some of his opponents, it is recalled, belong to the parties that cheerfully made war on the Allies. This line of reasoning, it will probably be found, is vitiated by the fact that the whole Bulgarian nation accepts the verdict of the War, if not the details of the terms of peace, and that the opposition to M. Stambolisky centred on his home administration, and not on his foreign policy. Bulgaria, however, loses in him a strong man, who could see to it that his foreign policy was maintained; she has yet to discover whether that sound policy will be continued with the same consistency, or whether, from lack of a strong man, it will receive only half-hearted support and be liable to modification against the interests of the country.

The Arabs in Palestine.

There is no need to attempt to disguise the disappointment with which the decision of the Arab nominees to the Palestine Advisory Council not to accept nomination will be received in Great Britain. In the present temper of the small articulate section of the Arabs in Palestine this disappointment will be taken as a measure of the success of their uncompromising policy. It is, however, an accurate reflection of their complete lack of savoir faire and of unfitness to manage the affairs of the country. British opinion of the Palestinian Arabs as a whole will not alter; but it becomes increasingly certain that there can be no question of entrusting Palestine to the control of an Arab majority so long as the representatives of that majority are the men who now speak in its name. In view of the fact that nearly all the nominees had held office before, it is evident that they have yielded to intimidation in refusing their appointments now. It is not of such stuff that good administrators are made, and if personal courage is shown to be a monopoly of the Jews in Palestine, the Zionist cause will have received a fresh stimulus from the misguided action of the Arabs.

Egypt's Water Supply.

The report issued by the Mission to Uganda, under Mr. P. Tottenham, Director of Irrigation in Egypt, which has recently been investigating the upper reaches of the Nile with a view to the improvement of Egypt's water supply, deserves to be studied carefully by Egyptians, especially in connection with the agitation regarding the Sudan. Where that agitation is in any way sincere, there are fears that by being separated from Egypt the Sudan may be placed in a position to prejudice Egypt's interests in the Nile. A shrewder appreciation of the actual position would convince the Egyptians that a Sudan under purely Egyptian jurisdiction is much more likely to prove hostile than an independent Sudan or one under a British protectorate. Be that as it may, the despatch of the Mission and its report do not lend colour to the idea that Great Britain is likely to prove indifferent to Egyptian interests in the Nile waters. The Mission's recommendations emphasise the fact that the proper regulation of the Nile is dependent on works not only in the Sudan, but farther south still, in Uganda. The report points out that the Nile, if properly controlled, will continue to furnish ample water both for Egypt and for the Sudan, and endorses the suggestion already made in THE NEAR EAST that the control of the river should be vested in a Commission representing all countries interested in the Nile. The main trouble of an independent Egypt in regard to the Nile water supply will be, not in connection with the volume in the main channel, but in the maintenance of a regular and equitable distribution to all consumers impartially.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

A Period of Suspense.

Once again the past week has brought no events of great importance, and we have all turned our eyes to foreign affairs and to sport. We were really quite disappointed, so bereft of excitement are we at the moment, that the Bulgarian "revolution" turned out to be a mild affair after all; and the Ruhr question is still in dull abeyance owing to the Belgian Cabinet crisis. This sort of thing, by the bye, seems to be implicit in modern politics; just as something is about to be settled somebody always resigns. One remembers that it happened even in Mr. Lloyd George's spacious days.

And as for sport, conversation upon that has merely become a flow of torrid abuse upon the weather. It is true that cricket of a kind has still been going on—Middlesex the other day created a record against Hampshire by scoring 642 runs for three wickets—but for the most part games have been played in winds and cheerless gloom. Certainly we have not suspended judgment upon the weather; and if Summer does eventually turn up, its late arrival will be greeted with very sarcastic comment.

The Trade Revival.

Trade in this country has been promised so many "revivals" since the War that one is justified in being a little suspicious of conclusions superficially drawn from the May Trade Returns, which have just been issued, and which have caused a riot of optimistic comment in the Press. We have but to remember such speeches as that recently made by Sir Eric Geddes, when he painted in thin colours the future purchasing power of France, of Belgium, and of Germany. But, taking into account all the accidents and non-permanent factors, it would seem, from the enormous increase in our exports and the consequent deduction that we are recovering our capacity to sell abroad, that a trade revival is upon us. Unemployment is gradually decreasing, though how far we yet are from normal conditions is indicated by the enormous total of unemployed—over 1,180,000. But until stability is restored on the Continent, until we cease to read daily of the German mark falling off the map, we shall not be too hopeful.

Lord Birkenhead's Plight.

If one could have any sympathy with any politician, surely one would feel it towards Lord Birkenhead, who, in these later "brainless" days, has become a most melancholy figure. This poor man burned his boats badly when he went sailing in Mr. Lloyd George's deceptive wake, and now does not know which way to tack. At the moment he is trying to fix on the line of Air Peril and Socialism; but he is making little way. It is perhaps bad luck that he should have so unintelligent an organ as the Daily Chronicle to "stunt" his Air theories; but even in his desperate Churchillian onslaughts on Socialism he finds no considerable support.

Much space, incidentally, is given in the Press to this problem of increasing our Air reserve: but most people are content that our Government is not asleep to the question, and are convinced that there is much more construction of aeroplanes going on than is given publicity. And over Socialism there is among the electorate a similar complacency; you really cannot get people to believe that the trade unions are nests of revolution.

The Flocks and the Strayed.

Perhaps it was natural that most of the business which took up the time of the Diocesan Conferences that opened last week should be occupied with questions appertaining to churchmen. The flock is the shepherd's chief consideration; it is for him to conserve it and to prevent it from straying. Thus it was that the suggestion was made that Prayer-Book revision was necessary in order to retain within the Church persons whose consciences rebelled against the Act of Uniformity. But the clergymen assembled together could not escape the bigger question of what was to be done with the multitudes now outside the Church to whom none of its doctrines and practices appealed. In a word, how should the Church cope with the wave of religious indifference which, rising during the War, has now reached what even its professors would dare to call its height? The Archbishop of Canterbury spoke on the reunion of the churches, and this, indeed, to a large extent is being attempted. But it hardly touches the problem. A balanced view of the matter is, one supposes, possible only to the philosopher, who sees in the present vogue of scepticism merely an epoch in a recurrent cycle; but on those whose task it is to combat scepticism our time must make great demands of courage and patience.

The Golf Open Championship.

On Friday Great Britain won the Golf Open Championship at Troon, and the fact was just sufficient to keep the country in a good temper over the week-end. It was a young Englishman of twenty-five, Arthur Havers, who came out a point ahead of the Americans, who were second and third. Apparently those who finished at the head of the list played really brilliant golf, for the weather (and Troon is said to be somewhere in Scotland) did its damndest—a fact which may have been more against the American, Hagen, and the Australian, Kirkwood, than it was against our own man, whose philosophy and practice are probably suited better to the vagaries of these islands. However, while we all applaud the great fight that the holder, Hagen, made for the championship, we are very happy about the result.

The Death of Two Poets.

Two considerable British poets died last week—Herbert Trench and Maurice Hewlett. Trench was hardly a connoisseur's poet, but at the same time he was not popular. Before the War he was, I should think, read much more than now; but some of his things, perhaps not his dramas, but his shorter lyrics, will live. Everyone knows, for example, the music of his "She comes not when Noon is on the roses."

Maurice Hewlett is even more difficult to place, for he touched Literature at so many points. A few years ago he was known, even to the ordinarily intelligent, as the author of "The Forest Lovers," or merely as the writer of historical novels. But recently his fame in verse and in the essay has spread, and deservedly. In his poetry he was a tireless craftsman, fired with passion, sometimes a little earthly; and even in his essays there is overmuch of the personal note, particularly the sense of indignation. Personality in literature is a beautiful thing if one is in complete sympathy with that personality: if not, one wishes for remoter and more detached expression. But there are pages in "From a green shade" (Hewlett loved his gardens) and "Wiltshire Essays" that are of unforgettable fragrance.

The Handel Festival.

Once every three years the people of this country, who are justly renowned for their prowess in choral singing, foregather in their thousands at the Crystal Palace and debauch themselves in an orgy of sound at the Handel Triennial Festival. To-day was the first day of this hectic encounter, in which about 4,000 singers and players endeavoured, and with the completest success, to drown the solo singers—the very singers in whose service Handel poured out his greatest work. Of course, the Palace is the worst conceivable place for the rendering of music; its acoustics play all sorts of tricks with the different timbres of voice. But this does not matter to people like Earl Balfour, fervent clergymen, and other democrats; they revel in the inchoate, Teutonic riot of noise. England cannot well pride itself on its musical capacity until it removes this Handel institution from its public life, but it is beginning to confess that, though the Festival is very jolly, the musical aspect is rather exaggerated. The Festival conception, which reached maturity, and, indeed, became rotten, in Victorian days, is doomed to extinction; but from the success of this present Festival it looks as though it, as many other Victorian legacies, were making a hard fight for survival.

The Conspiracy Trial.

It had been expected that the conspiracy trial, in which fourteen Egyptians are accused of conspiring to kill British officials, would have been concluded before now. But, after forty sessions, the case for the defence has been scarcely begun, and it now appears improbable that the trial will end much before the beginning of next month. The sensational feature of the past week's proceedings was when Mr. Silley, counsel for three of the accused, gave the life history of one of his clients. This man, el Sayed Mohammed, has been for many years the proprietor and headmaster of a well-run and progressive private school in Cairo. Everybody was astonished to hear Mr. Silley state that el Sayed had also been for many years a highly valued secret service worker for the British authorities here. During and immediately after the War his work, to judge by the letters of appreciation sent to him by Sir Gilbert Clayton, Sir Wyndham Deedes, and others then officers of the local Intelligence Staff, and by the amount of money which the British authorities allocated him, must have been of very great value. It is a curious feature of this conspiracy case that several of the accused have been employed as spies for the police, having alternated, according to the story of counsel for the prosecution, between detective work and crime.

A Political Holiday.

The complete peace which has reigned in the local political world during the past few weeks has been too good to last, and it may be expected that things will begin to happen again very soon. The extreme heat of the past few weeks may have been accountable for the lull, as it has been responsible for a partial discontinuance of most other forms of activity. The return of the "heroes of the Seychelles" will certainly be made the occasion for great rejoicing, and the Wafd may be relied upon to see that the spontaneous popular reception which will greet Barakat Pasha and his friends will be properly organised well beforehand. But, in point of fact, Egyptians and British alike, are pleased that these men are now free to return to their homes. Their continued exile in the decidedly unpleasant Seychelles has been causing surprise ever since the release of Zaghloul Pasha. Their return to Egypt will, no doubt, be the signal for a renewal of political activity and a more whole-hearted embarking on the election campaign. Up to the present, in spite of long accounts in the newspapers of the plans of the various parties and of what is being done to educate the simple voter up to using his suffrage aright, very little electioneering such as it is known in Great Britain has been done. The parties have been manœuvring for position, the newspapers of the Wafd and the Liberal Constitutionalists alike accusing various provincial officials of being partisans and of undue influencing of the fellaheen. So far these allegations have not attracted Government notice.

The House of Zaghloul Pasha.

Zaghloul Pasha's house, which has always been, until its closing by the military authorities a few months ago, the headquarters of the Wafd, is again to open its doors. Amin Bey Yousseff, a nephew of Zaghloul Pasha, and a former occupant of the house, has been informed by the Acting Commandant of Police that the house may again be occupied provided that no meetings are held in it. Why there should be this reservation is not clear, but there it is, and Amin Bey has not yet decided that it will be worth while giving the undertaking required for the sake of reopening the building. In this connection a curious official slip of the pen is causing a good deal of comment. Kaimakam Beaumont Bey, Acting Commandant of Police in Cairo, in his letter to Amin Bey Yousseff, used the expression "beit el omma" (house of the nation) in reference to Zaghloul Pasha's home. This is the name always used by the Zaghloulist Party; but it is not accepted by anyone else than the followers of the Wafd. The Liberal Constitutionalists have been greatly perturbed by this apparent recognition of the special position which Zaghloul Pasha claims to occupy, and protests have been made to the Government and the Residency. The matter is trivial in the extreme, but these paltry trifles are sometimes given immense prominence in this country, where it is customary to read significance into petty and often entirely accidental occurrences.

Kantara War Memorial.

On Friday the High Commissioner, accompanied by Viscountess Allenby, went down to Kantara to unveil the Memorial Cross in the war cemetery in the former base of the Egyptian Expeditionary Force. This cemetery is the third largest of its kind in Egypt, and contains more graves of men who fell in the Syrian and Palestinian campaigns than any other in Egypt. The larger cemeteries of Cairo and Alexandria are filled mainly with the graves of men who died of wounds or sickness contracted in Gallipoli. A few Cairo residents who had served in the E.E.F. took the opportunity to run down to Kantara to be present at the cemetery. Those who had not been there since soon after the Armistice were amazed to see that what was for years one of the biggest base camps in any theatre of war, with a ration strength of 120,000, has now almost completely disappeared. Camps which four years ago looked like permanent structures have now gone and left no trace. The sandstorms of the Sinai desert are rapidly effacing every sign of Kantara's former greatness. It was never a popular camp with the officers and men who passed through it, but some of them who on Friday saw its present desolation could not repress a feeling of regret that the jumping-off place for the campaigns which smashed the Turkish armies should now have vanished so utterly.

Egyptian Newspapers.

The annual report of the Egyptian Postal Administration, which has just been published, reveals the astonishing fact that there are in Egypt 166 daily and weekly newspapers. Twenty-eight of these made their first appearance during the past twelve months. It is a mystery how all these journals keep going. Of Egypt's population of 14,000,000 odd less than 10 per cent. can read. Cairo alone has sixteen daily papers, of which ten are published in Arabic. Of these ten, two or three seem to be read by everybody, one or two more enjoy a fair circulation, and the remainder do not appear even to be offered for sale on the streets. Yet the obscure half-dozen appear regularly every day, and their editorial staffs appear to be as well fed and as contented as journalists can ever hope to be. It all bears out the theory, of which some of the journals themselves provide strong internal evidence, that a large part of the Press in this country is financed by political parties or individuals for the purpose of scurrilous attacks on opponents.

BULGARIA.

Sofia, June 13.

The Coup d'Etat.

In the early hours of Saturday, June 9, M. Stambolisky's Agrarian Government was deposed from power and the Ministers and chief officials were thrown into prison. This daring coup was accomplished by the army, aided by the younger members of the Bourgeois parties.

A long time ago several prominent citizens, notably Professor Zankoff, Generals Lazaroff and Rousseff, and others, tried to form a Centre Party with the object of taking over the government of the country. They were, however, unable to do anything, as the different Bourgeois parties did not support them, and the Agrarians were firmly established in power. The leaders of the movement, therefore, determined to bring about a change of government by forcible methods. The army, being the only non-Agrarian organisation in the country, was chosen as the instrument. General Lazaroff, a reserve officer, and Colonel Vulkoff, chief of the map section at the War Office, were the leaders, and for over a year they carefully planned the coup, the former visiting all the garrison towns with a view to arranging that the coup should be executed simultaneously. All officers holding important positions were tested in order to ascertain whether they were loyal and whether they could be trusted to keep a secret. In the spring of this year the army's plans were maturing, and the coup was to have been brought off in the late summer or autumn. During May the Agrarians began to be suspicious that something was afoot, and although their suspicions were directed more against the Macedonian Autonomists than the army, the latter decided that it would be dangerous to delay. June 9 was thus decided on. On the 7th and 8th reserve officers were informed that their services would be welcomed at a certain time and at a certain place. Their duties were to consist in maintaining law and order, as one of the first acts of the army was to disarm and disband all the gendarmerie. The latter were almost entirely recruited during the Agrarian régime and could not be relied on. The reserve officers were only too glad to be of service, and on Saturday morning could all be seen in uniform performing various tasks.*

Working in the closest collaboration with the army were a group of Bourgeois, some of independent politics and some belonging to recognised parties of the Opposition. The principal of these was Professor Alexander Zankoff, a former rector of the Sofia University, and a man bearing a reputation for great determination and driving force. M. Zankoff had already chosen seven men who would form the new Cabinet, and just before the coup was due to take place he went to see King Boris in order to obtain the latter's approval. The King had been staying at Kritchim, near Philipopolis, and only returned to Sofia during the evening of the 8th. From the station he motored to his palace at Vranje, which is a few miles from the capital. After some delay, M. Zankoff found the King and informed him of what the army and the Bourgeois proposed to do. He asked the King's approval in order that a Royal ukase appointing the new Cabinet might be signed at once. It is not yet clear whether the King was in entire ignorance of what had been planned, but, in any case, he did not make up his mind immediately. He was, naturally, in a most difficult position; but after M. Zankoff had been with him for several hours, the Royal assent was obtained and the new Premier hurried back to Sofia.

Events in Sofia.

The military had made their preparations with great thoroughness. By three o'clock on Saturday morning all the Agrarian Ministers in Sofia had been arrested and taken to the Fifth Prefecture. The gendarmerie were disarmed without the slightest difficulty. Important strategic points,

* They were demobilised on the 11th, and all stories concerning a general mobilisation are false.

such as the post office, railway station, and the different Ministries, were immediately taken over by the military. Troops controlled the town, and no one was allowed to enter or leave. For a considerable time it was impossible to find out what had really happened. The telephone was not working, and circulation in the streets was forbidden. Gradually it became known that the Agrarians were no more and that the military were in their place. Sofia, being almost entirely a Bourgeois town, was naturally jubilant, and by the afternoon had assumed an almost festive air. In so far as the capital is concerned, the coup was quite bloodless, only one or two policemen being killed.

After having obtained the King's consent to form a new Government, M. Zankoff repaired to the War Ministry, where the new Cabinet held their first meeting, which lasted for over twenty-four hours. General Lazaroff was appointed Governor of Sofia, and he immediately requisitioned all private motor vehicles. These were filled with soldiers and despatched into the provinces. At half-past two General Lazaroff addressed a large crowd of citizens from the Sobranje. He told them of what had happened and asked for their co-operation in order that incidents might be avoided. He was given a magnificent reception, and shortly afterwards a crowd numbering several thousands accompanied M. Zankoff on his visit to the various Foreign Legations. The new Premier acquainted the Diplomatic Corps with the situation, saying that he had the King's authority to assume the reins of government, and that he had already telegraphed to the Bulgarian diplomatic representatives abroad. By 5 p.m. the excitement was more or less over, free circulation was allowed, and it was difficult to imagine that the old Government was in prison and a new one in its place.

The Situation in the Provinces.

Meanwhile news had been coming in from the chief provincial centres that the coup had been satisfactorily carried out and that perfect calm reigned. Still, there was no definite news of M. Stambolisky, and around the personality of the ex-Prime Minister rumours began to circulate. Since the middle of May Stambolisky had been living at his native village, Slavovitza, which is a few miles west of Philippopolis. He was commonly supposed to have gathered round him a large body of Agrarian Guards, and the first authentic story that reached Sofia was that he was besieged at Slavovitza. This speedily gave way to the rumour that he was killed. On Sunday morning he was reported to have taken to the mountains, whilst yesterday it was officially announced that along with a few faithful followers he was in hiding near the town of Pangorishite. Up to the time of writing nothing more definite is known, but the military are confident that they will catch him. It appears that Stambolisky's object is to get out of Bulgaria.

Although the first reports from the provinces indicated that all was quiet, on Sunday morning it became known that several Agrarian risings had taken place. The most serious of these were at Radomir and Dolny Dubnik; but, in addition, trouble was reported from various Agrarian strongholds in Northern Bulgaria. In the south all was quiet. At Radomir, M. Boteff, ex-President of the Sobranje, put himself at the head of three or four hundred peasants and tried to march on Sofia. He was, however, confronted by cavalry near Pernik, and after a fight, in which casualties took place on both sides, Boteff was arrested and his followers dispersed. At Pleven, M. Oboff, former Minister of Agriculture, had been arrested, but the local Agrarians attacked the prison and set him free. He fled towards the Danube, and succeeded in reaching Roumania. M. Duparinoff, ex-Minister of Justice, accompanied by several Agrarian Deputies, was in the neighbourhood of Varna when the coup was made. He tried to reach Turkey, and was only caught a few miles from the frontier.

Despite these isolated risings, it is now considered that the army have the situation well in hand, as from to-day railway communication throughout the country is re-established, whilst the post and telegraph service is working normally. Regarding the financial side of the question, it was generally thought that a big, although perhaps temporary, fall would take place in the value of the lev. The exact opposite has, however, occurred. The lev, which was quoted at 440 to the English pound last week, is to-day 380.

The New Ministry.

Regarding the policy and personality of the new Cabinet it is as yet too early to speak. The Prime Minister has, however, declared that Bulgaria's foreign policy will continue to be a peaceful one, and that there is no question of establishing a military dictatorship. He has added that his Cabinet particularly desire to live on good terms with Yugoslavia. This latter declaration is especially interesting, as the Serbians, in common with other foreigners, feared that the coup was a Macedonian one, and that it would result in an anti-Serb policy. The coup is purely Bulgarian, although it enjoys the full sympathy of the Macedonians. As to the future, it is well to emphasise that the present Cabinet, the composition of which follows, is purely provisional:—

PROFESSOR ALEXANDER ZANKOFF	Prime Minister and Minister of Education
GENERAL ROUSSEFF	Minister of the Interior
COLONEL KALFOFF	Minister of Foreign Affairs

following the acceptance by the latter of territorial compensation in lieu of an indemnity was welcomed by everyone here. The slow headway made at Lausanne, and the desire to avenge the holocaust of Smyrna, had worked up the men at the front to a very high warlike pitch, and it would not be an exaggeration to say that had M. Venizelos and Ismet Pasha failed to come to an understanding on that memorable Saturday afternoon, the opposing forces would have been having an extremely busy time in Thrace to-day. As a matter of fact, several units were already on the move, taking up the positions allotted to them along the Maritza in readiness for the general advance, which was to have commenced at midnight on Sunday, while Colonel Plastiras was on the point of proceeding to Thrace.

The cession of Karagatch, with its adjacent suburbs, including the railway station, is not, of course, an ideal solution from the Greek point of view. As it is argued, however, that "it would be easier to get Karagatch back from the Turks than an indemnity," the agreement arrived at is not altogether looked upon with disfavour. Meanwhile the entire attention of the nation is now focussed upon plans for the reconstruction and the rebuilding of the country. The Prime Minister, Colonel Gonatas, who received me shortly after the Lausanne news had come through, told me that the efforts of the Government would now be centred towards obtaining a quick signing of a preliminary peace with the Turks, so as to enable demobilisation to begin as soon as possible, and thus put on end to the strain of suspense which has been sapping the nation's energies and resources during the past eight months.

The Elections.

Another question which is to-day causing much anxiety to the Government is that of the elections. The Revolutionaries declare that, although they have now settled the external questions, there still remains much work to be done in the way of internal reorganisation, and maintain that it would be unwise to hold elections before they have completed their task. This argument is probably sound to a certain extent, but it should not be forgotten that there will shortly be a peace treaty requiring ratification, which process would necessitate the convocation of Parliament. I understand that in order to overcome this difficulty it has been suggested that a plebiscite be held throughout Greece to give the people the opportunity themselves to ratify the Treaty. One is apt to wonder, however, what would happen if the people treated the whole business as a party matter and the polling resulted in more No's than Yes's. Apart from that, there are various other reasons for which a plebiscite would be impossible, and the general belief is that the Revolutionary Government will eventually recognise the absolute necessity of holding elections.

No Water!

As if typhus, smallpox, flies, mosquitoes, and the heat were not enough, the unlucky Athenian is to-day very nearly dying of thirst. The main aqueduct of Athens, known as the Adrian aqueduct, which was constructed 1,800 years ago by the Emperor Hadrian, was seriously damaged about a fortnight ago as a result of a landslide, and the unfortunate City of Minerva has since been left practically without water. Although the work of repair is conducted by day and night, very often under the personal supervision of the Mayor of Athens, M. Patsis, the municipal authorities announce that it will probably be another ten days before water is again available. In the meantime the town obtains its water from a small and altogether inadequate aqueduct at Patissia, also from the numerous private wells around Athens, the proprietors of which are amassing fortunes. A number of these wells have been commandeered by the authorities, who have undertaken the distribution of water to some of the more distant districts by means of the watercarts hitherto used for the watering of the streets during summer. Sufficient water for about 10,000 people is also brought daily from Corinth.

Athens has always suffered from lack of water, and twenty years ago, when the town's population barely exceeded 150,000, one of the members of the Deliyanni Cabinet proposed that an aqueduct be constructed by which the water of Lake Stymphalia, in the Peloponnesus, would be brought to Athens. On being informed, however, that the undertaking would entail an expenditure of 5,000,000 drachmæ (about £200,000 then), the Voulé rejected the proposal. Had the project been carried out Athens would have had sufficient water to-day for over a million inhabitants. As it is, water is a luxury, and that probably explains why so many houses are built in Athens nowadays without a bathroom.

Miscellaneous News.

Three of the principal roads leading from Athens to the suburbs—namely, Patissia road, Kiphissia road, and Boulevard Amelia—are about to be paved with asphalt at a cost of about 35,000,000 drachmæ.

M. Parmentier, representing the League of Nations, arrived in Athens last week in order to study the financial situation of the country in connection with the proposed refugee loan.

Two new morning papers, the Eleftheros Logos (Ven.) and the Ephimeris tis Hellados (anti-Ven.), will appear before the end of this month. The Revue Commerciale de Grèce, a monthly commercial and financial journal published in French, appeared in Athens last month.

It might seem ridiculous just at this moment to complain that nothing is going on here; but such is the case. The two interesting places, as far as the Near East is concerned, are Angora and Lausanne, and apparently Constantinople is a provincial spot of secondary importance. We agree that appearances are deceptive, and that although catastrophic events do not succeed one another in bewildering succession here just at present, the importance of Constantinople might be underestimated by those who might have to direct the destinies of the new Turkey through the next perilous years.

Smyrna and Constantinople.

A well-informed writer in the local Press contributed a column and a half the other day on the relative importance, from the commercial point of view, of Smyrna and Constantinople. He rightly brought out the essential difference between the two ports by insisting upon the fundamental function of Smyrna as predestined by geography, and hence by history, to act as the outlet for the natural products of Anatolia. The rôle of Constantinople has been, and will have to be in the future, that of a clearing-house and means of communication between the comparatively undeveloped and inaccessible regions of the Near East and the rest of the world. Much has been written to show the essential unsoundness of the multiplication of middlemen in business matters; but justification can be found for the existence at Constantinople of a kind of central exchange and mart. There exists here a reasonably good imitation of the commercial and financial machinery of the West, which, since the Russian débâcle, stands out still more prominently in contrast to the primitive conditions obtaining anywhere within one or two hundred miles in any direction.

The moral for the gentlemen in Angora who are engaged in the long-established game of creating a new heaven and a new earth is an obvious one. For their own sakes they should try to use a little horse sense in dealing with the potential treasure under their hands, which is Constantinople. Let them carry out reasonable reforms, by all means, but let these take the form of creating a sense of personal safety and commercial stability. Let them make their reasonable regulations with the object of filling their State coffers from a percentage of the gains which the situation of Constantinople pours into the pockets of the commercial community in normal times, but they should steer a steady course and make sure that their legitimate share does actually get into the State coffers, and is properly used when it gets there.

Angora as Manager.

We are sometimes assailed by a doubt whether anybody has yet told Angora bluntly that, notwithstanding the tacit semi-admission by peace delegates, in the interest of concluding a "speedy" peace, that the new Turkish Government is practically on a level with European standards, their management of Constantinople affairs during the past eight months has not been an unqualified success, and that if they go on as they have begun they will soon kill the goose that lays the golden eggs for Turkey. We suspect that inexperience accounts for some of their mistakes; but we will not entirely acquit Angora of mauvaise volonté, and a desire to Turkify the place by force.

The Foreign Companies.

The pourparlers which are still going on at Angora between the Government and the foreign companies are officially stated to be proceeding satisfactorily. The Press favours us from time to time with illuminating hints which do not seem to support unreservedly that general statement. One of the representatives of the French companies is reported to have said that so many complicated questions have arisen during the course of the negotiations that long conversations would be necessary. The Tevhid reports that the Golden Horn Ferry Boat Company has fixed up matters with the Government on the basis of a payment of £T115,000 as war indemnity. The negotiations with the Regie are reported to be passing through a difficult stage, and so forth. We have good reason for asserting that things are not going nearly as well as the papers would have us believe, and that the conditions proposed by the Government are in the majority of cases totally unacceptable to the interested companies.

The Ecumenical Patriarch.

Certain developments arising out of the attack on the Ecumenical Patriarch Meletios IV. throw an interesting light upon the whole affair. Papa Eftimi, who has been acting as a kind of Patriarch for the Orthodox churches in Anatolia, has just issued a statement extolling the patriotic spirit of the "Orthodox community" which took such drastic measures to express its disapproval of the present Patriarch, and declaring that until they see at the Phanar a Patriarch approved by their national Government, the Anatolian Orthodox communities will ignore the Phanar Patriarchate. Here in the East Churchmen are nothing if not politically minded. Meanwhile M. Damianides, who led the riot, has, together with some of his associates, been excommunicated.

IRAQ'S NEW POSTAGE STAMPS.

On June 1 the Irak Government issued a new series of stamps to take the place of the surcharged Turkish stamps which have been in use hitherto. Of the eight different designs appearing on the twelve denominations ($\frac{1}{2}$ anna to 10 rupees) four are by Miss Edith Cheesman and four by Mrs. Colin Garbett. Miss Cheesman's designs, which are here reproduced, are essentially connected with Arabs and Arab life. One represents the Standard Bearer of the Dulaim Desert Camel Corps; the original standard is of brilliant green silk, with a passage from the Koran worked upon it in gold. Another depicts the round coracle or gulfah, so extensively used on the Tigris and Euphrates. No 3 shows the Shiah Mosque of Kazimain, with a pattern round it representing the tiles that adorn the interior of so many mosques; No. 4 the Sunni Mosque of Moadhdham, surrounded by a design of date-palm leaves.

SALMA.

"SALMA": A Play in Three Acts. By L. Cranmer-B yng. (London: John Murray. 3s. 6d. net.)

This little "drama of April played in Cintra one thousand years ago" is beautifully told by Mr. Cranmer-B yng. It is based on a line of Hafiz—runeki ahdi shebabesti deguer bustrana ("the beauty of the season of youth returns again to the meadows")—and is applied specifically to the life of one Salma, a principal girl in a troupe who sacrifices herself for the sake of her love for Shamsuddin, a Persian lute-player. The blossoming of this love, its snapping, and its revival in Salma's daughter, Behar, give the author opportunity for disclosing with all the lambent sadness of expression which he has at his command the passion and fatality of the East. It is a finely chiselled play, which would, we imagine, be even better acted than it reads, though to the mind alone it is convincing enough. Some of Shamsuddin's songs are almost exquisitely beautiful, though the beauty is not quite utter and the pathos rather implied than expressed. To say that the local colour is perfectly genuine and that the atmosphere and whole background of the play are correctly conceived would be an impertinence to so distinguished an author as Mr. Cranmer-B yng; but one should note that he here uses his great knowledge of Eastern ways with splendid cunning and restrained skill.

A FLAMBOYANT TALE.

"DESOLATE SPLENDOR." By Michael Sadleir. (London: Constable. 7s. 6d. net.)

Such a title as "Desolate Splendour" leads the reader to expect a good deal; but the novel really does live up to this announcing flourish. There is a solid plot with a melodramatic climax, although even Mr. Sadleir's air of conviction does not succeed in making us believe in the possibility of Viola Marvell's act of sacrifice. The characters are boldly drawn, and arrest the attention; they give a sense of reality, gilded with romance, which at once appeals to the imagination. A wicked old woman who lives at the top of a tower is successfully designed to make our flesh creep, and an equally wicked old nobleman is grotesquely pictorial. Charles Plethern, with his irresistibly charming manner, his many love affairs, and his final realisation of Viola's greatness of heart, is presented in the best romantic spirit. Mr. Sadleir contrives to throw a pleasantly glamorous haze over the unusually clear-cut edges of his plot and definite outlines of his characters. His style, with its mixture of old-fashioned precision and modern subtlety, is perfectly suited for the telling of what he himself calls "this flamboyant tale."

THE HOLY LAND AS SEEN BY A JEWISH POET.

"THE FEET OF THE MESSENGER." By Yehoash (Solomon Bloomgarten). Translated from the Yiddish by Isaac Goldberg. (Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society of America. 1.75 dollars.)

The author of this descriptive book of colonist life in Palestine went to settle in the country shortly before the Great War. He gives his readers the results of his observation on life there, both under normal conditions as well as during the first months of the world upheaval.

The various types of the early settlers Yehoash encountered are portrayed in a fascinating manner, and we are given a vivid description of the quaint life and customs of the immigrant Jews in their new surroundings, as well as a mass of Jewish folklore. These colonists lived quite peaceably with their Arab and Yemenite neighbours; and they appear to have found the housing problem quite as much in evidence there as in other parts of the world. In many cases the characters were well travelled, and had thrown up their business careers in different parts of the world to answer the call of their hearts, to lead a simple life in Eretz Yisroel—the land of their forefathers.

A particularly picturesque account is given of the picking and shelling of the almonds, followed by the gathering in of the grape harvest and its manufacture into the famous Rishon le Zion wine.

The chapter entitled "Zoology" introduces to us the unworldly and lovable Ahroni, the zoologist, and the description of the manner in which he entertains the children of the schools from the surrounding colonies when they come to inspect "Adon Ahroni's museum" is indeed charming.

A very pathetic account is given at the end of the book of the effects of the breaking out of the War on the colonists and of the hardships they had to endure. Special tribute is paid to the conduct of the American sailors on a U.S. warship towards the poor refugees, whom they were transporting from Palestine to Egypt.

The author of this book is a distinguished Yiddish poet and scholar, and his translator has in no way robbed the narrative of its beautiful language.

RELIGION IN INDIAN POLITICS.

The news received recently from Northern India shows only too clearly that the field of political discussion has been invaded by religious differences, and a stage has thus been reached where the attempt to establish democratic institutions must be subjected in the near future to the greatest of all possible strains. Evidence of this intrusion comes from various sources, and its volume is too great to allow of even a summary being given; but an idea of the existing situation can be formed from the despairing complaints of recognised leaders among the extremist factions, who find their declared object of uniting the East against the West rendered unattainable by the facts that Hindus and Moslems are practically arrayed in hostile camps, that political workers have become religious partisans, whose feelings are running almost to madness, and that, as one journal mourns, "the bubble of Hindu-Moslem unity has entirely burst." Some explanation of this change is due to our readers, especially to those whose surroundings have led them to regard the segregation of religion from politics as the natural, or even the only possible, condition of affairs, and at the outset it may be well to recall that this segregation is, in fact, quite a modern phenomenon. In many Western countries the drum ecclesiastic has summoned adherents not to pray, but to vote, and perhaps to fight; minute differences on obscure points of dogma have often determined men's attitude on purely mundane questions; and in India, where the religious divergence goes much deeper, the tendency for it to govern the political alignment is one of those hard facts which statesmen must take into account.

Hinduism is at once less and more than a religion as the term is now understood in this country. It is less, in that it does not depend on any definite creed, and its profession is, in fact, consistent with the widest diversity of views. It is more, in that it is a complete expression of Indian mentality, and a rule of life in all its departments. Islam, too, is essentially a rule of life; but a life dominated by an unbending and militant creed. No logical compromise is possible between the two rules, and where they subsist side by side harmony can be secured only by a general attitude of mutual respect and toleration. Hitherto India, taken as a whole, has not reached that goal. Harmony has prevailed at times, and in some parts of the country, especially where the original Moslem inspiration has been weakened; but in the north, at least, the antagonism has remained, though the force of its expression has varied, and a trivial incident, or an unfounded rumour, has sufficed on occasion to drive a whole population into temporary madness. Indian protagonists of constitutional change recognised long ago that this antagonism was the most serious obstacle in their path, and their most noteworthy constructive achievement was the creation of harmony, miscalled union, among their active adherents. A few years ago Hindu and Moslem leaders could not only work together on secular questions; but could hope to reach agreement where religious matters were involved; their attitude won the applause of popular audiences, and there is no doubt that a sentiment in favour of increased harmony was spreading downwards, though its extent and its force were often wildly exaggerated. The achievement was both real and important; but it was very far from being complete, and the changes of the last three years have resulted in the exposure of its inadequacy, which is now in progress. We think it may fairly be said that the chief agent at work has been the grant, for the first time in Indian history, of a measure of real power to an electorate which, though it is restricted, is, in fact, representative of the most important sections of the population. It was easy to applaud orators who spoke of harmony so long as the affair was one of words; but it is by no means easy for politicians exercising unaccustomed power to hold the balance equally between the two faiths, and it is exceedingly difficult for them to convince their followers that they are even trying to do so. Religious partisans, and they are numerous on both sides, can scarcely avoid hoping that the era of British impartiality has passed away; they are looking for the supremacy of their own faith, and they expect it to be favoured by one side and oppressed by the other. Such expectations provide their own justification, when every official action is judged from a purely sectarian standard, and the process, once started, is bound to be cumulative in its operation. In the north of India it has already gone far, the population is forming up on strictly religious lines, and so long as this remains true, we must expect that secular measures will be judged, not on their merits, but by their value in the controversial field.

As regards the immediate future, it may be allowed that the electoral system in force will prevent an open contest on these lines, because it provides separate constituencies for Moslems; but the effect of the revival of the old antagonism is likely to be seen in the quality of the next legislatures, which may consist very largely of bitter religious partisans. In that case, the course of Indian politics will be diverted, and the progress of the country towards self-government will be delayed. The "Indianisation" of the Services, on which politicians have set their hearts, must wait until Indian officers can hope for popular support. Attempts at much-needed social reforms will be hopeless, because every social custom has a definite religious basis in popular sentiment, if not in historical fact. Extension of the franchise will be impossible so long as it means the grant of power to larger masses of ignorant fanatics. These consequences are inevitable, and Englishmen, at any rate, can do nothing to avert them. A remedy can be provided only by the true leaders of the people, who as yet have shown but few signs of appreciating the position. For the moment they must put aside nearly everything in which they are interested and concentrate their energies on restoring and increasing that harmony which is the condition precedent for social and political advance. Left to itself, the evil is more likely to increase than to diminish. In any case, it cannot disappear in a moment, but sagacious and courageous leadership will suffice to turn the tide. Hindu-Moslem unity is not indeed a bubble that has burst, but an ideal which can be realised only by hard, unselfish work.

BULGARIA ON TRIAL.

In the interest of peace in the Balkans—the only Near Eastern policy that any country in Europe ought to have—the widest possible measure of fair-play should be accorded to Bulgaria at the present moment. A domestic crisis is in progress in the country; the very best way of gauging Bulgaria's intentions is to leave the nation a free hand in solving its own troubles. If it shows a tendency to kick over the traces, there will be time enough to bring it to book. Bulgaria is not a Germany, having at her disposal such man-power that her every movement has to be watched lest she suddenly becomes a menace to the world's peace. She tried conclusions once with Serbia and Greece, with disastrous results to herself; to-day there is not a single Bulgarian who would dream of a war against Yugoslavia, Greece and Roumania, for it is certain that no country would move a finger in Bulgaria's support. An exhibition of fear or even of nervousness on the part of a neighbour, therefore, at this stage can have no real justification; on the other hand, it will, in the eyes of the world, inevitably be connected with a motive that has little to do with peace. What is happening in Bulgaria—whether it be called revolution, coup d'état, or merely change of Government—is essentially a Bulgarian concern, and, in view of the minor position occupied by post-War Bulgaria, the episode can surely be allowed to work itself out without throwing a single State into a panic. There will be time enough to mobilise Europe when Bulgaria has shown signs of preparing to commit national suicide. Until then Yugoslavs, Frenchmen, and even the most timorous of the diplomatic correspondents of the London Press can sleep soundly in their beds. Something in the nature of civil war has taken place in Bulgaria, and it is the duty of foreigners to withhold judgment until the issue of the struggle has been decided. Few countries avoid making mistakes when violent methods are employed in settling political differences, and there is little likelihood of Bulgaria being an exception to the rule. In these circumstances a dispassionate detachment is necessary in following the course of events. One of the first acts of the new Government was to send to foreign Governments through its representatives abroad formal assurances of its intention to respect Bulgaria's treaty obligations and to maintain good relations with its neighbours and the Allied Powers. Until, therefore, these assurances are belied, the new régime is entitled to be given credit for good intentions. In certain quarters, however, it was at once taken for granted that the overthrow of the Stambolisky régime implied the restoration of all that was worst in Bulgaria's political history. There can be no justification for this view until it has been confirmed by the event. Much has happened in Bulgaria since 1914. In the first place, there is a constitutional monarch on the throne in the place of King Ferdinand; secondly, there was much in Stambolisky's administrative methods that savoured of despotism and that left room for a return to constitutional procedure, which would have nothing in common with pre-War politics. It is right that time should be given to those now in authority to decide the path on which Bulgaria is to travel in the future. There can be no harm in taking note of what may be regarded as indications of future policy; but it is surely hypercritical and betrays unnecessary nervousness to complain that in the earliest stages of the movement, before it could be known what forces the former Government would be able to muster, or who would side with the new régime, recruiting for the "revolutionary" army was encouraged to an extent which constituted a violation of the Treaty of Neuilly.

Causes for Suspicion.

That the new Government should be beholden for its existence to the Army goes without saying, for it was only with the defection of the Army that an end could ever be put to the Stambolisky régime. To label the new order militarist, however, lacks justification at the moment; there has been no time so far for the military officers who brought about the change to show their hand. Those who charge the Government with being militarist are also responsible for reports of the resolute hostility of large bands of peasants faithful to Stambolisky and the Agrarian cause. Whether these reports be true or not, the new order cannot be blamed for taking all necessary precautions to safeguard its position. In admitting this there need be no desire to take sides in a purely Bulgarian concern. M. Zankoff's Government is acting in regard to military measures as any other government would act in similar circumstances, and if fault is to be found with it abroad there must be more substantial grounds. Two incidents that are said to have occurred will certainly call for explanation if the reports are true. M. Radoslavoff, after a more than injudicious interview in Berlin, is said to have returned to Bulgaria, and it is reported that M. Todor Alexandroff, the Macedonian leader, has been accorded an enthusiastic reception in Sofia. In regard to M. Radoslavoff, there may be much to be said in favour of a general political amnesty when the present trouble is over, and the immediate liberation of the Ministers of the other Cabinets who had been interned by Stambolisky was a natural step to take. M. Radoslavoff, however, stood in a different category, and, in view of the uneasiness in neighbouring States, it would have been politic to have warned him that the judgment of the Court that condemned him was still in force. It will be time enough to amnesty M. Radoslavoff when the Balkan States can be satisfied that their opinion of him has to be modified or that he will never have an opportunity of proving the evil genius of the Balkans.

Bulgaria and the Macedonians.

Bulgaria's position in regard to M. Todor Alexandroff is more complicated. The Yugoslav Government might well consider its worst fears justified if M. Zankoff were to identify himself unreservedly with the Macedonian revolt against the Serbs, and its next move would probably be to take the measures deemed necessary to prevent a Bulgaro-Macedonian combination. The wisest course that the Bulgarian Government can adopt at this stage is to inform M. Alexandroff that it requires time to consider the Macedonian situation, that it is opposed on principle to attempting a solution by means of violence, and that it is prepared to support the cause of Macedonian autonomy by all the peaceful means at its disposal. There is little chance of any Bulgarian Government pursuing at the present time a different policy in regard to the Allied Powers as a whole from that identified with the name of M. Stambolisky. M. Zankoff will have to tread more warily in regard to Yugoslavia on account of the Macedonians: but no alternative to the attempt to cultivate friendly relations with the Yugoslavs can, in the circumstances, be contemplated. The Macedonian question, it cannot be repeated too often, is one for the Allied Powers or the League of Nations to take in hand without delay. If it is left in its present state, Europe will wake up one day to find that the Macedonians have been exterminated, or that war has again broken out in the Balkans.

A Home Policy.

It is more difficult to foresee the lines on which the new Bulgarian Government will be able to elaborate a home policy with any chance of success. In its present form it represents a coalition of the bourgeois parties, which in the past have been identified more with personalities than policies. It has before it the mistakes of the previous Government and the certainty that the country wants nothing so much as internal peace. No greater mistake could be made than to suppose that, with the elimination of M. Stambolisky, the Agrarian Party can be ignored. It would be a bad day for Bulgaria if that were the case. The Agrarian Party stood originally for the rights of the peasants, who form the great majority (nearly 80 per cent., it is reckoned) of the population, and there will be no permanent peace in the country if their claim on the attention of the State is overlooked. Under M. Stambolisky they were encouraged to believe that their interests could be promoted only at the expense, if not to the exclusion, of all other parties. They must unlearn this lesson, and they will do this, it is to be hoped, at the hands of the moderates of their own party. It is stated that M. Daskaloff, the Bulgarian Minister in Prague, has proclaimed himself M. Stambolisky's successor and head of the Agrarians. His past record holds out little prospect of his influence in the party being for its good or for the good of the country, and his actions in Prague when the news of the coup d'état reached him would seem to have been inspired by a spirit of swashbuckling rather than of statesmanship.

PRESS ON THE NEAR EAST.

The Bulgarian Crisis.

In the Westminster Gazette of June 12 the Rt. Hon. C. F. G. Masterman traverses the views of the majority of writers upon the Bulgarian coup d'état, which, he says, was dependent upon foreign affairs and on nothing else. The internal differences he dismisses as negligible. What really brought ruin to M. Stambolisky, he asserts, was his abandonment of the Macedonian cause and of the hope of gaining an outlet to the Ægean Sea. These two causes, he maintains, will burn for ever in Bulgarian hearts.

A writer in the Manchester Guardian of June 12 thinks that the greatest consequence of the Bulgarian change of government may be a stimulus to the Agrarian movement throughout Eastern Europe, for, in his opinion, the granting by M. Stambolisky of land to the peasants will permanently affect Bulgaria. He does not look for any startling change on the part of the new régime in Bulgaria's internal policy, and changes, if any, will develop in foreign policy. On the questions of Macedonia and an outlet to the Ægean the new Government will have either to use force or to revert to the old competitive alliances—a restoration of the traditional state of disruption in the Balkans.

The Peace of the Balkans.

The Morning Post of June 18 expresses fears for the peace of the Balkans. It is concerned over the reported divisions among the Little Entente, particularly over the lack of co-ordination between Yugoslavia and Roumania on the attitude to be adopted towards the new Government in Bulgaria. After paying tribute to M. Stambolisky's "instinct for foreign affairs," it says that "his violent death may be a precursor of unrest in the Balkans." Moreover, it does not like the association of some of the new Government's supporters with the Germanophile M. Radoslavoff, and thinks that the successful resistance of Turkey is bound to stimulate the revanche school in Sofia. In view of all the dangerous potentialities of the situation, therefore, a common policy towards Bulgaria on the part of the Little Entente and of Britain and France is essential.

Roumanian Debts Abroad.

In a very interesting letter which will be found on page 638 our Bucharest Correspondent deals with recent Roumanian commercial legislation, notably in regard to the safeguarding of Roumanian traders in respect of foreign debts. As regards the United Kingdom, arrangements have been made with groups of British creditors in London and Manchester, but the terms of the agreements have not met with approval on the part of the French and Italian creditors. A Bill has now been passed compelling similar arrangements, and providing for payments in instalments spread over a minimum of twelve years and a maximum of twenty years, thus affording an extended respite to the debtor unless he fails to pay the instalments as they become due.

Government "Control."

While the above measure is at least comprehensible, it is difficult to find anything in favour of a Bill which was introduced with the object, it is stated, of suppressing profiteering and bringing about the reduction of prices of food and other necessities. From the details given by our Correspondent, it would appear to be a wholly unsatisfactory and unworkable measure, and it is not at all surprising that there should be very general protests against it. Government control of any description is never popular, even in countries accustomed by long experience to the bureaucratic régime, and the Bill in question seems to transcend all reasonable limits of interference, while the results that would attend its introduction appear extremely dubious. Our Correspondent gives an illuminating example of the results that have attended food control in Roumania, and one imagines that the experience of the people hitherto is the best safeguard that the present measure will not be translated into law.

Yugoslav Finance.

Like Greece, Yugoslavia has made a determined attempt to place its finances on a sound footing, though the dinar has not yet emulated the rocket-like course of the drachma. The country's financial position was the subject of a recent speech by the Finance Minister, M. Stoyadinovitch, who was able to give an encouraging review of the situation, pointing out that for the first time since the war there was no deficit in the Treasury receipts, while the State was no longer borrowing from the National Bank, and its debt to that institution was diminishing progressively. He foreshadowed an increase in taxation to meet enhanced expenditure, and also stated that in January there would be a unification of the Yugoslav fiscal system. Of special interest was the statement that the Yugoslav Government is to begin the payment of the coupons on the loan contracted by Montenegro in London. There have been numerous inquiries on this subject in the last year or two, and this step will go a long way to restore confidence in Balkan finance.

The Smyrna-Aidin Railway.

For some time considerable apprehension has been felt in the City in regard to the question of compensation for the Smyrna-Aidin Railway, since indications have not been lacking to suggest doubt whether the attitude of the British Government in respect of the company's claims had not undergone a change since the opening of the present Conference. Replies by Mr. R. McNeill to questions put in Parliament on the subject cannot be regarded as throwing any very definite light on the subject, and have certainly done nothing to allay the very natural anxiety felt by the shareholders. The Council of Administration have now published the text of a letter sent by them to the Foreign Office on June 7, to which at the date of issue no reply had been received, in order that the present circumstances may be understood, and with a view to informing stockholders of the consequences to them if their rights are not maintained at Lausanne. That the company has an unquestionable claim for support is beyond argument. While all British companies in the war zone have suffered to a greater or lesser extent, none has experienced the vicissitudes that have been the experience of the Smyrna-Aidin Railway since 1914, and, one might say, more particularly since the Armistice. The measure of support the company receives now will have no small determining influence on British trade enterprise in that region hereafter. One looks for unhesitating support for British endeavour overseas. For traders this will be a test case.

The British Empire Exhibition.

Very encouraging reports are forthcoming with regard to the British Empire Exhibition. Applications have been made in excess of the space available in respect of a large number of the sections devoted to United Kingdom exhibits, it is stated, while there is only a small space left in the remaining sections. There is no doubt therefore that the Exhibition will do full justice to home products, while the reports of the interest taken in the undertaking in the Dominions and other parts of the Empire suggests that it will be a very complete index of Imperial potentialities.

ROUMANIA.

Bucharest, May 31.

Safeguarding Roumanian Debtors.

During this session a number of important Bills have already come before the Roumanian Parliament, and some of these have been passed. One which directly affects British commercial interests generally is the law passed a few days ago to protect Roumanian debtors from their foreign creditors by compelling the latter in countries whose currency has a high value in relation to the leu to conform to similar arrangements for a prolongation of credit to those signed by certain groups of British creditors in London and Manchester. The French and Italian debtors had held out firmly against the terms of these agreements, and insisted on individual settlements, but the May number of the Bulletin of the French Commercial Office in Bucharest, in publishing a notice of the passing of this law, makes no comment upon it whatever. The law, as it stands, is very favourable to the Roumanian debtors, and provides for payments in instalments spread over a minimum period of twelve years and a maximum of twenty years.

The Government had previously passed a law suspending for three months all judgments for executions against Roumanian debtors which have been obtained by foreign creditors at the Roumanian courts. Now, of course, execution orders can no longer be granted against any debtor who claims the protection of this law unless he becomes bankrupt or fails to pay his instalments on the due dates.

The Reshitza Company.

Another important commercial measure was the Roumanisation of the Reshitza Company, which is one of the largest engineering works in Eastern Europe, and formerly belonged to the Austro-Hungarian Railways. In February of this year a general meeting of the company was held, at which it was decided to increase the capital by a very considerable sum. This decision was submitted to the Council of Ministers for approval, and their consent was given in the beginning of April, provided certain conditions were complied with. These included the stipulation that the new issue of shares should be nominal shares, and that the present bearer shares should be converted to nominal shares and duly stamped before the new issue is made. Subscriptions to the new issue are to be confined to Roumanians until the capital sum in Roumanian hands has reached 60 per cent. of the total capital, and this proportion is to be maintained in future. Subscribers have been called upon to present their shares for stamping at the Reshitza office in Bucharest.

An Unpopular Bill.

A further example of the Government policy of controlling as far as possible all the trade and industry in the country is provided by a Bill which was laid before the Parliament last week, and which was published in draft form in the official Monitor. Its object is claimed to be the suppression of "profiteering" and the reduction of prices for food and other necessities. According to this Bill, every joint stock or limited company must admit to its board of directors a delegate appointed by the Government, and paid by the company. Committees are to be formed in each district (composed of the Prefect, the Mayor of the chief town of the district, a merchant nominated by the Chamber of Commerce, and a representative of the consumers nominated by the Prefect) whose duty it will be to fix maximum prices for all necessary articles of food, such as bread, flour, milk, etc. This bill further limits profits to a maximum of 20 per cent. to the wholesaler and 30 per cent. to the retailer. All prices must be listed or goods labelled, and very severe penalties are imposed for infringements of the law.

It will easily be seen what scope for abuses of all kinds such an arbitrary measure as this would open up on all sides, and, indeed, no sooner was the draft published than a storm of protest was raised against it all over the country. Meetings were held in all the larger towns, and formal protests were sent to the Government by many of the Chambers of Commerce. Some of these bodies went so far as to declare their intention of ceasing their activities altogether if a Bill so paralysing to trade and industry were allowed to pass the Chamber. In many places resolutions were passed at mass meetings of business men in favour of the freedom of internal trade from Government control. As the aim of the Government avowedly is to keep down prices of necessary articles of food, of which figures were given in last month's letter, this law undoubtedly has a certain measure of popularity with a small section of the population, who are neither sellers nor manufacturers, but on the whole the irritation against Government interference with the free play of the law of supply and demand seems to be becoming more and more general.

Results of Food Control.

The first result of the application of a maximum price to any article of food is that the said article immediately disappears from the market altogether. It gradually reappears, usually in an adulterated form, and the pure article, if procurable at all, can only be had by some backstair method at a much higher price, as the risk of the seller has to be paid for. Milk and cheese are examples of this; they are sold at fixed minimum prices. Eggs have also a fixed price, and they cannot be adulterated, but they can be sold in an unfit condition, and this is what happens. Egg and vegetable hawkers, with their broad baskets slung on poles over their shoulders, are a feature of the morning life of the streets. They usually make regular rounds in certain districts, but if one of them has disposed of a quantity of bad eggs to an old client he just changes his district for a time, or grows a beard, till he may hope not to be recognised.

OIL NOTES AND NEWS.

Roumania's Oil Policy.

The new Roumanian oil regulations, particulars of which were forthcoming last week, will be very widely welcomed as indicating something approaching an entire change of policy in regard to the control of the country's industries. Roumania, as has often been emphasised in these columns, is so situated in respect of natural resources that she should have been able to recover from the effects of the war with comparative rapidity. The present quotation of the leu is an index of the use she has made of her resources. It has depreciated more than any of the Balkan exchanges, and one of the reasons for this is to be found in the innumerable restrictions imposed by the authorities on external and internal trade. Roumania since the Armistice, in short, has been suffering from a wrong policy. The authorities have been actuated by the belief that control would remedy the economic difficulties, whereas it actually intensified them. The oil industry, which should have been the main strength of Roumania, has been hampered in every direction by regulations and restrictions, which, whatever other purposes they have served, have certainly effectually hindered the development of the oilfields. The new regulations, representing as they do a move in the opposite direction, are therefore of great significance. The oil companies are now permitted to make considerable increases in the internal prices of all oil products, while the quotas allowed for export are also increased. The increase in prices authorised ranges from 54 per cent. as regards fuel oil to 100 per cent. in the case of kerosene, while as regards export the increases permitted vary from 5 per cent. for motorine to 15 per cent. for kerosene. It should be noted in connection with these changes that Sir Edward Manville, M.P., chairman of the Phoenix Oil and Transport Company, Ltd., has recently visited Roumania, and, it is understood, brought the condition of the industry before the attention of the authorities during his visit, and it would probably not be going too far to connect his protest with the subsequent modifications in the regulations. To say that what has been done will give complete satisfaction would, of course, be absurd. The desired goal is complete freedom for the industry, but the present measure constitutes a most desirable contribution to that end, and will, beyond question, have a very marked effect on the development of the industry.

Burmah Oil Company.

As usual, the annual general meeting of the Burmah Oil Company was notable for a very interesting speech by Sir John Cargill, the chairman. Dealing with the past year, the result of which confirmed anticipations, he pointed out that the improvement in the company's results had been accomplished mainly through the increased scale of operations, lower taxation and charges, and increased income from outside investments. "The volume both of crude oil produced and refined and of products marketed," he said, "constituted records in the history of the company, and important economies both in the fields—partly due to the greater utilisation of gas and partly to the electrification of the Yenangyoung area—and in the refineries were effected by reductions in the consumption of fuel oil." As regards the current year's prospects, Sir John pointed out that there would be further relief from United Kingdom taxation, while he anticipates further economies from the fields' electrification and the partial reconstruction of and improvements in the refineries. "These," he added, "are the known or confidently anticipated factors. Among the incalculable ones are the possible world-market effects of the considerable over-production of petroleum in America, while political and economic conditions on the Continent continue obscure and unsettled. So far as we are concerned, however, these should be confined mainly to the comparatively small value of our surplus petrol and to our wax production." Hopes are entertained that the ground lost in the two strikes will be recovered before the end of the year, and Sir John's conclusion is that the current year will not be materially different from the past.

FOREIGN EXCHANGES.

June 19.

It has been a week of extreme fluctuations. The outstanding feature has been the headlong decline of the German mark, which has reached 740,000. French francs, Belgian francs, and Italian lire are all weaker. In the Near Eastern exchanges Greek drachmae have firmed up to 139.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Tone Rather Unsettled.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended June 14:—

The general inquiry has again been good, but, owing to the fluctuations in the futures markets, sentiment has been unsettled, and the amount of actual business resulting has shown a considerable falling off from last week's total. This week has been a remarkable one, inasmuch as the current month Egyptian has been quoted at 50 points under the current month American, and fully good fair Sakellaridis on the spot is actually quoted at 78 points below fully middling American. One obvious result of this abnormal situation has been that the attention of American spinners has been directed (more, perhaps, than ever before) towards the possibilities of Egyptian cotton, particularly Upper Egyptian, which has already commenced to feel the effect, both here and in Egypt. Fully good fair uppers are quoted here to-day at 16½d., but we doubt if any quantity (say more than 200 bales in a line) can be purchased at under 16½d. To-day's price of fully good fair Sakellaridis is quoted at 16.50d., which fairly represents the market, and these figures speak for themselves. Should the present situation with regard to the price of American cotton on the spot continue (and we see no signs of any modification at the moment), there is every likelihood of upper values being forced considerably higher. Sakellaridis, of course, is another proposition, as there the long staple acts rather against it than in its favour, from the point of view of a spinner of American cotton. Nevertheless, the whole tendency of the trade for the past two years has been, first and foremost, to buy in the cheapest market, and it looks as if Sakellaridis, "the best spinning cotton in the world," as it has been called, was fast qualifying for that position. In other sections the demand for low cottons, 10d.-12d., continues active, but results this week have been only meagre. Sakellaridis, 13d.-15d., has been another popular range, and rather more business has taken place in this description. A fair amount of attention has been paid to brown cotton and to the Sudan varieties, but here again buying has been held in check by the uncertainty of prices. Here and there an inquiry for extra fine Sakellaridis has been met with. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending 8th inst. were returned as 12,163 bales. Total sales, 3,600 bales (includes 390 Sudan). Quotations are raised 10 points all round, with the exception of extra fine Sakellaridis, which remains unchanged.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

A Disappointing Week.

The Commercial Company of Egypt in their report for the week ended June 8 state:—

Since our last report the futures market has been rather weak, and despite the substantial advance in New York Sakels close lower, whilst Uppers show only a negligible advance. The week has been rather disappointing: neither the strength of the American market nor the better demand from abroad have had any influence on our market. As a result of the small supply of Uppers there seems to be a sort of squeeze of the June position; this delivery is now quoted at only 1¼ dollars below July Sakellarides, the smallest difference of the season. Ashmouni new crop is now about 2 dollars cheaper than old crop. Prices of Sakellarides cotton again show very little difference from those of American if one takes into consideration the appreciation in the value of the dollar. Considerable purchases for commercial account have failed to produce any effect on our market, and prices have been consistently forced down by large speculative sales. We fail to understand the motives which have prompted speculators to take up such an attitude for, on the position as it is, one would expect them to adopt the reverse policy; as a result of the large consumption of Egyptian cotton the statistical position becomes daily stronger, and it is difficult to find justification for the actual level of prices with spot Middling in New York standing at 29.05 cents. This week's receipts are only 5,764 krs. Stocks now stand at 1,491,886 krs., against 1,544,006 krs. a week ago and 1,926,073 krs. a year ago.

Spot.—The Minet-el-Bassal market has been moderately active this week, and sales amount to about 5,600 bales, of which we estimate 4,000 bales Sakellaridis, 1,600 bales Uppers, and a few bales of White and Brown. Demand from abroad is slightly better than last week, but it is difficult to buy at spinners' prices.

Sakellarides.—All styles have been dealt in, the bulk of the business being in medium and low grades. Prices are without much change except for Fair, which is rather dearer than last week.

Uppers.—Business has been done in all grades. Prices of spot against contracts are without much change except Fair, which has eased a little.

Brown and White.—Are neglected and only a few bales have changed hands. Spot prices against Contracts are generally without change.

Crop, 1923.—News from the interior on the new crop is satisfactory. Climatic conditions are favourable to the development of the young plant, and the water supply is everywhere sufficient.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Unsettled Conditions.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended June 16 states:—

During the past week the fluctuations in raw cotton have put the market into a state of uncertainty which has been extremely detrimental to trade, and the hopes formed of increased business have failed to materialise. Whilst these unsettled conditions remain it is unlikely that any improvement in trade can take place.

Yarn.—There is no satisfactory movement to report in this market, and, particularly as regards yarns spun from American cotton, the turnover has been extremely small. The Levant has continued to place modest orders for special varieties, to which attention was called last week, but most of the offers from other markets have been at rates which were unacceptable. Shipments during the month of May amounted to 12,574,500 lb., against 10,895,400 lb. in the previous month and 20,767,300 lb. in May last year.

Cloth.—This section of the market remains in the listless state so often reported recently, and, although the figures now available of the shipments made during last month are much better than anticipated, they are still much below the production capacity of the mills; moreover, they represent to a considerable extent, in all probability, orders which were placed in the earlier part of the year, when India was operating more freely than at present. Egypt and the Levant pick up occasional stock lots at cheap prices, but other overseas markets show no disposition to operate whilst the unsettled conditions above reported continue. The Home trade remains practically lifeless, and operations are described as retail in character. Shipments of cloth last month amounted to 409,962,600 square yards, as compared with 316,278,700 square yards in April and 341,424,800 square yards in May last year.

Raw Cotton.—As above reported, fluctuations have been wide, the early part of the week witnessing a rise of 80 points in "spot," followed by a reaction towards the end of the week. In "futures" the margin between near and distant months has increased. It is interesting to note that Egyptian "spot" cotton is now quoted at a lower price than American. Closing prices are as follows:—American fully middling, 16.76; Egyptian fully good fair, 16.10.

The Rohilkunī and Kumaon Railway Co. has declared an interim dividend of 4 per cent., together with a bonus of 1 per cent., on the ordinary stock, payable, less tax, on July 23.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

Bucharest, May 31.

Owing to the very late season, no figures have yet been published of the spring sowings this year. The figures of autumn sowings in 1922 were considerably lower than those of the two preceding years, but it is still much too early to make any kind of prediction of the probable crops for this year. Hopes are always high at this season of the year that large exports of grain will be possible, as this is the most important source of the country's wealth. The only other agricultural products which come into consideration as far as the export market is concerned are apples, dried prunes, and walnuts (considerable quantities of prunes and walnuts were exported to America last year), but the severe storms of wind and hail which have visited the country periodically for the last six weeks have completely destroyed the tree-fruit crops in many districts.

SUDAN PRODUCE.

The following extracts are taken from the report of the Central Economic Board of the Sudan Government for April:—

Gum.

The exports of gum during April were as follows:—Via Port Sudan 2,596,292 kilos of hashab of the value of £E123,780, and 317,780 kilos of talh of the value of £E5,773; and via Halfa 2,553 kilos of hashab of the value of £E128.

Fung Province.—430 tons of gum hashab and 182 tons of talh were exported from Sennar River Siding during February, and 155 tons of hashab and 221 tons of talh during March.

Kordofan Province.—23,461 kantars of gum were sold in El-Obeid market during the month of April, as against 13,416 kantars during the same month last year. The average price was £E1.480 per kantar. The arrivals at El-Obeid from Nahud were 17,361 kantars, as against 8,253 kantars last year. The amount sold at Nahud during the month was 10,494 kantars, as against 8,613 last year, the average price being £E1.210 per kantar. 4,596 kantars were sold at Um Ruaba at an average price of £E1.460 per kantar, as against 3,381 kantars during April last year. At Rahad 2,100 kantars were sold at prices ranging from £E1.450 to £E1.550, as against 1,232 kantars during April last year.

Upper Nile Province.—641 kantars of gum were exported from Renk during March and 890 kantars during April.

Cotton.

Kassala Province.—The first cotton market was held on March 7, and up to the end of March over 1,587 kantars have been weighed in. Of this, 1,125 were first-class, a great advance on the previous year. At Wad-Sharifai, remarkable yields up to 1,500 rotls per feddan have already been picked. The ginnery has been working a seven-hour day, and has dealt with an average of 244 kantars of seed cotton daily, with an output of about 40 bales of lint. The ginning percentage of the first three markets was 30.45.

Blue Nile Province.—March: 1,000 kantars of American rain or gerf cotton have been sold up to date to the Sudan Plantations Syndicate, as against 120 last year. The cotton on the Research Farm has been particularly good. This is owing to the comparative absence of thrips. It is stated that this is due partly to the clearing of the fallow land, partly to careful watering, and partly to the wind screens grown.

Berber Province—Gendittu Pumping-Station Report—March: Cotton delivered to store amounts to 1,520 kantars of 315 rotls (unginned), and picking will continue until the end of April. The late cotton suffered considerably from the combined attacks of white fly, assal and boll worm. Mikeilab Pumping-Station Report—March: The yield of cotton has dropped this month, as the new bolls have not yet opened. 861 kantars of 315 rotls of cotton have been received into store up to the end of March.

Dongola Province.—Ghaba Pumping-Station Report.—March: Cotton has yielded up to the end of March 1,131 kantars of 315 rotls, an average yield of 3.23 kantars per feddan. A small quantity has still to be brought in before the end of the season, and the ultimate yield will be about 3½ kantars per feddan. Gurier Pumping-Station Report—March: Gurier and Kanesa have averaged from 3½ to 4 kantars per feddan. Total collected to end of March 754 kantars of 315 rotls. The average yield is about 2½ kantars per feddan.

Red Sea Province.—Tokar: Conditions have greatly improved, and a steady supply of cotton has been coming in as a result. By about April 10 the damp cloudy weather gave place to bright sun which helped bolls to open. It was feared at one time that "assal," which had made its appearance early in the month, was going to spread, but so far attacks have been quite isolated, and very little damage has resulted. The more detailed classification referred to in last month's report, after a short trial, was discontinued, as it was found that the grade above ordinary first-class cotton so obtained was not sufficient to warrant being sold separately. It will, however, be tried earlier in the season next year. Up to date 44,192 kantars of 100 rotls (unginned) have passed through the market. During the last week the cotton has shown a distinct falling off in quality, and a fall in price is anticipated.

YUGOSLAV HARVEST PROSPECTS.

The following report has been received in the Department of Overseas Trade from the Commercial Secretary at Belgrade:—

While the usual pessimistic reports as to the condition of the growing crops and the harvest prospects, spread by the peasant farmers, have been current, the actual state of affairs, according to the Press, as well as from my personal observations, is more than usually satisfactory.

After the abundant rains of April the winter-sown crops made great progress. The wheat is very forward, and doing very well, excepting in certain parts of Croatia. The vines have come well through the winter, and it is said that the vintage is likely to be even more plentiful than that of last year. Flax, hemp, and other "industrial" plants are also in excellent condition, having benefited from the rains. The pastures are in good condition, as are also the fruit trees.

The cattle throughout the kingdom is healthy, excepting in parts of Croatia and Bosnia, where epizootic disease has made its appearance, and in Southern Serbia, where the "Golubatz" fly has caused some losses among the cattle and sheep. Energetic measures have been taken against these pests. More rain is needed now in order to maintain progress; but, as far as it is possible to judge, the 1923 harvest is likely to be exceptionally good and to leave a large exportable surplus.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS

The following extracts are taken from recent reports received by the Imperial Ottoman Bank:—

Jaffa.

The report for May states:—

The market is relatively quiet, with a tendency to fall as regards barley and wheat as a result of the approach of the new crops, which are reported to be good, and better than the previous year.

Business generally is very quiet, imports of commodities of all kinds being limited to the minimum.

Adana, April 30.

The following extracts are taken from the report for April:—

Weather and Crops.

Adana.—The weather being quite settled again, the farmer is now actively engaged in the sowing of cotton seed, which was delayed by the heavy rain that fell in February and during the first half of March. The sowing will be finished towards the 20th of next month. As a large area is being sown, it is hoped that the cotton crop for this year will be a good one. The cereal crop, which will commence to appear towards the end of May, is expected to give a satisfactory yield.

Mersina.—The sowings of cotton seed are continuing, and there are indications that they will this year attain 4,000 dunums as against 2,500 last year.

Tarsus.—Owing to the rains which fell during the first two weeks of the month under review, the cotton sowings will be late.

Djihan.—The state of the crop continues to be satisfactory. It is estimated that up to the present about 7,000 dunums have been sown with cotton.

The Economic Situation.

Adana.—The market continues quiet. There has been no business worthy of mention during the month under review. Some purchases and sales of a purely local character and of little importance have taken place. We may add, however, that during this month 120 bales of cotton have been exported. Imported articles are being disposed of with difficulty owing to the monetary crisis which still continues. Farmers, who have been very badly hit by the crisis, are only buying agricultural machinery which they need for the resumption of the grain harvest on credit.

Wheat, now quoted at P.15 the oke, sells, for despatch two months hence, at only P.7, and cotton at P.230/240 the batman as against the present price of about P.400.

Djihan.—The purchase of wheat for the military authorities has continued during this month, making the market a little more lively. A certain movement has also been caused on the market by the purchase of leaf tobacco by merchants from Constantinople.

THE GREEK BUDGET.

Reuter's Agency has received the following message from a semi-official Greek source in Athens:—The Budget statement for the financial year 1923-24, which has been passed by the Cabinet and published in the Official Gazette, estimates the ordinary and extraordinary revenue at 3,941,197,501 drachmæ and the ordinary expenditure at 2,961,140,901 drachmæ. The extraordinary expenditure is placed at 3,662,861,116 drachmæ. There remains a total deficit of 2,682,804,516 drachmæ. In a statement the Minister of Finance says that this is the first time that the ordinary revenue has covered not only the ordinary expenditure, but also a great part of the extraordinary payments. These latter are expected to decrease considerably after the conclusion of peace and demobilisation.

The Indian Market.

Sir John Cargill's Speech.

The annual general meeting of the Burmah Oil Company, Ltd., was held on June 12 in the Merchants' Hall, Glasgow.

Sir John T. Cargill, Bt. (the chairman of the company), presided.

The Secretary (Mr. F. G. Holdsworth, F.C.I.S.) having read the auditors' report,

The Chairman said:—Ladies and Gentlemen,—I was able last year, with some confidence, to tell you that on balance prospects for 1922 were not unfavourable, and the accounts now in your hands will, I venture to think, be accepted generally as very satisfactory.

The result closely confirms our anticipations. Further falls in petrol prices in the markets of the world took place shortly after I addressed you, but the new contracts referred to protected us against the full effect of these. As to other products, prices of paraffin wax remained at a very low level, and while our prices in India for kerosene and petrol—which for a long time past we had kept below the level of the world's market prices for both these products—were unchanged, the much lower level of values for lubricants and jute batching oils there continued throughout the year.

Favourable Factors.

The improvement in our results therefore has been accomplished mainly through the increased scale of our operations, lower taxation and charges, and increased income from outside investments. The volume both of crude oil produced and refined and of products marketed constituted records in the history of the company, and important economies both in the fields—partly due to the greater utilisation of gas and partly to the electrification of the Yenangyoung area—and in the refineries were effected by reductions in the consumption of fuel oil.

So much for the factors responsible for the results before you. I now come to a closer examination of the balance-sheet and profit and loss account.

You will have seen from the accounts that we have departed from our previous practice of showing our expenditure on drilling and deepening, etc., as part of our profits, and then writing down our fields block account by the same amount. This method was open to the suggestion that the figure representing this might be considered as profit—to some extent at any rate available for reserves or distribution as might be decided from time to time. This, as you are well aware from my previous speeches, is not our view of the position. The charging of such expenditure in the year in which it is incurred is, in our opinion, essential. It is the price we have to pay to maintain our production, and is actually as much a part of the cost as is the expenditure on pumping and producing generally.

The Dividend.

The profit available, after charging income and corporation profits taxes, contribution to employees' provident fund, directors' fees, etc., writing off £50,000 (being one-third of the cost of issue of the £3,000,000 8 per cent. preference shares), paying the dividends on 6 per cent. and 8 per cent. preference shares for the year, and the interim dividend of 2s. per share, free of tax, on the ordinary shares, and placing £200,000 in general reserve and £20,000 to insurance reserve, amounts to £1,365,279 5s. 3d. Out of this the board recommends the payment of a final dividend on the ordinary shares of 4s. per share, free of tax, on June 22, absorbing £1,030,216 8s., and leaving £335,062 17s. 3d. to be carried forward subject to corporation profits tax, estimated at £145,000.

The final dividend on the Ordinary shares now recommended makes the total for the year 30 per cent., free of tax, or the same as last year.

Heavy Taxation.

There are one or two further items in the accounts, or connected with them, to which special reference might be made. In addition to United Kingdom taxation in the shape of income and corporation profits taxes, amounting to some £539,000, we shall have paid, in India and Burma, in the form of income and super-tax, royalties, Excise and Customs duties, etc., a sum of, roundly speaking, £1,500,000. This latter figure represents some £2 10s. per ton on the volume of our products marketed in India. I am not for a moment suggesting that Government can be carried on without taxation. My point is that the extent of indirect taxation and its incidence, in the selling prices of commodities, are all too easily overlooked, both by consumers and by Governments themselves. In this country we are happily continuing our progress towards retrenchment and lower taxation. The provisions in this year's Budget for reductions in income and corporation profits taxes are naturally welcome, although one cannot avoid voicing the almost universal regret that the Chancellor did not completely remove the corporation profits tax. In India, too, thanks to the Inchcape Committee, welcome steps have now been taken in the direction of reducing costs of administration and the securing of a balanced Budget.

You will notice the addition of £41,870 7s. 8d. to the fields block account. This represents purely capital expenditure on new buildings, etc., and in view of the low figure at which this account stands its special depreciation is not considered necessary at present.

Fields Electrification Scheme.

Fields electrification account has been increased during the year by £162,948 15s. 3d. to £835,193 5s. We hope the whole of this scheme will be completed by December 31 next. Initial supplies of energy from the power station were being made when I last addressed you. You will now be gratified to learn that the application to drilling as well as pumping was smoothly and successfully made from the start. Employees both of Western and Eastern origin took to this new motive power and its operation on the wells as if they had never known any other, and the hopes of increased efficiency and speed, and of reduced costs of operating through the more economical use of fuel, and otherwise, which were estimated when the scheme was decided upon, promise to be fully realised. Our consulting engineer on the work, Mr. McCarthy Jones, has been for many years past a keen advocate and a convinced believer in its advantages and economies, and to him, to suppliers of plant, to our electrification manager and his staff in Burma, and to our own engineering staff in London great credit is due for making this development the success which is now assured.

Your board considers the depreciation provided for refineries, pipelines, tankers, and installations ample. The addition of £150,499 1s. 7d. to the tankers and tank installation account is in the main represented by the final payments on account of our new 10,000-ton tanker the "Badar-pur." This tanker has now been running in the East for very nearly a year, and has given every satisfaction. The usual £20,000 has been added to insurance reserve, bringing this up to £400,000, and the fire and marine insurance account, which now stands at £518,685 19s. 10d., has been increased by £81,923 10s. 2d., this being the amount of premium on risks carried internally.

Interest and dividend account has yielded some £75,000 more than last year.

Employees' provident fund and profit sharing scheme receives £121,455 9s. 11d., as compared with £108,781 3s. 5d. in 1921. Both this fund and the subsidiary provident fund for lower-paid and more casual labour continue to be much appreciated and are increasingly taken advantage of by employees.

Productive Areas.

So far our efforts and our expenditure to extend materially the known productive areas of the Burma oilfields have unfortunately continued abortive. But, as I have said on previous occasions, wherever, either in Burma or in India, there is reasonably encouraging geological evidence, tests must continue to be made, if for no other reason than the protection of our position in India. These tests are never undertaken except after the most careful examination and on the best geological advice. We must therefore face a continuance of this expenditure hoping that we may yet meet with some success to compensate for the disappointments to date.

Production from our Lower Assam field declined still further despite vigorous efforts to maintain and increase it. So far we have not succeeded in proving any extension of the productive area. In the Punjab our efforts have also so far not succeeded either in proving oil or definitely that it does not exist in our concessions, and drilling is being continued.

As regards our interests in the Assam Oil Company, Ltd., I was able to tell the shareholders of that company at its recent annual meeting that there has already been a distinct improvement in crude oil production which it is hoped still further to add to during the current year.

You may think that I have not painted too bright a picture of the producing side of our business. As regards the potentialities of extensions of the known productive areas this is so. Despite these disappointments I can, however, confidently assure you that the company's proved fields continue to show such vitality that we have no doubt of their ability not only to stand the increased withdrawals from them, but that they will be capable of doing so for very many years to come.

Labour Troubles.

Before leaving our fields, I would like to refer briefly to the labour troubles which we and the other producing companies in Burma have recently been experiencing, commencing with the withdrawal of all Burmese workers for quite a month in the first instance. It was a "lightning" strike without ostensible excuse or warning, and without prior attempt to state grievances to the companies or to have them discussed and remedied. The fact of the matter is that the great majority of the Burmese labour went out without knowing what grievances they had. And as is almost invariably the case with strikes in which native labour is involved, intimidation was carried out on an extensive and intensive scale, and a large number of the workers who were anxious to remain at work—or to return to work—were prevented from doing so. They were brought out by the professional agitation of outsiders, and grievances were not discovered or formulated until they were out. Clearly we could not stand that sort of thing, and all companies decided that there would be no discussion until work was resumed, making it clear that, while there would be no victimisation, there would be no strike pay.

Quite voluntarily—in steady pursuance of our regular policy, and without being asked by the men, and without their knowledge—the companies had been already considering advancing rates of pay for certain classes of labour on the wells which had recently been entrusted with more responsible operations. It has been our hope and our policy more and more to educate Eastern labour to greater technical knowledge and responsibility in all parts of our business and to recognise efficiency in every case by improved status and remuneration. We are constantly on the watch to guard against the existence of any real grievances or unfair treatment. I merely mention this because we have—I think not without reason—hitherto had the reputation of being among the best employers in the East.

Resumption Before Discussion.

Fortunately our Indian native labour largely stood loyally by us, and with their assistance and the wholehearted and enthusiastic day-and-night co-operation of our British and American staff—to all of whom the thanks of the company are due—we succeeded in maintaining production throughout the strike at something like two-thirds of normal. The result was that the men went back to work on our terms of "resumption before discussion." At the subsequent discussion we brought forward our proposals for increased remuneration and status to those now doing more responsible work, and generally undertook the removal of minor grievances within our control and accepted by us as legitimate. In the end the companies and the men's leaders came to agreement on all points, but unfortunately, owing to the action of agitators and to intimidation, the strike was later resumed, and is still being carried on in a sporadic and half-hearted fashion. The lesson to the men clearly is—ventilation and discussion before "downing tools." Many of them have lost fully two months' wages and gained no more than prior discussion would have yielded—in fact, much of what they gained was about to go to them in any case without even discussion.

Here also I might refer to the strike which took place in the autumn of last year in our refineries. Again the men went, or rather were "agitated," out without knowing what grievances they had or what they lacked or wanted. We were satisfied that they had no cause to complain either of wages or conditions generally, and made it clear that we would move on neither. They soon returned to their employment on the old terms, and have been working steadily and contentedly ever since.

As mentioned in the report, electrically driven pumps have been added to Nyoungla pipe line pump station with satisfactory results, and the pipe line worked steadily and successfully throughout the year.

Refinery Reconstruction Scheme.

I have already referred to our record volume of crude oil dealt with by the refineries, where operations—apart from the strike just mentioned—were carried on steadily and with the energy and thoroughness for which we never look in vain to the manager and staff there. Besides the routine work of meeting our requirements of products promptly and satisfactorily, our works manager, Mr. Allan, and superintending engineer, Mr. Moore, have done much original thinking and proving out of new methods of refining, and valuable work in the way of the practical application of these and of other improvements to the plant and processes in connection with the refinery reconstruction scheme. Good progress has already been made with this scheme, and it is now in a state where pretty well uninterrupted progress towards completion should be possible. Already we are beginning to secure some of the fuel economies aimed at, and these and other advantages will gradually increase with the completion of the scheme—we hope towards the end of next year.

In my earlier remarks the marketing side of our business in the period was briefly reviewed. Again the volume of our products created a record in our history, and but for our excess petrol and wax production over India's requirements the market there readily absorbed the whole of them. Kerosene, of course, is by far the largest part of our production, and it is very gratifying to record the continued expansion of the Indian market for this product.

Interests in Trinidad.

The prospects of our interests in Trinidad are still obscure. Despite considerable expenditure and the assistance of the best technical experience and advice, the original expectations have not been realised. As you are aware, members of this board take an active part in the administration of the Trinidad company, and nothing within the financial resources available has been left undone to improve production, but the volume and stability of production necessary to put the undertaking on a dividend-paying basis are still denied to it.

As to our investment in the Anglo-Persian Oil Company, Ltd., the progress and prospects of that company were fully reviewed by its chairman at the company's last annual meeting.

Such fears as were felt as to the successful rolling of black plate and production of tinplates in such a country as India have been completely dispelled by the technical success secured by the Tinplate Company of India, Ltd., at Golmuri, in which we have a large interest, and they are already delivering to us a portion of our tinplate requirements fully up to the quality and finish of our supplies from other sources.

Current Year's Prospects.

As to the prospects of the current year, we shall have some further relief from United Kingdom taxation in the lower income-tax and the reduced corporation profits tax. There should also be further economies from the fields electrification and the partial reconstruction of and improvements in the refineries. These are the known or confidently anticipated favourable factors. Among the incalculable ones are the possible world market effects of the considerable over-production of petroleum in America, while political and economic conditions on the Continent continue obscure and unsettled. So far as we are concerned, however, these should be confined mainly to the comparatively small volume of our surplus petrol and to our wax production, and it is more than doubtful whether either of these products could, under to-day's producing costs, be offered materially below ruling prices without having a very serious reaction on the volume of future production. Naturally we have lost ground as a result of the two strikes I have referred to, but we have reasonable hopes of largely recovering it before the end of the year, so that, subject to the qualifications I have felt it necessary to make, we should finish the current year not materially differently from the last.

India's New Constitution.

You will, I know, wish me to convey to all our staff and employees engaged in the fields, refineries, tankers, and administration and marketing in Burma, India, and on this side, whether they be of the West or the East, your high appreciation of the results of their labours during the past year. Apart from the two incidents I have referred to, we have been well, loyally, and ably served. And I would also like to express our appreciation of the unfailing courtesy, helpfulness, and advice which the Governments of India and Burma, and of the other provinces of India in which we operate, display through their officials on all questions affecting us. We are fully alive to the increased labours and difficulties thrown upon them by the initiation of self-government following upon the Reform Acts, and through the active participation of members of our staff in the new Councils, and in other ways, we are doing all we can to assist India in successfully shouldering its new responsibilities. We consider that it is the duty and privilege of those conducting important commercial undertakings in India to assist in laying on a sound basis the foundations of India's new Constitution. In this connection, in the recent list of Birthday Honours, his Majesty was graciously pleased to confer on the Hon. Mr. Adam B. Ritchie—senior partner in Rangoon of Messrs. Finlay, Fleming and Co., the managing agents in Burma of your company—a knighthood in recognition of his services to Burma and India. As a member of the Legislative Council of Burma and Chairman of the Burma Chamber of Commerce, Sir Adam has not only rendered services of the greatest value to the province, but has also sacrificed a great deal of his own time which he would otherwise have had for much-needed rest and relaxation, and I am sure you will desire to be associated in the congratulations on this well-deserved honour which we have already conveyed to him from the officials and staffs of the company on this side.

Company's Kerosene Oil Policy.

I am afraid I must ask you for some further indulgence in time. This is really the company's only platform from which to address its constituents—its consumers—and to meet attacks or adverse propaganda.

As I think most of you are aware, we decided as far back as 1905 that our special responsibilities as indigenous producers to the Indian consumer could best be recognised by the adoption of a policy aiming at relatively cheap supplies of that product most essential to the largest body of Indian consumers which could least afford to pay normal prices for its requirements. That product was kerosene oil. It is almost a necessary of life in India. We therefore decided as far as possible to adjust our selling operations so as to place a large volume of our kerosene production on the Indian market at a price at maximum ordinarily well below world market values. Necessarily the decision was conditional. It was a voluntary one based on cost conditions ruling when it was made and in full realisation that its continuance depended on our circumstances otherwise permitting of it, and particularly on the world market values available for the balance of our products. I have previously told you of the great difficulties we had in maintaining our maximum price policy during the war, for we never had, and have not to-day, the volume of indigenous kerosene necessary to meet India's full requirements, but we managed successfully to overcome these, and finally in 1919 were able to make an arrangement securing for India, if need be, the full difference between her requirements and our supplies, but recognising the right of our indigenous kerosene to the first call on the Indian market. By this means our policy was re-secured, and has thus been maintained unbroken now for over seventeen years.

Without going further back than June, 1919, when this arrangement was made, you—and, I hope, a wider audience—will be interested to learn that on India's kerosene consumption from then until the end of last year the saving which this policy of ours has enabled her to effect in her kerosene bill as compared with kerosene prices in India based on world market values in that period amounts—taking exchange at 1s. 4d. to the rupee, and it was at times during that period much higher than that—to over £22,000,000—of which the Burmah Oil Company's contribution—i.e., the difference between its supplies valued at the average cost in the period of foreign kerosene and the price at which "The Burmah" actually sold its kerosene—was fully £16,000,000.

Advantage to Indian Consumer.

These figures speak for themselves. They show the colossal protection we have given the Indian kerosene consumer and indicate some of the self-sacrifice our policy has involved. I venture to say that the history and effects of this policy of ours are unique in commerce, and in the case of a country which is not self-supporting in the commodity in question it stands out as possibly the solitary example of a consumer not paying for an import duty where one exists.

As I have said this policy of ours aims at the greatest good of the greatest number. It has been of inestimable political and economic advantage to India, but it has always been and must continue to be conditional on our ability to pursue it. Our own costs have enormously expanded. The costs of others—not excepting Government and Port Authorities, etc., in India, which affect our prices before the product reaches the consumer—have advanced or been advanced, but we have maintained our policy. This, however, has been possible only because by the increase and improvement of our operations we have effected relative savings and because we have been able to secure for the rest of our products, at any rate, the values resulting from the operation of the law of supply and demand. If we cannot have that, the maintenance of the policy must be seriously jeopardised.

Petrol Prices in India.

And this brings me to my point. There has recently arisen in India an expensive and intensive campaign by pamphlet, full-page advertisement in the daily Press, cinema, public meeting, the Legislative Assembly and Council against our prices for petrol there. Quite apart from the situation as to kerosene, which I have just described, there is no substantial justification for it. Stripped of the Excise duty and its cost of 6½d. per gallon, our prices in India are below what they are here, and on the average India's supplies from Burma occupy almost as long and as expensive a voyage as do those of this country from America. Even with the Excise duty, they are lower than those ruling in every other country in the East, not excepting countries there much nearer to a source of supply than is India to Burma. The agitation has urged an export duty, arguing that India is subsidising in its petrol exports the foreign consumer. Of course, not a gallon of our petrol or of any other product is exported that India can absorb. Equally, of course, in the circumstances of the petrol market of the world, an export duty on Burma exports would not be paid by the foreign consumer. It would come out of the industry. As far as possible it would have to be recovered in prices of products selling in India. To the extent that this might be impossible it would hamper the development of indigenous production by ourselves and by others, already inadequate over all, to meet India's requirements. And, far from the foreign consumer at present being subsidised, little reflection is necessary to enable one to realise that it is just this foreign outlet for surplus production at such prices as it will yield that makes even present prices in India possible. Fortunately for India and its already altogether inadequate indigenous industry, wiser counsels prevailed, and the proposal to put an export duty on petrol was not accepted by Government. But the agitation continues for lower petrol prices there, either by the withdrawal of the Excise duty or by actual price reductions, or by both. We are not responsible for the former. I have given the position as regards the latter.

Does the motorist in India wish cheaper petrol than he could get elsewhere in the East at the expense of the mass of the poor kerosene consumer, and does Government desire this? I am confident that in both cases the reply would be in the negative, and, as I have said, it has to be one or the other, for our policy of prices lower than the parity of world values cannot at one and the same time be carried to both products without placing the smaller indigenous companies in both India and Burma in a very serious position and prejudicing the already inadequate volume of indigenous production.

Suggestions have even been made in the Assam Provincial Council that concessions should only be granted subject to price limitations. And this in face of the fact that the only company producing and refining there—the Assam Oil Company, Ltd.—has paid no dividend on its ordinary shares for the past two years, and has even had to pass its preference dividend for 1922! And in Burma itself there are, as you well know, companies which are either making no profit at all or are only able to maintain an uncertain and precarious existence, even with petroleum products there and in India at their present prices.

Exploration in India.

Inducements are necessary to exploration for oil in India, and threats of the nature above referred to are bound to be harmful. Capital for such operations will dry up if, as has thus been suggested, restrictions limit the reasonably legitimate rewards of the risks run.

Every gallon of indigenous petroleum is required by India. As it is, she is heavily dependent on foreign imports for kerosene and lubricants and fuel oil, and from the petrol she cannot consume the income received from exports is meantime of the greatest value to the indigenous industry, helping to foster its expansion and—as I have already said—making possible the prices at which it is available in India to-day. In this latter respect the position presents an almost complete analogy with our own coal industry here.

It has never been our policy to attack our producing neighbours, either in Burma or India. As I have already pointed out, and it cannot be too often emphasised, all the indigenous production available, and more, is required to meet consumption in India, and our policy has steered as straight a course as is possible compatible with giving the advantages in price which we do for the product most essential to those in India least able to afford it, while making it reasonably possible for the smaller, struggling, indigenous producers to continue in business.

Let this agitation put the same amount of energy and expense into a campaign to increase petrol consumption in India, for if India, which at present only consumes about half the production of Burma petrol, could absorb the whole, or something like the whole, of that production, that would undoubtedly pave the way to lower prices. And the very fact that not a gallon of foreign petrol has been imported into India for a considerable number of years clearly proves that we have not been charging unreasonable prices for ours.

Report and Accounts.

I now beg to propose: "That the report of the directors and audited statement of accounts, including the balance-sheet and profit and loss account to December 31, 1922, presented to the meeting, be received, approved, and adopted." I shall call on Mr. R. I. Watson to second this motion, and after it is seconded an opportunity will be given to you to ask any question, or make any remarks, that any of you care to make. (Cheers.)

Mr. Robert I. Watson: I have much pleasure in seconding the motion.

There being no questions, the Chairman declared the motion adopted unanimously.

Dividend Resolution.

The Chairman: I now beg to move: "That the dividend on the ordinary shares recommended by the directors of 4s. per share, free of tax, making, with the interim dividend paid in December last, 30 per cent. for the year, be adopted, and that the same be hereby authorised to be paid on June 22, and that the balance of £335,062 17s. 3d., subject to corporation profits tax, estimated at £143,000, be carried forward."

Mr. David Tweedie: I beg to second the motion.

The Chairman: I think we may take it that this is unanimous. (Laughter and "Hear, hear.")

Sir Campbell Finlay: I beg to move: "That Sir John Cargill be re-elected a director of the company." (Cheers.)

Mr. John Henderson: I beg to second Sir John Cargill's re-election. (Cheers.)

The Chairman: I take it this is also unanimously carried. (Cheers.) I would thank you just in a word for the confidence you have placed in me. (Cheers.)

Continuing, the Chairman said: I now beg to move: "That Mr. H. S. Ashton be re-elected a director of the company."

Mr. D. Brodie Macleod: I have much pleasure in seconding the re-election of Mr. Ashton.—This motion was also adopted.

The Chairman: I have much pleasure in moving: "That Mr. R. A. Murray be re-elected a director of the company."

Mr. R. J. Wilkinson: I beg to second the motion.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. John G. Carruthers: I beg to propose the reappointment of Mr. James Herbert Wilson, C.A., as auditor for the current year.

Mr. John Watt: I beg to second the motion.

The motion having been adopted, the Chairman said: That is all the business, and I beg to thank you, ladies and gentlemen, for your attendance.

Vote of Thanks to the Chairman.

Col. D. S. Morton: Before we separate I would like to propose a vote of thanks to our chairman, Sir John Cargill. He has, with his usual lucidity and wealth of detail, given us a most interesting account of the affairs of this company—the working of the company during the past year—and I am sure we all congratulate him heartily on the result obtained. (Cheers.) He has also hinted at the prospects for the present year with, shall I say, his customary Scottish caution. He has every reason, I think, to be extremely proud of the success of this great company, and we shareholders all know how much we owe to his wise administration of its affairs, and we hope and trust that for very many years to come he will continue to guide its affairs and preside at this annual meeting. (Cheers.) I move that we accord him and the directors a very hearty vote of thanks—(cheers)—and I am sure we should also like him to convey our thanks to the staffs at home and in the East. (Hear, hear.)

Sir John Cargill's Reply.

The Chairman: Ladies and Gentlemen,—I must thank you most sincerely for the very cordial way in which you have received the vote of thanks which Colonel Morton has proposed to me in such a kindly way. I feel he has said more than I deserve. I think all of us have moments in our lives that we call "red-letter days," and for the last nineteen years, since I succeeded my late father as chairman of the Burmah Oil Company, I have looked upon the annual meeting of the Burmah Oil Company as the "red-letter day" in my history. (Cheers.) I find myself every year looking forward to it for some time ahead, and thinking what I will say to you, and, after it is over, I find myself looking back upon it with the most pleasurable recollection of the attentive hearing and the very kindly reception you always give me. It has not been my custom to treat you to unduly optimistic speeches and to paint the future in too glowing terms. My idea has always been that I would prefer to give you something in the nature of pleasant surprises—although I have rather come to the conclusion that it is impossible to give Burmah shareholders a pleasant surprise—(laughter)—than to give you anything in the nature of disappointment. I have no doubt that, if I live long enough, some day I may have to give you a disappointment; but I am convinced of this, that when, and if, I do, you will all receive that disappointment in the same resigned, philosophical, and truly Scottish unemotional fashion in which you have received all the good things which it has been my good fortune to hand out to you during the last nineteen years.

Tribute to Management and Staff's.

There is only one other thing I would like to say, and that is this: you have authorised me to convey your thanks to all the staffs of this great business. I, on my part, would like to take this opportunity of publicly conveying to all those associated with me in the management and running of this great and successful business—and, if I might be invidious and mention names, I would like to mention Mr. R. I. Watson, your managing director—(cheers)—and Mr. Gilbert Whigham, whom we have just appointed assistant managing director—(cheers)—I would like to convey to them all my own personal and grateful thanks for their unfailing loyalty not only to the company, but to me personally, and for their magnificent work on behalf of the company, which has made it the great success it is, and which makes my position as chairman of the company one of the greatest pleasure and intense pride, and also, I may add, one nowadays of comparative ease. I thank you again for your very kindly reception of me to-day and for the attentive hearing you have given me, and I would only express the hope that when we meet next year we shall have as pleasant and delightful a meeting as we have had to-day. (Cheers.)

The meeting then terminated.

ANGLO-EGYPTIAN OILFIELDS.

Strong Financial Position.

Review of Exploratory Work.

The twelfth ordinary general meeting of the Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields, Limited, was held at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, London, E.C., on June 15. Sir Reginald Macleod, K.C.B. (chairman of the company) presided.

The secretary (Mr. W. A. Turner, F.C.I.S.) having read the notice convening the meeting,

The Chairman said: The report for 1922 which I now have the honour of asking you to adopt is uneventful, but not, I think, unsatisfactory. The production in 1922 was 169,313 tons, a decrease in net tons—that is, tons after separation of water—as compared with 1921 of 11,918, but this production is fully equal to the average of the last three years. The average weekly production over 1922 was 3,256 tons. The production for the current year up to date shows some decrease, but in the early part of this year it was necessary, while making alterations to the dehydrating plant on the field, to restrict the output from certain of the wet wells. From the more recent figures published weekly, it will be seen that production is now being maintained at about last year's average.

The Dehydration Problem.

I referred last year to the amount of water in a state of emulsification with the crude produced from many of our wells, and informed you that a dehydration plant was in process of erection at the fields. When the plant was first erected and put to work under the charge of the makers' representative, it was found that the peculiar characteristics of the Hurghada emulsion prevented the satisfactory results obtained on other fields from being repeated at Hurghada. Further experiments made by our own staff on the field, however, have now secured results which, although not entirely satisfactory, have very largely done away with the difficulties previously experienced in the refining of this emulsified oil. Our close association with the Royal Dutch-Shell group has enabled us to get the full benefit of the knowledge and experience of their technical staff, and at the present time we have a special engineer on our fields in Egypt with whose assistance we hope to be able to deal in a definite and final way with our troublesome dehydration question.

Reduced Expenditure.

You will see that the working, drilling, and general expenses stand at £202,813, being a reduction of £49,355 from last year. There is also a reduction in the refinery working costs—in which freight from the fields is included—of £94,105. On the other hand, the earnings of the refinery in respect of treatment of imported oil are less by £120,220, leaving the net charge for freight and refining of our Egyptian crude at £98,004, or 11s. 6d. per ton—a by no means extravagant figure.

The charge for licences, leases, and royalties stands at £28,388, as compared with £14,974 in the previous year.

This increase is due to the fact that the Government gave notice in January, 1922, that they would take the royalty to which they were entitled in oil instead of, as previously, in cash. The royalties, therefore, have been calculated on the basis of the average return for crude oil over the year, and the Government's action has, therefore, resulted in a heavier charge being made upon the company's operations.

On the other side of the account, oil proceeds and value of oil stocks show a reduction from £863,039 to £604,325, which is accounted for partly by decrease in production, but much more largely by reduction in selling price. This feature, as probably all are well aware, is not peculiar to Egypt or to the oil industry, indeed, and must be regarded as incidental to all manufacture or production.

The Balance Sheet.

I need not detain you long in reference to the balance-sheet. The profit at our disposal, including the carry forward from last year, is £469,624. The dividend recommended requires £233,500, fully disposing of the amount earned by the year's operations. The carry forward is, in fact, reduced by nearly £4,000, still, however, standing at the reasonable figure of £236,124. Investments stand in the balance-sheet at £475,794, while the amount due from debtors exceeds that due to creditors by £45,000. The company is, therefore, in a strong position to proceed with exploratory work and take advantage of any opportunity of extension that may offer.

Production from New Wells.

As to work on the fields, it is satisfactory to be able to report that all the new wells on the main Hurghada field brought in in 1922 have given production. (Hear, hear.) Of the two exploration wells to the north of the main Hurghada field, one is approaching completion and the indications are favourable. At Gamsah the survey referred to in the 1921 report was practically completed during the year, and the location for a new well has been selected and drilling will shortly commence. As a further result of the year's exploration, work has commenced on a licence previously secured in the Suez Area, and a well is now being drilled. This must, however, be regarded as merely exploratory. The position as to other work so far as results have been obtained is as follows:—

The exploratory drilling on new licences under standard regulations referred to in the 1921 report was not rewarded by success, and the licences at Ras el Ush and Ras Mohammed have been surrendered. At Ras Gharib, the third area referred to, the first well met with unexpected technical difficulties, and had to be abandoned before reaching a sufficient depth. Another well in this area has now been commenced.

Tribute to Staff.

We have again every reason to be grateful to the company's staff, both on the fields and in the refinery. Service such as is required in our business is not without trial and hardship, and I should like the staff to feel that you, as well as the directors, recognise and appreciate their loyalty and devotion to our interests. (Hear, hear.) In a word, I ask you to refer to that paragraph in our report, in reference to the resignation of Lord Eustace Percy. We on the board miss his presence amongst us very greatly. A man of marked ability, great force of character, and exceptional charm of personality, he has been a most valuable as well as a most pleasant colleague, and it has been of great advantage to us to be able to send him to Egypt from time to time for negotiations of importance when that has been necessary. He has now been appointed in the first instance as Secretary of the Board of Education, and since that has been transferred to the Ministry of Health. He has every prospect of a distinguished career, and I feel sure that everyone in this room will, with great cordiality, wish him an honourable and a successful career in the service of his country. (Hear, hear.) I will now move that the report and accounts for the year 1922 be and are hereby approved and adopted.

Mr. Alexander Mackay seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously.

The Dividend.

The Chairman: I now beg to move that a dividend be paid for the year 1922 in accordance with the Articles of Association equal to 12½ per cent. upon the "B" shares, less tax.

This was seconded by Mr. Robert V. Buxton, D.S.O., and carried unanimously.

On the proposition of Mr. H. Morrison, seconded by Mr. Herbert Vere Smith, the auditors, Messrs. Turquand, Youngs, and Co., were reappointed.

A vote of thanks to the chairman and directors was proposed by Mr. Morrison and seconded by Mr. Smith, who said: I will second that with the greatest pleasure, and I think, while we are putting this vote of thanks to the meeting, Mr. Chairman, we should wish on this side of the table entirely to join with you in your expressions of satisfaction with the services of the staff in Egypt—(hear, hear)—as coming from the shareholders as well as the board.

The vote of thanks was carried unanimously.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Lausanne Deadlock.

The Lausanne Conference continues to do little more than mark time in embarrassed contemplation of the deadlock over the three crucial questions of concessions, debt, and evacuation. To lend to the presence of the various delegations in the city the air of a conference still in being discussions have taken place during the past week on minor points; but all interest has been transferred to the Allied capitals, where, it has to be inferred, the decision is being taken as to the final attitude of the three Powers on the subjects of the currency in which Turkey's bondholders are to be paid and of pre-War concessions. With the failure of the negotiations at Angora the Allies wish to embody in the Treaty a declaration of principle in regard to concessions; the Turks, on the other hand, adhere to the fiat of Angora that, unless they receive satisfaction on the questions of debt and evacuation, they will not yield on the subject of the third point. There would be no great difficulty in coming to agreement regarding evacuation if the other obstacles were overcome. In these circumstances it would be thought that some arrangement could be reached which would lighten Turkey's burden in paying her bondholders during the period of a depreciated and fluctuating currency without materially reducing the amount that the bondholders will ultimately receive.

The New Order in Bulgaria.

Now that the alarmist reports regarding the instability of the new régime in Bulgaria have been disproved, foreign interest is mainly centred in the steps taken by the Zankoff Cabinet to avoid the mistakes of the Stambolisky Government, and to introduce a different atmosphere into Bulgarian political life. In this connection, public opinion in the West finds it difficult to understand the order for the arrest of the Agrarian Ministers who dissociated themselves from the extremist section of their party. From the very first moment when M. Stambolisky began to arrest his political opponents he was warned by well-wishers of the country of the suicidal folly of such action. Unless the new Government can produce better ground for perpetuating the policy that contributed more than anything else to M. Stambolisky's downfall, a similar warning may well be addressed to it.

The Political Vendetta.

If the interests of Bulgaria as a whole are to be considered as apart from those of political parties, it is obvious that the policy of any Bulgarian Government should be to represent their opponents as perfectly honourable men, but misguided in political matters. The Agrarian Government set out to prove that all the Bourgeois leaders were rogues or traitors. The Bourgeois parties come into power, and immediately all the Agrarian ex-Ministers are arrested and denounced as dishonest traitors. The outside world, being unable to test the accuracy of either contention, is apt to shrug its shoulders and say that there cannot be much to choose between any of Bulgaria's public men. This is not the opinion of Bulgaria, or of any Balkan State, that it is desirable should be spread abroad; but it is the inevitable consequence of these arrests and indiscriminate denunciations. Until a Government comes into power which is strong enough to put an end, in the interests of the country, to the policy of the political vendetta, the reputation of the State concerned must suffer.

Albania.

Being unable to make any headway against the correct attitude of the Yugoslav Government in regard to events in Bulgaria, the organisation in Belgrade responsible for fabricated intelligence has turned away from the latter country and is devoting itself for the moment to Albania. The revolution that was stated to have broken out among the Albanians is proved, however, to have been merely a collision between Government troops and tribal malcontents. There would seem, therefore, no need to pay much heed to the additional news from Belgrade that there is a movement on foot in Albania to restore to the throne Prince Wilhelm of Wied, the object of the Belgrade organisation being merely to represent neighbouring countries as in a state of chronic unrest. It is quite probable that Albanian inclinations will favour a monarchy; but whether the Mpret of 1914 established such a claim on the affections of the people that they are sighing for his return is another matter. In any case, the Albanians, if they decide to exchange the present régime for a monarch, will be well advised to bespeak the approval of the Allied Powers.

Britain and India.

We find ourselves in entire sympathy with the protest made last week by Sir Thomas Bennett against the indefinite postponement of the debate on the India Office vote. The debate began satisfactorily just a fortnight ago, but it was interrupted by the trivialities of private business, and as yet no date has been announced for its resumption, while the increasing congestion of work makes it doubtful whether the time needed will ever be found. Sir Thomas says justly that such procedure is certain to produce a highly unsatisfactory impression among Indians. It is equally certain to encourage those politicians who are trying to persuade Indians that the sovereignty of Parliament is already atrophied, a doctrine which has already done some harm, and may do much more. The only way to counteract the mischief is for Parliament to keep itself prominently before the Indian public, and to show that it fully realises the responsibility it has undertaken for starting democracy in Asia; to postpone Indian interests to the railway service of Tottenham or Southend is a very bad object lesson to the infant legislatures which it has brought into existence.

The Indian Extremists.

According to the latest news from India, we must now regard the extremists as divided into three groups instead of two. A few months ago they split on the question whether they should try to wreck the Constitution by obstruction in the legislatures or by what is facetiously called non-violence in the constituencies. A compromise, as the word is used in India, left the fissure unhealed, and now another compromise has followed, under which the control of the machinery is vested in a central group, composed of men who have not yet made up their minds between the conflicting policies. At this distance the position looks rather chaotic, but we take it that the drift towards some form of constitutional action is, in fact, gaining strength below the surface. Obstruction in the legislatures would probably be a less evil than the cult of "non-violence" throughout the country, and men are apt to tire of refusing to use the power that is in their hands, so that, on the whole, we should prefer to see a section of the extremists in a position to get practical experience of the working of the Constitution, even if they should start by trying to render it unworkable.

Moslem Politics.

Among Moslem politicians also there are some faint indications of an impending change of attitude, and one or two of their journals are suggesting in effect that they may have backed the wrong horse. Lord Reading, it is argued, has succeeded in deflecting British policy in regard to Turkey; in India the flames of religious hate have leaped up; and it may well be the case that ardent Moslems can hope for more from Englishmen than Hindus. The great obstacle to an open change of front lies, of course, in the fact that the politicians, in their first fury, called in the religious doctors to their aid, and hitherto the fatus or pronouncements of these authorities have not been regarded as susceptible of alteration. On the present occasion, however, we notice a disposition to question their permanent validity, and one journal suggests that religious pronouncements which were issued merely for political objects should be interpreted politically and not religiously, a canon which can be commended without reserve to all who may find themselves in a similar predicament.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

Ascot Week.

With much parade of impotence and great grumbling, the weather pulled itself together for Ascot week, which, indeed, ended in a blaze of sunshine. By all accounts it was an extremely successful meeting; there were any number of popular, and fairly unexpected, wins; and the men, dressed uniformly, duly acted as foil to their women, whose diversity of attire apparently dazzled even the critics. The river yesterday was crowded—as fine an ending to Ascot week, and as different from last year's, as anyone could wish.

The Future of the Parties.

It has been commonly held now for some time that there is in the British Parliament room only for two parties—Labour and another; but no such formal expression had been given to this view as was indulged in the other day by Captain Guest, a very prominent National Liberal. He even went to the length, it seems, of counselling the demise of Liberalism, and its consequent incorporation in Conservatism. Naturally, the speech created a sensation, and the official Independent Liberals jumped upon him without mercy for suggesting that their opinions were of no significance in modern political life. But, actually, this bankruptcy of Liberalism is admitted by many thoughtful men, who, however, are not sufficiently conscious of the merits of Conservatism to yield to it their whole support.

It is, to say the least of it, unintelligent to suppose that any endurable party or section of a party can be founded on mere hostility to Labour, and to envisage Parliament as consisting only of men who are, broadly speaking, pro-Capital or pro-Labour. A House divided on so narrow an issue as this could not with dignity exist. The truth, therefore, seems to lie in the fact that, though the present dogmas and practices of Liberalism are, indeed, of little importance in our present period, there is and must always be scope for the expression of a Liberal attitude, particularly on such questions as foreign or colonial policy. Admittedly the decline of Liberalism is a feature of political life generally—despite its reported revival in France; but though the present generation in Great Britain has seen it decay, I do not think it will see its death. We are not nearly so quick as Continentals to follow realities.

Changing the Cabinet.

It is perhaps not so curious as it might first appear that speculation on the future personnel of Mr. Baldwin's Cabinet should be indulged in by those who are not his first friends. One cannot say "by his enemies," because the Premier has none; but there are in the country all sorts of people who are busily intriguing for the return of the "old gang." Last week these people set about the rumour that, as Lord Reading was resigning, the Duke of Devonshire would become Viceroy of India, and Mr. Austen Chamberlain go to the Colonial Office.

By spreading about such reports, which, by the way, were promptly enough denied, the opponents of the present Government presumably hope to convey the impression that all is not well with the Cabinet; but it is a very cheap kind of game. The trouble is, however, that it does deceive many people, who are quite convinced (are there anywhere more stubborn people than readers of the Evening Standard and the Daily Chronicle?) that Mr. Baldwin is not satisfied with his Cabinet, and can strengthen it only by the inclusion of the "brains" of the Coalition.

The Universities Bill.

The Oxford and Cambridge Bill came on Friday from the Lords to the Commons, and there was a quite interesting debate upon it. In effect, the reforms which the recent Royal Commission recommended have been adopted, and the great point—the autonomy of the Universities—has been gained. It is true that the Government have so far promised only £30,000 to each University, whereas the Commission fixed £100,000 as necessary; but it is improbable that difficulties will be raised over that matter. The Bill, in fact, passed without a division, though we had the usual twaddle about idle undergraduates, the exclusion of the poor man's son, and so on. One of the more amusing passages was that contained in Sir Frederick Banbury's shrewd comment upon Colonel Wedgwood's saying that the object of education was to make a man think for himself. "In that case," said Sir Frederick, "there would be no Labour Party."

Reform of the Universities is not a pleasant phrase, but there is little danger from this Bill that the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge will all be turned into Ruskin colleges. The State appears to have stepped in with delicacy and tact to lend temporary assistance to the Universities, which after a few years will regain their pre-War flavour and security.

The Pageant of Harrow.

We are slowly beginning to recognise that it was a great mistake to allow the pageant to disappear from our national life. Before the War we felt we were superior to such things; and after the War we could endure nothing with a trace of illusion in it. But now, thanks to organisations like the League of Arts, which are determined to bring back colour to the life of our people, and to men who have regained their balance, there are signs of a revival in pageantry. From June 28 to July 5 Harrow is to indulge in a pageant, which will embody ten scenes, covering fifteen centuries, beginning with the Saxons and ending with a procession of eminent Harrovians, including Byron. The whole affair is being elaborately organised, and the help both of historians and of those who believe in tradition and in legend has been engaged. The possession of a famous school and of a very old church is a quite sufficient ground for any town to organise a pageant; but one does wonder what Harrow, which is fast degenerating into a suburb (though maintaining a certain wealth and intelligence), will make of it all. However, the reawakening of a corporate sense has long been insisted upon as an essential of our modern polity, and no better idea could have been chosen to assist it than to spring a pageant on suburbdom.

America and Britain.

I do not claim to understand the complexities of the issue that has arisen between the United States Government and the non-prohibition Governments over liquor in the three-mile area, and therefore can feel no bitterness on the question. From what one hears, there are several in this country who would like to take the bull by the horns: but the "Had this occurred fifteen years ago, sir, the whole British Navy would have wanted to know the reason why" type never gets us very far forward. In any case, the liquor of the Baltic and of the Berengaria has actually been seized, so that something is bound to happen. In the meantime we must allow these crazy fads to run their course. Tennyson, incidentally, is fast becoming popular; one hears that there has been much moaning at the bar when we now put out to sea.

Treatment of Consumption.

More than once the world has been startled by the discovery of a new means to treat consumption; but the cure of the disease still depends on one thing—the individual. But a discovery has been made by Professor George Dreyer, of Oxford, which may well revolutionise the treatment of tuberculosis and other diseases. I do not pretend to grasp his method in any detail; but, briefly, it consists in depriving the microbes of the protective armour that has enabled them to resist digestion. He divides microbes into two classes—"acid-fast" and "non-acid-fast" and it is the first class (to which the tubercular germ belongs) which cannot, as was once confidently hoped, be treated successfully with vaccines. He proposes to abstract the fatty substances of microbes of the first class, to inject them into the body with the certainty that they will be digested, and thus to stimulate the fluids of the body to produce substances fatal to the deadly microbe. This experiment he has performed successfully on animals, and the results gained from trials of the method by physicians in the hospitals are promising. But from the very technicality and extreme expense of the whole affair the ultimate results must be far off.

The L.B.W. Problem.

Old cricketers tell me that the question of leg-before-wicket is eternal, so that one should not think too much of the discussion that is now raging round it. Somebody started it in The Times this time by saying that an Oxford batsman made a wonderfully good stroke of its kind by getting his pads in front of a quick break-back—the ball having already beaten the bat. This fairly raised the fury of the pro-bowlers, who hold that, if a bowler is good enough to beat the bat and would have hit the wicket but for the batsman's pads, the batsman should be given out. On broad grounds one's sympathies in such circumstances must be with the bowler; but actually one's judgment is to some extent guided by the kind of cricket in which one takes part.

Changes in the laws of cricket generally come very slowly, as the majesty of the game demands; but probably this l.b.w. rule will be one of the first to be revised. Many of the charms and problems of the game lie in the fact that its rules must be universal, and the great variety of wickets makes it impossible to draw up rules to satisfy all the bowlers in the world.

Nile Irrigation.

Since Mr. C. E. Dupuis, the Special Commissioner appointed by the Egyptian Government to report on the Egyptian Irrigation Service, completed his investigations and left the country at the beginning of last month, there has been much curiosity as to the recommendations which he has made. Mr. Dupuis, it will be remembered, was formerly Adviser to the Ministry of Public Works here. Some eighteen months ago, at the request of the Egyptian Government, he returned from England to draw up a report on Egypt's water requirements in the near future, and the steps that should be taken to meet those needs.

It is within everybody's recollection that the whole question of the best utilisation of the Nile has been several times investigated during recent years, and has led to keen controversy. Just before the War, a policy of great expansion had been adopted. The Government had accepted the theory that the population of Egypt would continue to increase at the same remarkable rate as during the past forty years, and that to provide for the increase it would be necessary to reclaim large areas of land. For that reclamation much more water than is at present available would be required. Hence the big development schemes, such as the creation of the Gebel Aulia reservoir and other new works, which, but for the War, would by now probably have been completed. The War stopped nearly all new work. After the Armistice the question of the new projects again arose, and the differences of opinion regarding the soundness of the projected scheme became more intense, leading, among other things, to the celebrated Willcocks libel action. The Government decided to take independent advice on the proposed works, which had been reviewed in the publication "Nile Control," issued in 1920. A Commission, consisting of Mr. Gebbie, nominated by the Indian Government; Dr. Cory, nominated by the United States Government; and Dr. Simpson, an eminent meteorologist of Cambridge University, was appointed to examine the whole question. The Commission reported that the development scheme was technically sound, but did not concern itself with the financial side of the question.

So far so good; but even after the proposed development had been given such distinguished sanction, the Government was unable to put the work in hand on account of lack of the huge funds necessary. Mr. Dupuis was, therefore, summoned to go into the whole matter, and to report on what would be the country's probable needs in the near future, and on what was the minimum development that must be carried out to meet those needs. Mr.

Dupuis's terms of reference were very wide, including the investigation of the organisation of the Irrigation Service and the making of such recommendations as he might think fit for its improvement.

Mr. Dupuis's report was signed on May 1 last, and, having been printed and the necessary accompanying plans prepared, was submitted to the Council of Ministers this week. It is still a confidential document, and the text is not available; but I have been able to ascertain its main features.

The Report of Mr. Dupuis.

Throughout the document is most conservative in tone. It goes into the supposed need to legislate for a rapidly increasing population, and concludes that the increase in the past has been chiefly due to the development of the country under British rule, and that it may be expected that the increase will be less rapid in the near future. The report lays it down that plans for new development must be closely scrutinised from the viewpoint of the money available, and declares that there is not money at present for the execution of the large plans set out in "Nile Control." Mr. Dupuis does not dissent from the opinion of the 1920 Commission that those schemes are technically sound; but considers that they represent rather an ideal development system, towards which it may be hoped that Egypt will gradually be able to move, than a way of satisfying immediate needs with the means at hand.

Egypt's greatest need, declares the report, is not for a greater total supply of water, nor even for a larger amount of water to be made available for land reclamation; but for a more constant summer supply. During the last two years of exceptionally low Niles it has been necessary to impose drastic restrictions on the use of water by cultivators, with consequent loss to the country. The goal to be aimed at, according to Mr. Dupuis, is a summer flow that shall not be liable to the huge fluctuations of recent seasons. To this end he recommends resumption of work on the Gebel Aulia reservoir, the construction of which was discontinued by the Egyptian Government in 1921; but not on so vast a scale as was originally approved. The water level in the basin should be lower than was contemplated, thus saving expense and avoiding the flooding of a large area of cultivated land, with consequent heavy claims for compensation.

The other new work which Mr. Dupuis considers of most promise is the conversion of Lake Albert Nyanza into a reservoir. By this means a very valuable reserve of water would be made available just at the most needed time. The Lake Nyanza scheme, however, would be of little value unless simultaneously the canalisation of the Sudd area were undertaken. The present loss through evaporation owing to the river spilling over into the huge marshy area of the Sudd is very great, and Mr. Dupuis points out that it would be almost useless to have a big reservoir above the Sudd if a large proportion of the water were going to be lost in transit across the swamps. The canalisation of the Sudd will be a long and costly process; but the benefit of the work will be felt progressively as it is advanced. At the present time the average discharge of the river into the swamp area is 1,000 cubic metres per second, whereas only about 400 metres per second emerge at the northern end of the swamps. With the assistance of the Lake Albert reservoir, Mr. Dupuis considers that the canalisation of the Sudd would make possible an average discharge of 1,000 cubic metres a second below the Sudd.

Lake Tsana is referred to as a valuable potential reservoir, at first for Egypt, but eventually for the Sudan, provided that the assent of the Abyssinian Government can be obtained to the necessary works being undertaken.

As regards the more normal, more or less routine development, Mr. Dupuis considers that for the next five years £E1,000,000 per annum should be allocated under this head, and that the greater part of this sum should be devoted to improving existing drainage facilities, a part of the problem to which the report devotes much attention.

The above is a brief résumé of some of the main recommendations. Mr. Dupuis makes a strong plea for an international Board of Control for the Nile and the speedy conclusion of an agreement between the Egyptian and Sudan Governments, so that the rights of each to Nile water and the share which each should bear of the cost of construction of new works should be clearly defined.

Changes in the Cabinet.

Last Sunday Ahmed Pasha Aly, Minister of Wakfs, resigned his portfolio. Gossip has been busy with possible reasons for the resignation, the real cause of which seems to have been simply that Ahmed Pasha, having lately completed the necessary period in office to qualify for a Minister's pension, has decided that a life of comfortable retirement is preferable to the burden of office. To occupy the Ministerial chair rendered vacant, Hafez Pasha Hassan has been transferred from the Ministry of Public Works, while Abdel Hamid Soliman Pasha, Under-Secretary of State in that Ministry, has been promoted to be Minister. The new Minister has had a remarkable series of advancements during the past few years. It is only two years ago since he was a comparatively junior inspector, and he has been an Under-Secretary for only eighteen months. He is, however, just the sort of man to earn rapid preferment. Exceedingly energetic, he combines a passion for efficiency with great urbanity of manner, a quality which made him very popular with local journalists when it fell to his lot to arbitrate in the controversy aroused by The Times monopoly in news of the Tutankhamen finds. He should make an excellent Minister of Public Works.

BULGARIA.

Sofia, June 20.

M. Stambolisky's Last Days.

Since my last week's letter the situation here has gradually become normal. The capture and subsequent death of M. Stambolisky were the culminating point in the Agrarian resistance, and at the moment of writing all is calm. The story of M. Stambolisky's five days' flight, pursuit, capture, rescue, and death form one of the most thrilling chapters in the history of Balkan politics. The ex-Premier had been living at Slavovitza since May, and had collected round him a fairly strong body of armed peasants. On the morning of Saturday, June 9, a military officer, with ten to fifteen soldiers, arrived at Slavovitza and announced to M. Stambolisky that his Government had been overthrown and that he was a prisoner. M. Stambolisky refused to believe this news, and gave out to the local populace that there must have been a local rising at the neighbouring town of Tatarpazardjik. The soldiers, seeing themselves threatened by vastly superior numbers, retreated from Slavovitza, and were followed by M. Stambolisky at the head of some two or three hundred peasants. When news of this reached Sofia, reinforcements, comprising artillery and cavalry, were hurriedly despatched from Sofia and Philipopolis. On Sunday, the 10th, the situation was that M. Stambolisky's force lay along one side of the River Topolnitsa, near Tatarpazardjik, whilst on the other side were the military, growing in strength every hour. They were at one time, however, in danger of being caught between two fires, as the peasants near Tatarpazardjik were on the point of joining M. Stambolisky. The latter, who is proved to have been in possession of huge sums of money, offered payment at the rate of 500 levas a day to all those who joined him, and, in addition, he told his followers that they would be able to loot Tatarpazardjik. Fortunately for the inhabitants of Tatarpazardjik, the military reinforcements were not slow in arriving, so this danger was averted.

As long as the military were without artillery the peasants showed themselves courageous, but the arrival of two field guns immediately decided the issue. The peasants became terrified, and the great majority returned to their villages. Just at this time the manifesto of M. Zankoff's new Government reached Slavovitza, and the peasants realised that this was no isolated military movement, but that M. Stambolisky's Government had been completely overthrown. M. Stambolisky, seeing himself deserted by his followers, took refuge in flight. Some twenty persons still remained faithful to him, but one by one they dropped off, and by Tuesday, June 12, only his brother and two other men remained. The military energetically pursued him, but owing to the sparsely populated nature of the country, M. Stambolisky was able to elude capture for two more days. However, on the morning of Thursday, the 14th, he saw that the chase was becoming too hot. He was disguised as a wood merchant, and in the early hours of the morning had passed through the village of Golack. The mayor of the village had recognised the ex-Premier and, along with a score of peasants, followed and arrested him. At this juncture M. Stambolisky completely broke down and exclaimed, "You betray me in the same manner as Judas betrayed Jesus Christ."

The peasants handed over M. Stambolisky to the military, and from this point onwards a wealth of stories has been built around the figure of the late Prime Minister. Some say he was immediately murdered; others say he met his death in trying to escape; others that he escaped and was killed in fair fight. The last version is the most likely, but the real truth will probably never be known, and it is sufficient to say that on Friday afternoon news reached Sofia that M. Stambolisky was no more. Later information received from Slavovitza makes it appear certain that M. Stambolisky or his friends tried to effect a rescue. The officers guarding Stambolisky were naturally nervous at the greatness of their responsibility. He himself, so it is reported, preferred death to many years in prison.

What the results of his fall from power will ultimately be no one can tell. Abroad, his death is much more lamented than it is here. Even among foreign circles in Sofia it is freely admitted that from the point of view of internal tranquillity it is better that M. Stambolisky is out of the way. This is not the place to write his biography, but although he received great praise for his peaceful outlook on foreign affairs, there is no doubt that he was detested, with very good reason, by the entire intelligentsia of Bulgaria.

Agrarian Risings.

Meanwhile, during the first three days following the coup, various Agrarian risings had occurred in various points of the country. The only one of these that threatened to become at all serious was that near Pleven. Agrarianism has always had a very strong grip in Pleven and district, and the military found themselves faced with organised guerilla warfare. M. Oboff, ex-Minister of Agriculture, at first put himself at the head of this movement, but shortly afterwards he judged discretion to be the better part of valour, fled northwards, and succeeded in crossing into Roumania. As the military forces stationed near Pleven were not able to deal with the Agrarians, an armoured train containing a battalion of infantry was sent from Sofia. This train was very effective in dispersing the peasants and encouraging the local military forces. Nevertheless, some quite heavy fighting took place, and a military officer who was actually on the spot states that between 100 and 120 soldiers were killed and wounded. The peasants also suffered heavily, and, owing to their conduct in displaying white flags on their houses as a means to lure soldiers within and then shooting them on the threshold, severe retaliatory measures were taken by the army.

Other Agrarian movements, as Radomir, Orkanie, Ihtiman, and Vratza were speedily crushed, and the leaders were arrested and brought to Sofia. In general, the coup from the military point of view has been an unqualified success. It was swiftly carried out, and, according to a highly placed personage, went far better than even the most sanguine had expected.

The New Cabinet and Yugoslavia.

On the civil side, organisation of administrative services has taken up most of the new Cabinet's time. There has, however, been one very important external question, and that is the attitude which Yugoslavia will adopt towards the new régime. As M. Stambolisky had always pursued a very pro-Serbian policy, his sudden fall from power naturally displeased Bulgaria's Western neighbour. In addition, the fact that the military had carried out the coup made the Serbians suspicious of Bulgaria's intentions. Reports of Serbian army mobilisation reached Sofia in the middle of last week, and on the 15th it was announced on very good authority that two divisions were concentrated along the Bulgarian frontier. The Western European Press for a day or two published telegrams, mostly from Belgrade, representing the situation as very grave. A flood of special newspaper correspondents arrived, and Governmental circles began to grow nervous. On the 16th an Agrarian Deputy gave notice in the Skupshtina that he desired an official statement on Serb-Bulgar relations. The interpellation was fixed for the 18th, and M. Nintchitch, the Serbian Foreign Minister, was to reply in person. Only yesterday news of his speech reached Sofia whilst even to-day the complete text is not available. However, judging by telegraphic reports, Bulgaria has nothing to fear. M. Nintchitch's speech laid stress on the importance of the Bulgarian coup in Serbian eyes, and emphasised that Serbia could not admit of any clauses of the Neuilly Treaty being broken. He went on to say that Serbia sincerely desired to remain on good terms with Bulgaria, and that his Government had no intention of undertaking any action whatsoever unless they were directly provoked. M. Nintchitch's speech has been read here with a good deal of relief, as the last thing Bulgaria wants is to be involved in any war, least of all with Serbia.

The Case of M. Daskaloff.

A good deal of prominence has been given to the declaration of M. Raiko Daskaloff, who was M. Stambolisky's right-hand man, and who recently was appointed Minister to Prague. M. Daskaloff refused to recognise M. Zankoff's Government, and telegraphed instructions in this sense to all Bulgarian Legations abroad. He went even further by announcing that Sofia was besieged and that M. Stambolisky, with an army of 100,000, would soon regain power. These false reports found a certain amount of credence in Western and Middle Europe, as news from Sofia was delayed in transmission. Last Friday M. Daskaloff realised that his game of bluff was played out and left Prague. His farewell act was solemnly to announce that ex-Tsar Ferdinand was the originator of the coup! M. Daskaloff's actions may be accepted at their face value—i.e., worthless. It is not known where he has gone to, but it is thought Belgrade may be his temporary headquarters. The present Bulgarian Government, besides having recalled him, will endeavour to obtain his extradition, but it is too much to hope that they will succeed.

PALESTINE.

Jerusalem, June 8.

"Arab Unity."

Last Tuesday our local Government published a résumé of the terms of the Anglo-Arab Treaty. This was at least ten days after King Hussein's telegram to the Arabs of Palestine, and in the meantime all the "reliable sources," "well-informed persons," and even "Renter," had on the whole served to confirm the hopes of the local Moslems and the fears of the Christians and Jews that Palestine was included within a political Arab unity. It is certainly an unusual experience to find Christian and Jew agreeing as against the Moslem. The Christian Arab standpoint was obvious and comprehensible. They were all for "Arab Unity" as an ideal if it went with independent local self-government; for, in the latter event, owing to a variety of reasons, it meant an Arab-Christian predominance in Palestine; but "Arab Unity" as adumbrated in the Mecca telegram was a very different kettle of fish; almost the entire Arab Press (which in Palestine is virtually all Christian) was up in arms against the idea of an "Arab Unity" of which the symbol of unity was, apparently, to be the King of the Hejaz—that the highly civilised and learned alumni of the American, French, German, and English schools and colleges in Syria and Palestine, should in any way be subservient partners, tools, or pawns of wild, uncultured Hejaz Bedouin, was too ludicrous to be thought of.

Jewish Feelings.

The attitude of the Jews was at first one of frank incredulity; but when the "well-informed sources" offered such scant comfort, many gave themselves up to a resigned despair; they began to survey the excessively scarred, chipped, and battered remains of the Balfour Declaration—or the Balfour Declaration as envisaged in their first enthusiasm—gradually disappearing under their eyes as a result of official definitions, restatements, and interpretations, with Transjordan granted independence and so severed from the future greater Jewish Palestine, and now, biggest blow of all, lesser Palestine itself officially included in the confederation of Arab States. (The official prayer drawn up by the Grand Rabbinate for use in the synagogues on the occasion of the King's Birthday contained an eloquent petition that the King be suffered to fulfil "his gorgeous promise" to the Jewish people, without any diminution or wavering.) The High Commissioner bravely tried to restore their courage, and, while assisting at the opening of the Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi's new premises, stressed the fact that the British policy of a Jewish National Home in Palestine was to persist unchanged; and this statement was widely broadcasted through every available channel by the Government's publicity department.

The Reception of the Treaty.

The publishing of the résumé of the Treaty and the text of Article 2, which "defines" the position of Palestine in Great Britain's Arab policy, has, naturally, cleared the atmosphere somewhat. The Jews are still not happy: the Article is too ambiguously phrased for them; their experience with the phrasing of the Balfour Declaration has undermined their confidence in English diplomatic phraseology. The grievance of the Palestinian Christian Arabs still stands; they feel that wholly misplaced consideration is given by Great Britain to a quarter which is neither worthy of it nor has a right to be treated with as the representative of Arabdom.

The Advisory Council.

Coming to Palestine's domestic politics, the topic of the moment is the reconstituted Advisory Council, replacing the one that functioned since civil administration was set up in 1920 till last winter. The proposed body is to be built up so as to contain exactly the same official and party representation that the "Legislative Council" would have had if the Palestine elections had not misfired; the sole difference is that the Arab members have been nominated by the High Commissioner, while the Jewish members, two in number, have been formally elected by the previously chosen secondary voters. The Arab opposition (it is now mainly voiced by the "Arab Executive," the Committee chosen by the Nablus Congress of last August; it is not essentially different from the more familiar Moslem-Christian Association)—the Arab opposition got to work at once and "banned" this new body, accusing the Palestine Government of getting by illegal devices the appearance of popular representation which they failed to get by the will of the country. Handbills were distributed in thousands, and the ten Arabs—eight Moslems and two Christians—were told to resign at once and not "besmear their nation's honour." These ten Government nominees seem to have spent a worried week. At the moment of writing it does not look as though they have made up their minds what they should do. They met together to consult as to their policy, and they had a joint consultation with the "Arab Executive." The latter issued yet another proclamation to the effect that the nominated ten were minded to resign; but sought how they could best do so without being impolite. There seems to have been a distinct lack of unanimity among them; first we heard that two or three had definitely announced that they would resign or that they had resigned; then we heard that certain of them refused to be harassed by the "Arab Executive" and would not resign; the next report was that some would resign if the whole body resolved to resign; and the last report to hand is that none of them will resign.

come out solidly in favour of this nominated assembly, and against the "Arab Executive" opposition. It points out that even if there had been regular elections, no better candidates could have been returned, nor more convinced, hard-working nationalists; they are not professional politicians, but "members of the very best families in Palestine, owners of land and property, business men, prudent and experienced, wise and learned; two of them were members of the Turkish Parliament, one was a district governor, three have been mayors and two are in charge of the biggest businesses in Palestine." This paper warns its enlightened readers against the soi-disant Nationalists who have no policy now left them but obstruction, which can do no good either to people or to country.

The Peace of Petah-Tikvah.

An event of quite peculiar interest occurred on June 1. This was the conclusion of peace between the Jewish village Petah-Tikvah and a group of the surrounding Arab villages. One of the most terrible episodes in the May riots of 1921 was the heavy Arab attack on Petah-Tikvah, when, but for the timely appearance of aeroplanes, the whole population might have been massacred. There were many killed on both sides, much damage was done to property, and Abu Kishk, the sheikh responsible for the trouble, was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment. Since then a feud has naturally existed between the Jews and their neighbours; neither dare approach the territory of the other, and, what was a severe blow to the Arabs, there could be no employment nor trading with the Petah-Tikvah Jews. After endless trouble and patience, peace has at last been made between the two parties; the conditions agreed to were that the Jews petition for the release of Abu Kishk, and the Arabs pay two thousand pounds indemnity for damage done—five hundred in cash, the rest in promissory notes. And last Friday a gigantic meal was consumed by Jews and Arabs in common in token of the resumption of friendly relations, which, prior to the May riots, had existed unbroken for forty-five years.

The special feature to be noted in all this was that the peace was negotiated neither by Government nor by any of the official Jewish bodies—Zionist Executive or Jewish National Council—but by the parties themselves. The moral which we are urged to draw from this is that those Jews who have been in the country for a generation or more can conduct "international" affairs with perfect success with their Arab neighbours; non-success in such matters, and the present hostility of the Arabs to the Jews, arise rather from the fact that Jewish policy in the country is all, or most of it, in the control of Jews new to the conditions, and utter strangers to the working of the Arab mind, and blankly ignorant of his ways, and cruelly regardless of his susceptibilities. There is some truth in all this. The Hebrew paper Ha-Aretz, the organ of the New Palestinian Jews, utterly ignored the ceremony itself at the time, and has since made but two or three sneering allusions to it.

The Pilgrimage via Jeddah.

Before the War convoys of pilgrims on the way to Mecca and Medina collected here from all parts of Russia and Anatolia and embarked in "Haji" boats under the green flag of the Prophet for Jeddah. No such parties have set off by this route since 1914 until June 5 last, when a small party started by steamer from Sirkedji Quay after a picturesque religious ceremony on the quay.

The Chile Fire.

Another disastrous fire, which wiped out hundreds of wooden houses, has taken place, this time at the village of Chile, on the Black Sea coast, a few miles east of the entrance to the Bosphorus. The fire broke out at about 10 a.m. on June 5, and, thanks to a high wind, the village of about 800 houses was almost completely destroyed. It is not yet known whether any of the inhabitants lost their lives. They have taken refuge in the hills, and tents and provisions are being sent to them.

The Election Campaign.

Internal politics in Turkey are pursuing their quiet way, and the election campaign has apparently not given rise to any outbreaks of disorder. The election of members of the college of electors is still going on in most areas, and very few final results are yet available. In the region of Constantinople all elements of the population, including the Christians, are reported to be recording their votes in the normal manner. The general opinion seems to be that Mustapha Kemal's popular party will come out with a strong majority, although some doubts are expressed concerning the chances of the party in the Trebizond area, which is notoriously opposed to Kemal-Pasha personally.

Feminism in Turkey.

A sign of the times is the beginning of a Feminist movement in Turkey. A committee of Turkish ladies has been formed for the purpose of claiming political rights for women. The movement owes its origin and makes its appeal to educated ladies, particularly those who possess diplomas of higher education. In connection with this, we may note the fact that at a recent election of members of the Turkish Council of Primary Education a Turkish lady teacher was elected. The Vatan applauds this new departure, and points out that in every country where women have been admitted to the franchise they have always taken the first step by becoming members of such social institutions as councils of public instruction, whence they have graduated for employment in more important public functions.

Bulgaria and Turkey.

All judgments on the real effect on Near Eastern problems of the recent change of Government in Bulgaria are premature until we know whether the new Government has come to stay and what line it will take if it does stay. It is assumed here that it will change the foreign policy of Bulgaria, and that there will be a definite orientation of the Bulgarian Government towards the Turks. Not that there is any real affinity between the two races—though affinities do not count for much these days—but because the settlement of the Karagatch question at Lausanne has convinced the Bulgarians that their outlet to the Ægean will depend upon the goodwill of the Turks.

Stagnation.

Towards Lausanne and all its doings there is a curiously indifferent and detached attitude. During the Greco-Turkish crisis a few weeks ago the air was certainly somewhat electric, but now, day by day, we hear of every possible permutation and combination of meetings between Allied, neutral, and Turkish plenipotentiaries, experts and bondholders, on the Debt question, each of which ends with the same result—complete disagreement. Then what do they do? Why, they start again with a fresh set of consultations. The queer part of it is that the delay seems to call forth no particularly violent complaints from either side. The only sign of life which Angora has given has been a declaration to the Press by Raouf Bey, in which one misses his usual trenchant tone, and only recognises the penchant for sterile reiteration, for which he is becoming notorious.

The Dry Regime.

The latest development of that hardy hebdomadal, the Dry régime in Constantinople, is a significant sign of the times. The previous occasion when the sword of Damocles was on the point of dropping on our heads they tied it up safely a day before the fatal date, May 15, and ordained that we should be free from palpitation for a month. This time the police directorate repeatedly assured us through the Press in every language that is current among this polyglot population that there was going to be no mistake about it. It was coming infallibly on June 16, and when we rose from our matutinal couch last Saturday morning we found the shutters down at our favourite wine shop and sighed, but noted with satisfaction that nearly all the bars and brasseries which usually claim our patronage had been included in the free list for Allied troops. What was our joy about 11 a.m. to find that the application of the law had been postponed till August 1. A whole six weeks' junketing was possible. What is the Government's idea in thus keeping us upon tenterhooks? It has been suggested that the method is copied from that employed, for the sake of good discipline in public schools, in the terrorisation of the young fags by members of the middle and upper school. Another explanation—for the accuracy of which I do not vouch—is that the police directorate was inundated by angry Turks, who had been dismissed by one of the big breweries in anticipation of the reduction of business, and that this is the inward significance of the phrase in the police director's rather apologetic recantation to the effect that at the last moment it had been discovered that Turkish interests would principally suffer from the enforcement of the ukase. Fie, fie, what would your brother Moslems in other parts of the world say if they knew that you were taking a hand in "The Trade"?

The opinion of many Turks appears to be summed up in the bon mot of a Constantinople Turk the other day, who said, "If the Koran can't keep the Moslem sober, the Grand National Assembly won't succeed in doing so."

It all comes down to the point I tried to emphasise last week. If the Grand National Assembly is going to try to convert Constantinople into a kind of outpost of Anatolia they will come a cropper. Let us hope that they are beginning to realise it.

PERSIA.

Teheran, May (Delayed).

Ramadan.

Since April 17 we have been in the month of fasting—Ramadan—and so it is hardly to be wondered at that political and other activities have been practically at a standstill. The only outstanding feature has been the resignation of the Minister of Finance, Baha ul Mulk, and of the Acting Minister of the Interior, Adib es Saltaneh.

The Elections.

The chief topic of interest at present is the elections for the new Parliament (the fifth Mejliss since the granting of the Constitution), and prospective candidates are very busy all over the country canvassing for votes. There is, needless to say, much underhand work in this connection among the lower and working classes, who naturally do not understand the meaning of an election or the issues at stake, and votes are freely bartered, being offered for sale at various prices in small or large quantities, and the report goes that a certain priest, after disposing of a large number of votes in advance and receiving payment, absconded with the few hundred tomans he had obtained, and left the prospective candidate lamenting! The authorities are, however, taking stringent measures to prevent any fraudulent dealings of this nature, and have succeeded to a certain extent.

Dr. Millspaugh's Second Report.

In his second quarterly report, recently published and presented to the Mejliss, the Administrator-General of the Finances strikes a fairly optimistic note. Referring to the late Banque d'Escompte de Perse, which has now been taken over by the Persian Government as a National Bank, he states that its assets far exceed the liabilities, and expresses the hope that the former may ultimately be recovered and the bank's creditors paid, and the balance devoted towards capitalising the bank. As in the past, when it was a branch of the Russian State Bank, the pawnbroking department of the bank was its most remunerative department, and Dr. Millspaugh has submitted a Bill to the Mejliss for the appropriation of a credit of 150,000 tomans to reopen this department, which he mentions as being most beneficial to the public at large. Dr. Millspaugh emphasises the large adverse balance of exports to imports, and mentions that a Commission to study the question of restricting the import of luxuries was recently formed at the Ministry of Public Works, of which Commission Dr. Bogart, the American expert placed in charge of the bank and of the Mint, was a member, and they came to the conclusion that steps should be taken to prohibit the import of such articles as they deemed to fall within the category of luxuries, and thereby encourage local industries. He does not lose sight of the fact that a diminution of imports will naturally decrease Customs receipts, but he is of the opinion that the benefits accruing from the increased local industries and the importation of goods and machinery essential for these will do much to compensate the country for the loss. He advocates that the recent law forbidding the export of gold and silver coin to the ports in the Persian Gulf in transit (sous cabotage) be cancelled as being against the interests of the country's industry, and states that the question of defective silver coin which is at present in circulation throughout the country in large quantities is being investigated by Dr. Bogart, who hopes to submit his report in a short time.

General News.

The aeroplane from Moscow (a "Junker" monoplane of 1920 model, with accommodation for four passengers), after remaining here ten days and making several flights over the town with passengers, who were taken on payment, returned to Russia via Tabriz two weeks ago. It descended on the racecourse outside the Doshantepéh Gate during the Spring Race Meeting organised by the Officers' Sports Club, and immediately on landing hoisted the blood-red Bolshevik flag! The Shah, who was a spectator at the races, was much interested in the machine.

NEAR EAST BOOKSHELF.

CONSTANTINOPLE TO-DAY.

CONSTANTINOPLE TO-DAY; or, THE PATHFINDER SURVEY OF CONS. ANTINOPLE. Under the direction of Clarence Richard Johnson. (New York, The Macmillan Company. $5.)

This volume is a survey of the social and economic conditions in Constantinople carried out under the auspices of an American "Council of Fifteen" between October, 1920, and May, 1921, eight organisations interested in betterment work in Turkey co-operating. The world-wide interest attaching to the city more than justifies such an undertaking; the complete lack of the information that it was sought to compile makes the resulting book indispensable to all those who want to probe deeper than the ephemeral statements of Press correspondents in an attempt to discover whether there is not a more satisfactory future in store for this distracted city and its inhabitants. If the "Survey" teaches the Turks the profound wisdom of the adage "Know thyself," it will be a fitting corollary to the admirable educational work already performed in Turkey by the United States through such institutions as Robert College, the Constantinople College for Women, and the Y.M.C.A.

As an illustration of the spirit in which the book is written, we cannot do better than quote from the chapter devoted to the "Historical Setting," a masterly summary of Turkish history:—

"Foreigners in Constantinople all too often act as if the people they find here, and not they themselves, with their Western customs and social traditions and cultural presuppositions, are 'strange.' It is easy to fail to appreciate the fact that people here have had a great complex past, in contrast with which the history of European and American culture is simple. A foreigner's first duty is to make a serious effort to understand the sources and characteristics of his new cultural environment. A real effort to understand would tend to make hasty and unkind misjudgments less frequent."

And subsequently a finger is shrewdly put on a pregnant spot: "Initiative in Constantinople rests with the Government. It has always been so. The Government is there to do for its people what should be done; the people are not there to do for themselves. . . . 'What is the Government for?' the bewildered ask."

The chapter on Civic Administration covers the relations between the Government and non-Turkish communities, and describes fully the system of Turkish Government. An additional section gives the details of inter-Allied control as it existed at the time of the survey. Under "Community Organisation" we have accounts of the eleven Christian Church communities, general information on the mosques and their government (unfortunately mosque statistics are not given, but we learn that there are 258 tekkés—i.e., places of assembly or residences for Dervishes in the city), and a full account of the Y.M.C.A. and Y.W.C.A. An attempt was made to investigate conditions of labour in various fields, and the results here given are worthy of careful study by the Turks themselves if they intend to live up to the standards that they have protested at Angora and Lausanne. Other chapters are devoted to the refugee problem, to orphanages, recreation, widowhood, and adult delinquency. A useful section on native schools brings the work to an end.

Space prevents full justice being done to the contents of the "Survey." As will be gathered from the enumeration of the chapters, there remains a large field awaiting similar investigation, but the trail has been blazed, and it is hoped that others will follow. One serious complaint is justified: there is no index, and the reader is left amazed at the unwisdom of robbing a really useful book of half its value by such a crude omission. If a second edition is published a very full index ought to be added.

OMAR AND UMAR

Our attention has been drawn to the fact that in our review, contained in the issue of June 14, of Mr. Chalmers Hunt's paraphrase of Umar Al-Farid's "Khamriyyah," ambiguity is likely to arise over the transliteration of the Arabian poet's name, Umar, to the more usual Omar.

THE PASSING OF "JOHNNY TURK."

The experiences of the representatives of British commercial interests invited to Angora to carry out negotiations with the Turkish Government are in danger of marking the final stage of disillusionment for a number of people who have clung to the belief that the triumph of nationalism implied a break with the characteristics of Old Turkey that rendered necessary the encroachments upon her integrity and the limitations of her independence. At Angora the British delegates met Nationalist Turkey "at home," and had not to form an opinion of it second or third hand, under the influence of any modifications imparted by the intervention, perhaps, of others, even before the finishing touches were superimposed by Ismet Pasha. In the opinion of those delegates, Nationalist Turkey in its present phase is far from being attractive at close quarters. That it should not be particularly well disposed towards foreigners was to be expected; but that it should show itself a complete stranger to such virtues as the Old Turk possessed comes as a disappointment. Our accounts of the proceedings at Angora are derived, it is true, from the unsuccessful negotiators, and some allowance may be made for feelings engendered from the failure of their mission. There seems little doubt, however, that the Turks, instead of trying to conceal the shortcomings of the Anatolian town from a hospitable desire to provide for the comfort of their visitors, made a point of parading its deficiencies for their special discomfiture. Although it may not have been polite, it was, perhaps, only human to wish to bring home to others the difficult conditions under which Nationalist Turkey had made good; and the drawbacks of Angora would have been overlooked if the negotiations had been conducted on fairly reasonable lines. Here, again, we lack the Turkish version, but the Turks have clearly lost yet another golden opportunity in allowing their visitors to return to Europe without a good word to say for the new Turkey. They found Angora bent upon seizing the profit of the moment, regardless of its own ultimate interests. There may be a genuine belief—although unfounded—that for Turkey to pay immediately the full interest on all her debts means bankruptcy; but the only honourable course to pursue was to express readiness to pay in full, while inviting the creditors to examine in their own interests the Turkish view of the economic situation. The line adopted by the Nationalist Government has been to refuse tout court to honour its obligations and to turn a deaf ear to any expert explanation of its ability to do so. At the same time, in its dealings—negotiations would seem to be a misnomer—with concession companies it has lost sight of the value to Turkey of a reputation for honourable dealing on the eve of having to appeal to foreign markets for financial support.

With the report of the failure of the Angora negotiations comes the announcement of the formation, as a result of an agreement between the National Turkish Company of Imports and Exports and the Corporation for the Economic Development of Turkey, Limited, of a great trading corporation, under British guidance, to which would seem to be entrusted the development of Turkey by the monopolisation of the control of the imports and exports of the country. From this coincidence it may be thought that Nationalist Turkey is trying to differentiate between foreign enterprise of what it regards as the old school, associated with the "humiliation" of Turkey in the past, and foreign enterprise under new conditions, which will be prepared to pay more attention to Turkish susceptibilities. Whether British enterprise in Turkey can be subjected to any such classification may well be doubted; but even if it could, there would be no justification for Turkey's seeking to dishonour her former pledges because she is of opinion that she may be able to obtain better terms now. There has been no lack of goodwill in Great Britain for the Turks throughout their struggle for "independence"; and they would find an instinctive readiness on the part of British business interests to meet them halfway, if they on their part showed that the new order meant a material improvement on the old. Nationalist Turkey, however, has set about things in the wrong way. She may be convinced of her capacity for European standards, but before providing concrete evidence of it and giving time to others to adapt their policy to the changed conditions she has adopted the worst Oriental methods towards all foreign interests indiscriminately, thus involving herself in a vicious circle by demonstrating the need for the very safeguards that she is so anxious to eliminate as being unnecessary.

Even if, as is most probable, this phase proves to be a passing one, and a happier relationship is ultimately established between the Turk and the foreigner, the days of "Johnny Turk" must be regarded as a thing of the past. They were, in fact, the direct outcome of the Capitulations, and with the abolition of the latter they go also. Officially, in the old days, Turkey, in spite of diplomatic support, was a thing apart, if not altogether outside the pale. Unofficially, it was a case of "Johnny Turk." The explanation of the contradiction is that it was across the gulf which had existed for generations between the Turk and the Englishman—systematised by the Capitulations until it had become second nature to both—that the Turkish reputation had been built up. For better or for worse the foreigner in Turkey moved and had his being in another plane. If he behaved himself, well and good; if he did not, his own people looked after him—it was no business of the Turk's. Accordingly, the latter, wishing for nothing better than a quiet life, found interest and instinct harmonising in an attitude of easy-going benevolence towards the individual foreigner of the West, especially the Englishman, who, as the antithesis of the Oriental, appeals so much more strongly to the East than others. Thus to his personal qualities the Turk added a Gallic-like attitude, peacefully continuing to smoke his narghileh and caring for none of the abnormal things done by the Westerner, because they were the special concern of other Westerners, if they exceeded the limits of toleration. With the abolition of the Capitulations the Turks themselves will be handling matters that formerly they left to the foreigner, and at first they will handle them neither gently nor tactfully. Already the experience of the business delegates at Angora shows how strong is the tendency to exploit the "top-dog" feeling, even in Government circles. With the return to the routine of everyday life this tendency will have many more exponents—Customs, police, and all the minor bureaucratic lights with whom foreigners are brought into contact. The temptation to each individual Turk to demonstrate in his own person the reality of the new order will be very strong, and the Westerner will not like it. The "Johnny Turk" legend will go; but its deacease need not be a matter for regret, if it is replaced by feelings of mutual respect. So far the Turk has been engaged in destroying the old relationship, and has shown no desire to build the new one. Perhaps it will be only when he has lacked for some time the advantages that accrued without his realisation of them from the personal ties between Britain and Turkey that he will begin to appreciate their value. Apart from the formation of the great Anglo-Turkish trading corporation, it is certain that the bridge between the two countries will never be entirely severed.

OPENING UP THE MIDDLE EAST.

The Rôle of the Motor Car.

The grant of a contract for carrying the mails between Haifa and Baghdad by motor-car is an important development in the history of the communications in the Middle East. Thanks to the enterprise of the Royal Air Force, Baghdad has been brought within nine or ten days of London by means of the fortnightly air service between Cairo and Baghdad. But this service is still run at Government expense, no commercial undertaking has been found willing to make itself responsible for it, and the number of people who can use it is necessarily limited. The aeroplane is making great progress as a regular means of transport in Europe, but it has not yet been able to establish itself on a commercial footing, owing to its high cost, in the less populous parts of the world, and the airship lags even further behind. To the Nairn Transport Company of Beyrout—a small British company which has inaugurated a motor service for general tours in Syria and Palestine and for carrying passengers and mails between the two countries—belongs the credit for the discovery that not only is motor-car transport across the Syrian desert a feasible commercial proposition, but also that it opens up very wide possibilities as an important link in Imperial communications. The contract given by the Irak Government to the Nairn Transport Company provides for a weekly service for the mails each way between Haifa and Baghdad, the time taken not to exceed forty-four hours, so that, with the sixteen-hour journey by rail to and from Haifa, the total length of time between Port Said and Baghdad shall be within sixty hours. In this way Baghdad is brought within eight or nine days of London by means of a weekly service—steamer, train, and car—which offers nothing as adventurous or as costly as the air trip between Cairo and Baghdad. Here let it be said that the surrender of the mail service between Egypt and Irak by the Royal Air Force to the motor transport company will cause no heartburnings to the former. The service has constituted a grand piece of Imperial work, but it is, strictly speaking, outside the province of the Air Force, although its utility as a special type of training for pilots has been recognised.

The Desert Journey.

The route from Haifa to Baghdad via Damascus, Rutba Well, and Ramadi has been selected, because it is the best from the point of view of motor transport. The southern route from Amman, followed by the air mail, is rendered impossible by the long stretch of lava country at the beginning, which proves severe both on tyres and on car. Other routes are that via Aleppo, Deir ez Zor, and the valley of the Euphrates or Deir ez Zor-Mosul-Baghdad, and that from Damascus via Palmyra and Abu Kemal; but the route that the mails will follow is quicker than any of those; it is also safer than the northerly one, and affords far better going than the Palmyra route.

From Haifa to Damascus the road passes by Nazareth, Tiberias, and El Kuneitra. Damascus and Baghdad lie due west and east of one another, and the route between them, except for a few miles at the start and a slight southerly indentation at the centre, conforms with the proverbial flight of the crow. Damascus is left by the Aleppo Road, which is followed for fifteen miles to a point near Azra, where a direction due east is taken. Ten miles later Dumair is reached; the track then keeps along the southern foot of Jebel Abu el Kos for 22 miles. At mile 119 the mountain range bears away to the north-east, and the cars take a bearing slightly south of east for Jebel Tenf (the frontier of France's mandated territory), and so straight on to Rutba Well (mile 315). Twenty-five miles before the Well the track of the air route is struck—those twin lines, as seen from the air, which, with almost uncanny precision, seem to have been ruled across the desert—and this track is followed for the rest of the 215 miles to Ramadi, except for a slight deviation to the actual Rutba Well, which serves the airman in passing as a familiar landmark, but provides the occupants of the motor-cars as a halfway house for a brief halt.

The only permanent water to be met with between Dumair and Ramadi (a distance of 434 miles) is at Rutba Well. At certain seasons of the year pools may occasionally be found in the wadis or elsewhere, but cannot be counted upon, and for all practical purposes the whole stretch may be regarded as dry. At Rutba the water is more than 45 ft. below the surface, and cannot be recommended for drinking purposes, but it is useful for filling up radiators.

From Rutba the direction is slightly north of due east to Ramadi, where civilisation is once more encountered. On a bridge to the west of the town an Iraki police post examines passports; a Political Officer is to be met with in Ramadi, to say nothing of a telegraph and a wireless office. The Euphrates is crossed at Feluja by a bridge of boats, and Baghdad is finally entered (532 miles from Damascus) across the Tigris by the Khotah bridge.

For the purposes of the mail service, which is due to start on October 1, the desert stretch between Damascus and Ramadi will be timed to occupy fifteen hours, at an average speed of 30 miles an hour. Very nearly the whole of this journey represents good going for the cars; the soil is hard, covered in places with gravel, shingle, shale, or, it may be, scant grass. There is hardly any sand, except just west of Ramadi. The route, moreover, is practically a dead level, save where dried-up watercourses have to be negotiated, and these, in addition to having steep banks, may be encumbered with more or less formidable boulders. Steps are being taken to clear a track for the cars, so as to reduce the number of delays to free running to a minimum. For its greater length, however, the desert allows the cars to be driven at any pace of which they are capable. It is only in Syria or between Ramadi and Baghdad that bad roads are encountered, and these in time, it may be hoped, will show some improvement.

A Factor in Confederation.

At first mention of a weekly motor-car service between Palestine and Irak one is inclined to think only of the advantage to Great Britain of having the mandated territory of Irak brought within comparatively easy reach of London, and of the opening up of a wider field for the hurrying tourist. For the Middle East there is the important consideration that it also brings the distant Arab land of Irak into close touch with the Arabs of Syria, Palestine, and the Hejaz. In any scheme which aims at a confederation of the various Arab States this notable improvement in communications can hardly fail to play a part. Moreover, what has been accomplished at the northern end of the Syrian desert can be repeated in other parts of the Arabian Peninsula where similar conditions prevail. A railway cannot be constructed without foreign help; there is nothing to prevent any Arab State from building roads along which a tolerable motor service can be maintained. The distance from Mecca to Nejd, as from Mecca to the Yemen, is the same as that between Damascus and Baghdad. At the present moment, if motor transport were feasible, the inclinations of the respective rulers might run to armoured cars rather than to a postal-passenger service; but, given a period of peace and goodwill, it is not difficult to see how quickly the new spirit among the peoples might be maintained and developed by the motor-car.

This aspect of the question will not be lost sight of, it is to be hoped. The potentialities of the mail service modestly established by Mr. Norman Nairn between Haifa and Beyrout have not yet been exhausted. The all-conquering railroad may insist upon having its say; but its day is not yet, and before it comes there should be regular motor services linking Teheran with Baghdad or railhead at Khanikin, as well as with other parts of Persia. Settled conditions in the countries traversed, it goes without saying, are an essential factor, and in this respect Persia may be found to be lagging behind the Arab countries. No trouble on this score has been experienced by the air mail between Transjordan and Baghdad, however numerous the forced landings, and only friendliness has been met with so far on the part of the Arabs encountered by the cars between Damascus and Baghdad.

Tutankhamen and Nebuchadnezzar.

The tourist archaeologically disposed may now include in his next season's programme both the opening of Tutankhamen's inner tomb and a visit to Nebuchadnezzar's Palace at Ur of the Chaldees. He will be able to go from one to the other in about the time that it takes him to cross the Mediterranean from Marseilles to Port Said. On his way to or from Ur he will be able to inspect Babylon, and a slight deviation on his homeward route will show him the ruins of Palmyra, which are regarded as even more impressive than those of Baalbek.

LETTERS FROM BABYLON.

A lecture on "The Letters of the First Babylonian Dynasty" was delivered last month at Oxford by Mr. G. R. Driver, M.A., Fellow of Magdalen College, for the Professor of Assyriology, Mr. S. Langdon. Four cases of tablets have been given to the Ashmolean Museum by Mr. Weld Blunden, and eighty letters found in them formed the subject of the lecture. Mr. Driver said the letters came from Larsa, which was probably the Ellasar of the Bible, where they had been digging, and Oxford now possessed the second best collection of the Letters of Hammurabi in the world. It was probable that most of the letters came from the King or his Vizier to the Governor and other officials at Larsa, and many dealt with tenure of property, grants of land, payment of taxes, irrigation, wages of labourers, and other subjects.

According to an official statement in connection with the erection of memorials, the Imperial War Graves Commission report that a memorial will be erected at Neuve Chapelle to the memory of the missing of the Indian Army. The memorial to the missing of the Salonika Expeditionary Force is at Colonial Hill, Lake Doiran, and is practically completed. Others are in progress of erection or under consideration in Gallipoli, Palestine, Egypt, Irak, etc.

PRESS ON THE NEAR EAST.

The Case of Palestine

"The situation in Palestine," says the Morning Post of June 22, "becomes more and more serious every day." The Arabs are now more exasperated than ever, and are beginning to refuse to pay taxes, a grave step to a country already in debt. It cannot, therefore, understand the complacency with which the Colonial Office appears to regard the problem, for it regards the whole experiment as a complete failure:—

In fact, British prestige in the East has suffered a fatal blow by its association with an experiment which, starting with a contradiction in its very declaration, was bound to be a failure. Zionism was adopted by a Government in a hurry, anxious to do something to conciliate a race many of whose members had secured control of Russia. The men whom they sought to conciliate replied to those overtures by the Treaty of Brest Litovsk. All that has happened is that, despite the cry of self-determination and the passionate interest of so many of our legislators in the liberties of the Babus, the gunmen, and the inhabitants of Saghalién, the overwhelming majority of the population of Palestine are subjected to a government which they abhor and which, professing to establish a National Home for Jews, is opposed, and, indeed, ridiculed, by sensible Jews all over the world. Mr. Lansing talked of self-determination as a phrase loaded with dynamite. The phrase has not yet blasted a path to the banks of the Jordan. The sooner we end this disastrous experiment and recall the men who are persisting in it the better it will be for our Imperial safety. What is the use of reducing our commitments in Irak when our policy in Palestine can in the long run be enforced only by British bayonets?

The Future of Bulgaria.

Writing in the Nation and Athenæum of June 16 on "The Revolution in Bulgaria," Professor Arnold J. Toynbee first notes that, because of the change of Government at Sofia, "the better relationship between Bulgaria and Jugoslavia, which seemed to be shaping itself, is in danger of being twisted awry again." Yet it is by no means certain that the conciliatory foreign policy pursued by M. Stambolisky will be abandoned, because in Near Eastern countries it is not measures but men that matter, and it is safer to assume that the new men at Sofia will take over the old policy. A parallel case may be found in the fall of M. Venizelos, which did not entail the abandonment of his schemes.

We have now to see whether M. Stambolisky's successors will be content merely to change places with him, or whether they will proceed to reverse the present relations of Bulgaria with her neighbours. It may be that M. Stambolisky's policy will be recognised by them, if not as satisfactory, at least as being less unpleasant in its consequences than any alternative. Post-war Bulgaria may not yet have secured an outlet to the Ægean or autonomy for Macedonia, but at least she has reduced her Reparations bill by 75 per cent., and has not seen Jugoslav or Roumanian garrisons quarter themselves in her Ruhrs and Rhinelands. No Government at Sofia with any vestige of common sense would deliberately jeopardise these negative but extremely valuable blessings. It is not certain, however, whether the new Government are free agents, or whether they may not have bought their victory over the Agrarians by selling themselves to the Macedonian and Thracian Irredentists.

In conclusion, Professor Toynbee explains the change of Government in Bulgaria by a reference to the social cleavage in that country between the Western-educated intelligentzia and the more or less unsophisticated mass of the population:—

M. Stambolisky represented the Bulgarian peasant against the exotic bourgeois who had come back from Europe with Western political ideas and aspired to sacrifice the peasants' blood and treasure in order to achieve the national unity of the fatherland. But how could the peasantry have succumbed to the intelligentzia now unless the latter had found allies in the Irredentists—those refugee-peasants from beyond the frontier who have learnt nationalism not from foreign political theorists, but in the practical school of foreign misgovernment? For months past the Irredentists have maintained a virtually independent Government of their own in the districts adjoining the south-western frontier. Professor Zankoff's new Government at Sofia can hardly be so unconnected with this movement as he would have us believe; and if the Macedonians come into the saddle in Bulgaria we must look for trouble—for these are fanatics with a righteous cause.

The New Statesman of June 16 contains an article, entitled "Another Fallen Idol," upon the change of Government in Bulgaria. It reviews the works, good and bad, of M. Stambolisky, who, though he may have been a "god-send" to us, could not possibly, from the pacifism of his policy, be a national hero, and sums up the present situation thus:—

M. Stambolisky was a despot who overreached himself, as every despot will in the end. He was, according to his lights, a benevolent despot, but his benevolence was lop-sided; there was too little of it at home and too much of it abroad. His attempt to make his peasantry supreme was too daring—or, rather, the experiment was framed on too narrow lines. We do not suppose that the eclipse of the Agrarian Party will be more than temporary, for the peasant democracy is too powerful an element in Bulgaria to be kept down for long. But when it rises again, whether it be next week or next year, it will have to mend its ways. It may be supreme on one condition—that it conciliates the other sections of the community instead of treading on their necks.

Macedonia and Bulgaria.

The Glasgow Herald of June 18 states that that part of Macedonia which is incorporated in Yugoslavia is the crux of the Bulgarian political situation, and that it may become "the crux of a much larger development, involving the peace of the whole Near East." Pausing to note the enormous power upon Near Eastern politics of the Macedonian Committee and upon the fall of M. Stambolisky, it says:—

It is impossible to foresee all that such an undesirable reaction upon the Near Eastern situation may mean, but it is difficult to conceive how some very unpleasant consequences to Bulgaria itself can be avoided. If at this most inauspicious juncture a strong party at Sofia forces the Government into an attitude with reference to Macedonia which can only mean an immediate rupture with Yugo-Slavia, all the concessions and advantages which M. Stambolisky's foreign policy secured for Bulgaria, including the reduction of the total debt to the Allies from ninety to twenty-two millions sterling, will disappear automatically. For such a rupture could only mean a war such as would not be carried on by Bulgaria without a violation of the Treaty of Neuilly, under which her forces are severely restricted. On the other hand, the Bulgars are a very dour people, and the probability is that M. Stambolisky alienated not a few of his Agrarian supporters by his anti-Macedonian policy, and that none of them would have resisted that policy had they dared. It is significant that at Constantinople the news of the formation of the Zankoff Cabinet in Sofia has been welcomed as indicating the likelihood that Bulgaria will now turn her eyes from the Maritza to Macedonia, and that consequent friction with Yugo-Slavia and Greece will throw her once more into the arms of Turkey.

Turkey and the Debt.

In an article called "A New Way to Pay Old Debts," the Manchester Guardian of June 21 looks at the deadlock at Lausanne from the Turkish angle. Concerning the currency in which payment of the interest on the Ottoman Debt is to be made, it says:—

A great deal is being written and said about the iniquity of the Turks in suggesting that they might liquidate their debts in French francs instead of the specified gold. Certainly the terms of the contract permit the bondholder to demand payment of his interest in gold. But it ought in justice to be remembered that this provision was framed at a date when it was held inconceivable that France, Italy, or Britain should attempt to repay debts contracted in gold with a depreciated paper money, while Turkey, it was thought, might, unless restrained, dally with the temptation. If the British lender to France or Italy who now receives about a quarter of his rightful interest as measured in pounds and shillings cannot claim to be paid in gold, that is because the financial probity of those great nations was taken for granted, while that of Turkey was not. The Turkish plea that its obligation to pay in gold dates from an epoch whose circumstances were entirely different from the present is not so "impudent" as at first sight may seem. At least, it ill behoves European nations who have broken the letter of their financial obligations on the plea of the stress of warfare to use such intemperate language when the Turks do but follow suit. And, anyway, French francs, although on the downward side, ought to be spoken of with more respect than as if they were Russian roubles, especially by Frenchmen.

ANZAC MEMORIAL AT PORT SAID.

It is announced by the Melbourne correspondent of The Times that Mr. C. W. Gilbert, sculptor, has been awarded the prize of 250 guineas offered by the Defence Department for the design of a monument to be erected at Port Said in memory of the Anzacs who fell in the War. The memorial, which will cost £15,000, is to be erected at the back of the Casino Palace Hotel, near the entrance to the Canal. The monument is to typify Australian and New Zealand horsemen.

THE CITY OF DAVID.

The fifty-eighth annual general meeting of the Palestine Exploration Fund was held at the rooms of the Society of Antiquaries of London on June 20. The meeting was described by the Chairman, Dr. D. G. Hogarth, as "an epoch-making event," for the announcement was made that a joint expedition of the Fund and the Daily Telegraph, under the direction of the former, was about to excavate at Mount Ophel, the hill just outside the south wall of the present city of Jerusalem. Immense interest has always centred in this site. It was the old hill-fortress or citadel of the Jebusites, which David and his warriors captured: "And David dwelt in the stronghold, and they called it the City of David" (2 Chron. xi. 7). It was in this region that a private expedition attempted to excavate (1909-11); German intrigue and Turkish rapacity brought that very promising venture to an untimely though not entirely unfruitful end.

The meeting was opened by Dr. Hogarth, who made the announcement of the joint expedition, explaining how the P.E.F. had been able to gather the £5,000 necessary before the Government of Palestine would issue a permit for the work: the Fund was massing all its resources to guarantee £1,000, the Schweich Fund granted £1,000, a generous and entirely unconditional gift of £2,000 was made by Mr. Charles Marston, and, finally, the Daily Telegraph gave £1,000. In addition to its financial aid, the Daily Telegraph was willing to give the whole Press the free use of all despatches from Jerusalem which it would publish describing the progress of the work. Dr. Hogarth read a letter from Bishop Ryle, Dean of Westminster, speaking of "the almost unrivalled privilege of excavation upon the Ophel Hill," under the skilled guidance of Professor R. A. S. Macalister, whose work at Gezer was one of the most complete and successful archaeological achievements.

Prof. Macalister, in the course of his address, said that the work would start in September. When work of this kind was in prospect it was inevitable that the question should be asked, "What do you expect to find?" Excavation was essentially a work that involved both disappointments and surprises, and the excavator who started work with the expectation of finding some particular inscription or record which would solve some outstanding topographical or historical problem, was courting disillusionment. Under the regulations of the Palestine Government the expedition would receive the concession of about one acre; this they would dig as thoroughly as possible, taking from it what gifts the gods saw fit to send. What those gifts could be he could not presume to foretell; what they might be could be made the subject of unlimited speculation; but he hoped they would find traces of the daily life of the ancient city, from which they could re-people it with carpenters and potters, with workers in bronze and metals, revealing the names of those who had jostled in life with David and Absalom, with Ahaz and Isaiah, with Jeremiah and Jehoiakim. The Tell el-Amarna tablets had made known to us a King in Jerusalem called Abd-Khiba, an adept in diplomacy and intrigue, who corresponded with other Palestinian kings and with the Pharaoh in Egypt. His archive-chambers, with all their wealth of information, might be somewhere in that Mound, perhaps even in their allotted acre! He desired emphatically to contradict the unauthorised statement, which had appeared in some American papers, that the tomb of David was their objective. Their objective was to excavate a certain area of the ancient city and to find what lay hidden there; nothing more and nothing less. If David's tomb were within that area they would find it; but even then no one must hope for a Palestine sensation equal to the discovery of Tutankhamen's tomb. Josephus tells us that John Hyrcanus, son of Simon Maccabæus, opened David's tomb and took from it 3,000 talents of silver; and later, Herod the Great reopened the tomb secretly and took from it furniture of gold and precious things. Even if the tomb were found, it would be but an empty cave. They were setting forth into unknown waters; they might meet with moderate results or they might win prizes of the first magnitude. While nothing was certain, anything was possible.

Dr. H. R. Hall, Chairman of the Executive Committee, read an interesting paper on "Palestine in the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Egyptian Dynasties," in which he said that recent discoveries had shown that Egypt even before the Eighteenth Dynasty, was not so isolated as had been thought. It was connected with Palestine and Syria by land and by sea. It was Syrian aggressions upon Egypt that first turned the thoughts of the Egyptians to the conquest of Palestine and Syria. According to the latest views, the exodus took place through the well-known eastern gateway of Egypt, called Pelusium by the Greeks, and the Egyptians, pursuing them eastwards, might well have been trapped and overwhelmed in the marshes, called in the Bible the Sea of Reeds, which our version renders as the "Red Sea." The Hebrews, according to Josephus's view, were in the deserts, or the mountains of Edom and the wilderness to the south-east. The Philistines did not come in their ships from Asia Minor until the beginning of the twelfth century B.C., and their coming was the close of the Egyptian domination in Palestine. The native Canaanite civilisation was of a high order; but probably because the Hebrews had little use for it, it withered for a time, to rise again perhaps in the Israel of Ahab's day. Thotmes III was the first real Egyptian conqueror; he was determined to vanquish and to dominate all Asia as far as the River Euphrates, and this he succeeded in doing after several campaigns. Egyptian sovereignty was unquestioned west of the Arabian Desert, and Canaan was, in fact, the King of Egypt's land, for whose good behaviour he was responsible, from whence he drew tribute for the temples of the gods of Egypt, and wherein Egyptian resident governors upheld his supreme authority.

The Hon. Secretary, Dr. E. W. G. Masterman, referred to the losses by death incurred by the Fund since the last general meeting. The places of such men as Professor G. Buchanan Gray and M. Clermont-Ganneau could never be filled. He referred also to the report that the excavations had for their objective the Tomb of David; as they were going to work at the south-eastern end of the city and the Tomb of David was popularly supposed to be on the western hill, it was not very probable that any such discovery would be made. In any case, the work of the Fund would be carried out, as it had always been, with every respect for the religious prejudices of the Christian, Moslem, and Jewish people in Palestine.

The meeting ended with a warm vote of thanks to the Society of Antiquaries for the use of their room.

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London,

Tuesday Morning.

M. Vintila Bratianu.

M. Vintila Bratianu, Roumanian Minister of Finance, is on a visit to London, and although he has come primarily in connection with the general question of Reparations, it is to be hoped that many of those whose business interests link them with Roumania will be able to avail themselves of the opportunity of his presence, in order to obtain a clearer appreciation of the Roumanian Government's financial policy. As that policy has not been entirely endorsed in Roumania, it need not cause surprise that it is not fully understood abroad. M. Vintila Bratianu's resolve not to allow himself to be diverted from the plan of action laid down must, however, command respect. It is out of the question that the Roumanian Government should not believe that it is acting in the best interests of the country, or that it should deliberately embark on a policy calculated to estrange foreign interests. M. Bratianu will without doubt be able to make out a good case, and he may be sure that it will be listened to with great interest in England.

Move to Change Mail Day.

My readers will no doubt be interested to know that a move is on foot in the City to bring about a reversion to the pre-War custom in respect of the day on which the Eastern mails leave. During the War there were at least two alterations in the day, and it has now been Thursday for a long time. For a variety of reasons the City has a very decided preference for Friday, and there is likely therefore to be a very considerable volume of support in favour of the change. But it would perhaps be unwise to look for an alteration in the immediate future, for it necessarily takes time to convince the authorities of the need for action.

The Angora Negotiations.

The Fabian tactics of the Turks at Lausanne would seem to be aptly followed in regard to the unofficial negotiations at Angora. The idea of direct pourparlers between the foreign companies operating in Ottoman territory and the Turks was adopted because it appeared to hold out some prospect of a speedy settlement of some of the obstacles that led to the breakdown of the first Lausanne Conference. The least that can be said is that up to the present the course of the negotiations has not been such as to justify expectations. Settlements are reported to have been arrived at in respect of a few companies, it is true, but the bulk of the business remains to be done, and it is only too evident that the Turks are as far off as ever from facing realities. They seem to think that an unlimited time can be devoted to a settlement with the Allies, just as if the disposal of a carpet was at stake, whereas it is in the vital interest of Turkey no less than in that of the Allies that an agreement should be arrived at with the least possible delay.

Egyptian Hotels Development.

Some weeks ago I referred to the proposed amalgamation of hotels in Egypt, and the report of the Egyptian Hotels, which has just been issued and will be found in another column, contains details of the proposal as regard that company. A large block of the ordinary shares in the Egyptian Hotels has been acquired by the Société des Grand Hotels d'Egypte, and it is proposed to transfer the business and undertaking of the company to that concern. The offer, which, in the opinion of the directors, is a favourable one, is that the ordinary shareholders shall receive one ordinary share of £4 in the Grand Hotels in exchange for three £1 Egyptian Hotels shares, while preference shareholders are to have the option of Five per Cent., Debentures in the Grand Hotels to the nominal value of their shares or payment in cash.

Smaller Profits.

The past year was not such a good one for the company as the previous twelve months, the working profits being £47,347, as compared with £52,852, and the total this year includes £5,000 in respect of the Semiramis Hotel. There is no reference in the report to the reasons for the decreased profits, but it may be assumed that the main cause is to be found in the uncertainties of the internal political situation, which have deterred would-be tourists from making the journey to Egypt. The Luxor discoveries did much to help the tourist traffic, but evidently this was insufficient to counteract the adverse influences. So far as can be seen at present, things should be very different in the coming season, and, provided there are no unforeseen developments, 1923-24 might well prove a "boom" year for Egyptian hotel companies. One other feature of the report remains to be touched on. It is proposed this time to pay a dividend of 30 per cent., as against 25 per cent. for the previous year.

Athens, June 9.

The Appreciation of the Drachma.

After reaching a minimum rate of 123 for the £ sterling, and then slowly dropping to 180, the drachma has again improved to 150, at which it has remained since Friday. In financial circles here it is maintained that the sharp rise in Greek currency is mostly due to psychological reasons, and that the reaction is bound to come sooner or later; 200 drs. or thereabouts is considered to be the real value of the £ to-day, and it is generally believed that the exchange will eventually stabilise at that figure.

As was only to be expected, the rise of the drachma was followed by a serious fall in prices, particularly of foreign imported commodities, as a consequence of which thousands of merchants who had placed large orders at high rates of exchange are now on the verge of bankruptcy. The banks have likewise sustained heavy losses. One of the smaller banks in Athens was obliged temporarily to suspend payment, while at another well-known Athenian bank the rush of people to withdraw their deposits was so great that it was found necessary to keep the establishment open to the public both on Saturday afternoon and Sunday morning.

TURKEY.

Constantinople, June 19.

The Companies at Angora.

The negotiations at Angora with the representatives of the foreign companies are pursuing the weary tenour of their way. I have no particularly startling secret information, and am still wondering whether to believe the Press articles which assure us that all is going well, or private advices which state the exact contrary. It is difficult to discredit definite statements that final agreements have been reached with the Constantinople Tramway Company, the Smyrna Gas Company, and the Oriental Railways; and that the basis of an agreement between the Government and the Tobacco Regie is already laid, and awaits ratification. There are, however, many other companies, of which several are important British enterprises, such as the Constantinople Telephone Company, the Smyrna-Aidin Railway, and so forth, whose affairs do not yet seem to have progressed very far.

Much play has been made of the claims of the Smyrna-Aidin Railway in the financial notes of a great London daily, and the local Chamber of Commerce has, through its chairman at the annual meeting on June 14, voiced its astonishment that this particular claim, just as it is, should be considered as deserving preferential treatment over that of many smaller, less articulate enterprises, whose losses have been equally crippling, if not more so. It certainly has a dispiriting effect upon the local merchant, whose future appears so very troubled, to see that his chances of rehabilitating his financial position by means of reparation payments are fading into nothingness; and the chairman of the Chamber of Commerce points to the imminent liquidation of two British companies in Constantinople as a lamentable consequence of the shelving of this claims question.

However, there are some grounds for restrained optimism. The breakdown of the artificial barrier between Constantinople and Anatolia is already having a good effect upon local trade, and the imports from Great Britain to Turkey during the past nine months have exceeded expectations. Given a reasonable solution of the political situation and a certain degree of stability, many people who are looking very anxiously to the future may weather the storm.

ADMINISTRATION OF BULGARIAN PROPERTY.

Declaration of Second Dividend.

The Administrator of Bulgarian property gives notice that he intends to declare the second dividend of 4s. in the pound in the above administration. Payment of this dividend will be made in accordance with the rules made by the Administrator with the approval of the President of the Board of Trade under Section 1 (iv.) of the Treaty of Peace (Bulgaria) Orders, 1920-23. All creditors who lodged their proofs of claim with the Administrator not later than May 31, and who by the Treaty of Peace (Bulgaria) Order, 1920, or any amending Order, and subject to the conditions thereof, are entitled to the benefit of the charge thereby created, will be entitled to participate in the said dividend under the conditions contained in the above-mentioned rules. The first distribution of the said dividend will be made on August 31. An individual notice will be sent to each creditor as and when he becomes entitled to participate in this dividend, showing the amount of such dividend to which he is entitled and when and how it is payable.

FOREIGN EXCHANGES.

The exchanges have been rather variable during the past week. German marks have risen sharply to 535,000, while French francs and Belgian francs are fractionally harder. In the Near Eastern exchanges Greek drachmæ have fallen to 155, Roumanian lei have improved to 875, while Bulgarian leva have depreciated to 415.

PALESTINE'S TRADE IN 1922.

The Return of Germany.

If one were to judge solely from the Customs statistics, one would be more or less justified in the assumption that conditions generally in Palestine in 1922 were much the same as in the previous year or, indeed, in 1920, for the figures for these years set side by side reveal no marked differences. The exports in each case are near £E5,600,000, while the imports are round about £E1,350,000. This apparent stability of trade need occasion no surprise in the case of Palestine, and, indeed, is only to be expected in view of the fact that the country is only on the threshold of its development. At present Palestine's trade is limited by the restricted character of its production, which severely circumscribes the range of exports, and thus limits the purchasing power of the country. But when the projected works of development have been carried out, the position will be very different, and the Palestine market should rapidly grow in importance.

The value of the import trade in 1922 was £E5,581,132, while that of the exports was £E1,353,368, there being thus again a heavy adverse trade balance. Features of special interest in regard to the imports are the heavy decline in cotton goods and the increase of imports of cement from 15,782 tons to 31,876 tons. The explanation as regards the former is, of course, that the imports in 1921 were much larger than the market required, while the development of the trade in cement illustrates the growing activity in building in Palestine. In this connection it may be pointed out that 2,937 permits for building were issued during the year. As regards exports, there was a marked rise in the trade in oranges, the exports of which totalled 1,238,899 cases, as compared with 983,392 cases in 1921. There was also a substantial development in regard to the export of wine, which amounted to 2,704,651 litres, as against 1,947,975. The other exports included 3,077 tons of soap, 7,133 tons of barley, 5,788 tons of wheat, and 4,182 tons of maize.

Great Britain was again first in the import trade with imports of the value of £E1,550,502, representing 28 per cent. of the total trade. This percentage was below that of 1921, which was 32 per cent., but was the same as for 1920. While the figures for British trade are not on the whole unfavourable, it would be idle to pretend that they are altogether satisfactory. To have barely more than one quarter of the trade of a country with which we are so closely associated, and which requires the very goods we are in a position to supply, suggests very plainly a lack of enterprise on the part of British traders. The opportunity is undoubtedly there; but so far it has been inadequately utilised. The chief rival in the Palestine market is now Germany, whose efforts to regain her footing in that field have met with such success that in 1922 the value of her imports was £E661,516, or 12 per cent. of the total, as compared with 5 per cent. in the previous year. It would be futile to underestimate this competition. It is there, and, beyond question, will be felt in the immediate future to a much greater extent; and what is happening in the Palestine market is simply an indication of the outlook in the Near East. Germany's maxim is "back to 1914," and the realisation of that ideal would mean the relegation of the British trader to a back seat. The danger can only be met in Palestine and elsewhere by a display of real and concerted enterprise by British traders. There must be no half-hearted policy in entering the markets or in catering for local requirements. The thing must be done with thoroughness, and thus, and thus only, will British trade keep its place.

THE TURKISH OPTICAL GOODS MARKET

The chief optical articles imported into Turkey are spectacles (either assembled or the glasses and frames imported separately), lenses, and similar articles (says the American Assistant Trade Commissioner at Constantinople, Mr. H. B. Barton, in a recent report). There is very little demand for such instruments as field glasses, telescopes, microscopes, etc. The Constantinople trade in spectacles and similar articles may be sub-divided into two classes—the wholesale trade, which specialises almost exclusively in very cheap and low quality goods that go to supply a large part of the provincial demand and the demand of the poorer classes generally; and the retail trade of Constantinople, which deals in the better-quality articles. Optical goods are handled in general by large department stores, jewellers, and similar shops, very few firms specialising exclusively in them.

Since the Armistice Germany, which formerly led in the optical trade with Turkey, has found it increasingly difficult to compete successfully with France, and occasional orders have even been placed with American and Italian firms. Despite the depreciation in the mark and consequent increase in prices, however, German goods in large quantities have been imported, and the stocks on hand at the present time far exceed immediate requirements. Local merchants are of the opinion that to continue business with German firms under present conditions will be very difficult, and they may have to buy in the future from other countries. Indications are that France will be the next country to control the major part of the Turkish market for optical goods, inasmuch as several French firms, which have had considerable experience in trading in this market, and are well acquainted with local business methods, will probably make great efforts to win the trade lost by the Germans.

Spectacles, if of cheap quality, with nickelled steel rims, completely assembled, are required by the Turkish market. Pince-nez in this cheap quality are not in demand. The present price is about 180 piastres per dozen. Another item required to a limited extent in this market and for Asia Minor is magnifying glasses, made of cheap-quality lenses with nickelled steel or brass frames. Medium and better quality spectacles, pince-nez, and lorgnettes are imported chiefly for sale in Constantinople, although there has been an increasing demand for the better quality of goods in the provinces since the Armistice. While imitation tortoise-shell rims, made of celluloid, horn, or similar material, introduced by German firms during the war, are still in demand, there seems to be a tendency to revert to nickelled and silver rims.

The medium-quality spectacles and pince-nez are ordered in a variety of shapes and numbers, and form the most important part of the trade of local opticians. It should be noted that there are very few importers or dealers in Constantinople who have equipment for grinding and adjusting lenses, and therefore practically no unground or semi-finished lenses are imported. Consequently, a large variety of numbers and shapes are always kept in stock by dealers, and where special measurements are required the prescription has to be sent abroad to be made to order. Goggles of all kinds and coloured spectacles are imported in small quantities from Germany and France. The demand for this class of goods is gradually increasing. Under normal conditions the trade in field glasses and similar articles is limited in volume, and although it acquired a certain degree of importance during the war, the demand has been met and present stocks will be quite sufficient for a considerable time to come. Owing to the present uncertain economic situation, business is stagnant. The demand is light in all optical lines, excepting spectacles.

The Greek Government has ordered the Bourse at Athens to be closed for one month in order to facilitate settlements rendered necessary by the enormous slump in all kinds of shares, says a Renter message.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Inquiry on Fair Scale.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended June 20:—

A very fair inquiry has again been witnessed in this department, and the estimated sales show a substantial improvement on last week's figures, whilst our own futures market, after considerable fluctuations, has returned to practically last week's level. The American market has shown a distinct downward tendency, and our spot prices have reacted in sympathy with it. The spot inquiry here is at present very largely affected by the course of American Futures, and any setback in that market at once brings in inquiries for Upper Egyptian which, being hedged there, becomes automatically cheaper as compared with American spots. When American Futures rise, Upper Egyptian begins to lose its attractiveness, and the inquiry veers round at once to Sakellaridis, which, at the present time, certainly seems remarkably cheap.

The only class of Sakellaridis in which there appears to be any actual shortage is the Fair to Fully Fair variety, but the Good Fair market is also gradually getting swept, and it is worthy of note that there are now only 20 points between the official quotations of Good Fair (15.95) and Fully Good Fair (16.15) Sakellaridis. These quotations are, if anything, on the high side. There has been rather more business doing in the better grades again this week, the price 18.50d. being paid almost every day, and on one occasion a buyer was found for Extra Fine cotton at 20.50d. per lb. In Uppers, quite a brisk business has been done. As mentioned above, most of this cotton is hedged on the American market, and the tendency towards a hardening of the basis is unmistakable. On more than one day this week there was quite a rush for this cotton, and there is no doubt that stocks are low. Fully Good Fair Uppers changed hands here to-day at 16.50d. per lb.

The usual inquiry for low cotton has been maintained, but interest in other growths, such as Sudan, Brown, and White cotton has fallen off temporarily. C.i.f. business is stagnant, and quotations received from Egypt (especially for Uppers) are prohibitive. Forwardings to spinners for week ending June 13 have been returned at 6,370 bales. Total sales, 6,300 bales (including 150 Sudan). Quotations of Sakellaridis, Fair to Good Fair, are reduced 25 points; Fully Good Fair to Good 35 points, Fine to Extra Fine 45 points. In Brown and Upper, Good and above are raised 15 points; Fully Good Fair and below 35 points. Fully Good Fair Sakel to-day 16.15d.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Moderate Demand from Abroad.

The Commercial Company of Egypt, in their report for the week ended June 15, state:—Since our last report, the futures market has been very dull for Sakellaridis, but rather firm for Uppers. The feature of the week has been the levelling of the prices of Sakellaridis and Ashmouni contracts in our market, and that of Sakellaridis and American contracts in that of Liverpool. We do not think there has been a precedent to this. The position is, indeed, absurd, but as long as spinners maintain their preference for short staple cotton at the cheapest possible price, there is little hope for a change in the present situation. Old purchases of Sakellaridis against sales of Ashmouni for speculative accounts have been closed at heavy losses and to this cause must be attributed to a great extent the firmness of June Ashmouni. No other alternative was left to the operators of this sort of straddles, purchases of Ashmouni on the spot market with the object of tendering being almost impossible in view of the very restricted supply of this variety and the fact that what cotton remains is in the hands of persons unwilling at present to sell. It is worth noting that August and October Ashmouni are now quoted respectively at $0.85 and $1.95 below June. The demand from abroad has been rather moderate, despite the extreme cheapness of Sakellaridis compared to any other variety Egyptian and other; spinners have remained apathetic. The Egyptian market in Liverpool has followed the fluctuations of Alexandria; it continues to be the cheaper of the two, stocks lying there being still maintained at fairly high figures. This week's receipts amount to 2,804 krs. and the exports to 80,070 krs., the stock standing now at 1,414,620 krs. against 1,491,886 krs. a week ago and 1,925,655 krs. a year ago.

Spot.—The Minet-el-Bassal market has been fairly active this week, and sales amount to about 5,600 B/s, of which we estimate 3,600 B/s Sakellaridis, 1,900 B/s Uppers, and 100 B/s Brown and White. Exports are considerable, and, with very small arrivals, the stock shows a marked decrease. Cotton of all growths in grades below Fully Good Fair is now extremely scarce, and Fair and Fully Fair Uppers and Brown are to-day quoted dearer than corresponding grades of Sakellaridis, a very unusual position. The drop in Sakellaridis contracts has caused many holders to withdraw their cotton from the market.

Sakellaridis.—All styles have been traded in, the low medium qualities predominating, at about last week's rates, with the exception of Fair, which is appreciably dearer. Holders in many cases refused to sell, especially in the medium and lower grades, in view of the fact that these styles are quoted lower than the same grades of Uppers.

Uppers.—All styles have been dealt in, but the market remains very narrow and is really artificial, due to manipulation. Prices of spot against contracts are slightly dearer than last week. Low grades are almost cleaned out.

Brown.—A retail business has been done, supplies being very small, at about last week's prices.

White.—A small business has been done at hardening rates.

Crop, 1923.—News received from the Interior on the new crop is in general good, and the plant is progressing normally. So far no complaints of shortage of water have been heard.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Depression Less Acute.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended June 23 states:—

There is little change to report in the conditions mentioned last week, although, if anything, the depression is perhaps a little less acute. The main hindrance to better trade is still a lack of confidence in present prices and the uncertainties regarding raw cotton values.

Yarn.—It is significant of the state of affairs in this market that, although production has been cut down by one-half during the past four months, no appreciable benefit has resulted therefrom, and the Master Cotton Spinners' Federation are considering new expedients with a view to giving some relief. The Continent has bought small lots during the past week, and orders for "extra hards" are again reported in moderate quantities for the Near East. The better business in Bolton yarns spun from Egyptian cotton continues, though in this section there is also much to be desired.

Cloth.—Although India has been in the market, and has placed orders for fairly large quantities of cloth, the prices are said to be very disappointing. The monsoon, on which the prosperity of India greatly depends, is reported to fall short of expectations up to the present, and much heavier rains are hoped for. China has operated on a modest scale, but here again the price difficulty has been a constant bar to transactions. The Near East picks up stock lots, though there is no disposition shown to rise readily to the higher level of prices which manufacturers are obliged to quote for fresh goods following the advance in raw cotton. South America and miscellaneous overseas markets remain very dull, and with the continuance of bad weather in this country the home trade is practically lifeless.

Raw Cotton.—The constant fluctuations reported last week continue, with the result that actual consumers still purchase strictly according to their minimum requirements. Reports from America concerning the growing crop show some improvement, and the news from Egypt in this respect is fairly favourable. A general topic of conversation has been the registration of a new company called the Manchester Raw Cotton Company, Ltd., with a capital of £1,000,000, the object being to establish a definite "spot" cotton market in Manchester in competition with Liverpool. Closing prices are as follows:—American Fully Middling, 16.72; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 16.35.

CONDITION OF EGYPTIAN CROPS.

The bulletin of the Egyptian Ministry of Agriculture gives the following particulars of crop conditions in May:—

Cotton.—The water supply was sufficient, but the weather was unsettled during the first fortnight of the month, becoming more favourable during the second. The damage caused by abnormally heavy rains and hail was confined to isolated areas in Lower Egypt and Giza. Owing to repeated resowings on account of unfavourable weather, the crop is irregular and later than usual. The resowings continued in certain districts till the first days of the month. Local attacks of soreshin, cut-worm, aphid, mole-cricket, and wilt were reported from some districts in Lower Egypt and Girga Province.

Millet (Sefi).—Sowing was almost completed during the month of May, and hoeing, thinning, and watering were carried out. The weather was favourable and water supply sufficient.

Rice (Sefi).—Sowing has commenced under favourable conditions.

Sugar-cane.—The weather was generally favourable and water supply sufficient. Fassing, manuring, and watering were in progress, and the general state of the crop is satisfactory.

Wheat.—Except for the rains and storm, which caused a certain amount of damage to the crop in some provinces of Lower Egypt and Giza, the weather was generally favourable to harvesting, which is general. Slight attacks of rust, smut, and eel-worm were reported nearly everywhere, and the bacterial disease (Pseudomonas tritici) was also reported in Lower Egypt. The general state of the crop is satisfactory, and the yield is expected to be slightly above the average.

Barley.—Atmospheric conditions as for wheat. Harvesting was in full swing during May, and threshing and winnowing were progressing. The yield is expected to be normal.

Beans.—Harvesting was completed. Rains and storm caused great damage to the crop in Teh el Baroud District. The yield is below the average.

Onions.—The general state of the crop is satisfactory. Harvesting is progressing in Assiut and Middle Egypt, and has just started in early sown fields in Minufia. Rains and storm slightly affected the crop. The yield is expected to be below the average.

Helba.—Harvesting is complete, and the yield is below the average.

Bersim.—The last cutting is progressing everywhere. Practically no enemies were reported. The general state of the crop is satisfactory. The yield is expected to be slightly below the average.

CATTLE DISEASE IN IRAK.

The report of the Civil Veterinary Department of Irak for March states that an outbreak of rinderpest was reported from Ghummas Shuba, District Shamiya. The localities affected were villages of Khurram, Judedadh-albu-Tabeeh and Ashirar-albu-Hijar; 538 head of cattle were protected with anti-rinderpest serum and 18 treated for the disease; 150 animals died before inoculation. Intimation was received that the disease had broken out at Chempasha, District Dohuk. The Civil Veterinary Officer, Mosul, in the course of his investigation discovered that the disease had been in existence for a month, causing 120 casualties, of which 113 were cows and seven buffaloes. Surrounding places of Chempasha were visited and found free.

The Mutasarrif, Karbala Liwa, reported that an outbreak of a very fatal disease had broken out among sheep and goats of the Eastern tribes, along the desert of Karbala, Shifayna, Khan-el-Hamad, and Khan-el-Amij. The Civil Veterinary Officer, Hilla, was ordered to visit the affected areas, but on his arrival it was found that the tribesmen had already moved off with their flocks to unknown destinations. Evidence was forthcoming that the deaths were due to anthrax. Estimated number of casualties is placed at four hundred. The Mutasarrif, Karbala Liwa, took energetic measures to check the spread of the disease. All the officials of his Liwa as well as the authorities of the neighbouring Liwa were notified of the existing danger.

At Nassiysf, District Sharaban, Diale Liwa, seven head of buffaloes were reported to have been bitten by a rabid dog. All these animals died showing symptoms of rabies. The police authorities of Mosul carried on an effective campaign against stray dogs. They destroyed 830 dogs by shooting in Mosul alone. It is satisfactory to note that the public have fully realised the danger. Destruction of stray dogs still continues. Six cases of positive rabies occurred in Baghdad.

The following information has been received by the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries from the International Agricultural Institute:—Egypt: This year's wheat crop is forecasted at 21,100,000 cwts., an increase as compared with last season of 1,500,000 cwts.; the barley crop is expected to be about the same at 4,800,000 cwts. Morocco: This season's wheat and barley crops are estimated at 12,500,000 and 13,800,000 cwts. respectively; last year the production of wheat was 6,900,000 cwts. and of barley 11,700,000 cwts.

At the beginning of June the condition of cereal crops was generally good in Yugoslavia.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS

The following extracts are taken from recent reports received by the Imperial Ottoman Bank:—

Aintab, May 30.

There is nothing to add to the report of the previous month. The position of the market remains stationary.

Hamadan, May 26.

As a result of the recent rains, the crops are stated to be exceptionally good. Prices remain, however, at 300 krans for wheat and 230 krans for barley, but the demand is limited to the immediate needs for consumption, and a considerable fall is anticipated. The market for cotton goods is stagnant, there being no buyers.

Nicosia, June 1.

1,000 tons of valonea and 1,500-2,000 tons of carobs have been shipped to England, while 13 tons of wool have been consigned to Marseilles. A marked decline is evidenced in the total of imports in general.

The stagnation of business increases. The commercial crisis renders the conclusion of new business difficult.

Haifa, June 2.

The grain market has not been steady during the past week, and prices ruling previously have not been maintained. This state of things is mainly due to the liquidation of stocks.

OTTOMAN DEBT IMPASSE.

In the House of Commons on June 25, Mr. Aubrey Herbert asked the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether the French Government had refused at Lausanne to accept payment of the Turkish debt in French francs on behalf of the French bondholders; and if he could tell the House the amount of money which was standing in the way of the settlement at Lausanne.

Mr. McNeill replied: It is not a dispute about a sum of money which is standing in the way of a settlement of the debt question at Lausanne. The Turkish Government demand to have it recognised in the Treaty that they may discharge their public debt by tendering depreciated paper francs in the place of the gold francs for which the debt was contracted. This would mean a default on two-thirds of the interest payable to the bondholders of all nations. The Allied Governments have no legal right to sign away the rights of the bondholders by endorsing a Turkish repudiation of their contractual obligations. It has so far been impossible to get the Turkish Government to understand that in view of this legal position their demand is impossible of acceptance by the Allies.

THE RUTENBERG CONCESSIONS.

In the House of Commons on June 25, Mr. Becker asked the Under-Secretary for the Colonies if he was aware of the slow progress being made with the Rutenberg concessions in Palestine; and, in the event of further prolonged delay, would he recommend withdrawing these concessions.

Mr. Ormsby-Gore: The reply to the first part of the question is in the negative. With regard to the second part, I would refer the hon. member to my reply to the similar question put by him on June 18.

Mr. Becker: Arising out of that answer, can the hon. gentleman give us any idea of what progress the concessions are making? If he has no idea we presume they are making no progress.

The Speaker: The hon. member is making a speech.

NATIONAL BANK OF GREECE.

Increase of Bank's Business and Profits.

The ordinary general meeting of the shareholders of the National Bank of Greece was held on April 4 at the head office of the bank, Athens, Greece.

The Governor (M. A. N. Diomède) read, on behalf of the general council of the bank, the report for 1922, the chief points of which are given below:—I have to express to the shareholders my gratitude for the confidence which they have shown by choosing me as Governor of the bank, which has for over eighty years presided over the economic life of the country, and has always laboured with zeal and devotion for the progress of Greece.

The year which has just passed was one full of incidents; the national disasters have left deep traces on the economic life of the country. The entire financial situation of Greece is governed by the currency question. Until recently Greece was one of those few happy countries which had passed through the crisis of the European War without damage to their currency. Our national economy, with a currency almost unaffected by the war, continued its life without the shocks and the instability which are the organic diseases left behind by the war. An end was put to this enviable position by the repeated national misfortunes, and we now have to fight against difficulties which, arising from the depreciation of the currency, upset the financial and social equilibrium of the country. This evil is one of the worst that a country can have to cope with, and its visible and invisible results, extending over a very long series of years, will remind the student of human actions of the trials of the past.

We are convinced that confidence will return with the advent of peace in the East. Peace, by bringing Government and the public back into the regular path, will put a definite end to the creation of a fictitious currency through the increase of circulation, and will make it possible for measures to be taken with a view to assuring a real balance between public revenue and expenditure. This feeling of certainty that the State is not extending its expenditure beyond the limits of its power will become one of the chief sources of confidence. Those hidden reserves, which now remain barren, will then see the light, and the current will recommence to flow in from abroad. This capital in the hands of Greeks at home and abroad being thus cast into circulation in the market will revivify the country with unimpaired elements of wealth, and will gradually bring back that equilibrium from the lack of which our economic life is now suffering.

A favourable sign on the economic horizon of Greece is the condition presented to-day by her public debt and the survey which, as a result, opens before us.

The same strength with which the country is endowed enabled the Government to have recourse to the home market, either directly or indirectly, through the National Bank since 1917 in order to obtain real funds with which to cover part, at any rate, of its needs.

The funds thus derived amount from 1917 to date to 1,455 millions. Adding to this date the net yield of the forced loan, to which, of course, the above favourable observations do not apply, and which amounts to between 1,200 millions and 1,250 millions, we have a total of native capital placed by the public at the disposal of the Government of between 2,650 million and 2,700 million drachmæ. This is an exceptional example of economic robustness and a clear proof that there exists in the country flourishing elements of wealth which can be more widely developed, and which allow one to hope that we may in time succeed without difficulty in paying off these debts to ourselves.

On the other hand, the increase of the debt, the service of which is in foreign currency, observable since 1914, does not exceed 420 millions of gold francs, which brings the total of our foreign public debt up to 1,700,000,000 nominal value. A closer examination and analysis of the interest and sinking fund account of these loans in gold shows that we pay annually for the service of both those subject to the International Financial Commission and those not so subject a round sum of £2,250,000—£2,300,000. This annual burden can, neither in itself nor on comparing Greece with other countries of the same size, be considered disproportionate to the wealth produced in the country or flowing into it from abroad. What really reduces the influence of this foreign debt in gold is the fact that a considerable portion of it either does not practically leave the country, or else returns to it, as it belongs to Greeks who spend it in the country.

The perfect and regular service of our foreign debt is absolutely secured, thanks to the abundant yield of the pledged revenues, which reached during the past year the sum of Drs. 462,541,543, as compared with a total encashment in 1921 of Drs. 259,929,905—in other words, showing an increase of over 200,000,000, and leaving free a wide margin. This abundant yield is due to the well-developed power of consumption of the country, as is shown by the progressive increase in the consumption of those articles which were affected by the respective taxes.

The yield, which is expected with confidence to be nearly three times as great during the current year, and which it is anticipated will exceed Drs. 1,200,000,000 owing to adjustment of the taxation to the fallen value of the drachma—an adjustment which, according to the results so far known, has in no way affected the amount of consumption—in an indisputable manner guarantees that our foreign loans will be served with ease in future, and that there will be a wide margin of surplus, notwithstanding the rise in the rates of foreign exchange. The impression made by the fact that every care is taken to assure the service of our foreign debt by the widening of the basis on which that service stands, is reflected in the ascending scale presented for some time past by the price of Greek securities on the London market.

Fortunately, after its rapid fall, Greek credit, under the powerful influence of events, began once more to recover. To-day, on observing the gradual but continuous recovery in Greek securities for four months past—from £.20 they have now reached a point between £.40 and £.45—that is to say, they have more than doubled in price within a relatively short period—we are entitled to believe that our credit is regaining its lost ground, and is putting forth fresh roots in the esteem of international economists.

Notwithstanding the whole-hearted assistance rendered by the National Bank to the Government during the past year also, the regular business of the bank shows a most important increase. This fact constitutes remarkable evidence as to the extent of the business movement in the country and of the intensity of production in all directions. Capital was not lacking, and it showed greater boldness, turning its attention to various kinds of business which the conditions of the currency rendered both profitable and safe for individuals, and, while the rich reserves in exchange in the hands of private persons made their appearance with hesitation and caution, if it was a case of their being only converted into investments in drachmæ, we find them willingly employed in immediately productive business, whether connected with real estate or with trade or local industry.

The profits of the National Bank for disposal during the year 1922, as appears from the analysis of its whole business, were exceptionally satisfactory. Of course, a portion of these profits arises from the profits undisposed of in previous years.

The gross profits amount to Drs. 279,595,250, and after deduction of the expenses of administration, interest paid, and amounts written off, there remains a net profit of Drs. 187,466,654, which is higher than that of 1921 by Drs. 72,000,000, and exceeds the profit realised in any previous year.

This net increase in profits enabled the administration of the bank to propose a dividend considerably higher than in any previous year, and thus to adapt the dividend to the current price of the shares. The ascending scale of dividends distributed, which from Drs. 225 in 1915 reached Drs. 250 in 1916, Drs. 265 in 1917, Drs. 300 in 1918, Drs. 320 in 1919, Drs. 420 in 1920, Drs. 550 in 1921, and Drs. 800 in 1922, is a practical proof of the increasing participation of the shareholder in the profits realised in this especially fruitful period.

The administration considered it, however, to be necessary, according to the policy instituted some years ago, to make strong additions to the reserves out of the profits which have accumulated out of the extraordinary business and exceptional circumstances of the last few years.

It will be readily understood what a great advantage is derived by the shareholders from this policy, as well as by the bank itself and the whole public. The interests of all classes in the country coincide in this, that the National Bank, as the central issuing bank of the country, shall possess in itself such strength that it may be in a position to withstand any unforeseen attack. And the bank can confidently look forward to being in such a position, because it has taken care, without deviating from its policy in years of abundant harvest, to strengthen itself and to raise a bulwark against any unforeseen circumstances.

Following this policy, it assigned in the past year 45.4 per cent. of its net profits, or Drs. 85,000,000 to increasing its reserves, which thus amounted on December 31, 1922, to Drs. 220,000,000. Besides this, it was considered absolutely necessary to maintain various headings under assets in a strong position in order that they being in themselves strong may add to the bank's strength in general.

I believe that the present year will open a new chapter in the life of Greece. After the disasters which have overwhelmed her, the clearest proof that our indomitable will is to march forward will be devotion to work. And I believe that the Greek people, which is prudent, laborious, saving, will cast itself into the work of peace with zeal and courage, and that it will thus lay those wider foundations which are necessary for the economic prosperity of the country in the future.

The report was unanimously adopted.

COMPANY NOTES AND REPORTS.

Mortgage Company of Egypt.

The report of the Mortgage Company of Egypt, Ltd., for the year ended March 31 states that, after providing for interest on the 4½ per cent. first charge debentures and on temporary loans, and applying a sum of £1,500 in writing down the value of the freehold premises of the company in Cairo, the accounts show a net profit for the year of £122,796 9s. 10d. Deducting the amount of the dividend paid and accrued on the 5 per cent. preferred shares to March 31, viz., £50,000, there remains a balance of £72,796 9s. 10d. After providing for the following charges:

—(1) Amount of compensation paid to directors who retired, in accordance with the resolution passed at the general meeting held on June 22, 1922, £6,000; (2) Amount required to complete the sum payable for excess profits duty and income-tax for the three years 1919-20, 1920-21, and 1921-22, £2,691 8s. 4d.—£8,691 8s. 4d., the balance available is £64,105 1s. 6d. To this must be added the amount brought forward from last year's account, £44,603 19s. 10d., making a total sum of £108,709 1s. 4d., which the directors propose to allocate as follows:—(1) To payment of a dividend of 12 per cent. (being 3s. per share) on the amount paid up on the ordinary shares, £30,000; (2) To special reserve (thus bringing it up to £85,000), £34,726 9s. 11d.—£64,726 9s. 11d., leaving a balance to be carried forward to the next account of £43,982 11s. 5d. The substantial increase in the quantity of cotton produced and sold during the past year, as compared with the two preceding years, coupled with the prices that were obtained, has enabled the majority of the company's borrowers to meet their engagements more easily and more promptly than a year ago. There is, however, a small increase in the amount of instalments in arrear, but, with the existing reserves, it is considered that any doubtful cases are amply provided for. Demands for loans of a good type were on a very restricted scale, and the total investments under this head show a reduction of £120,000 for the past year. Up to March 31, 1923, the company had purchased £741,460 of its 4½ per cent. debentures, the whole of which have been cancelled.

East Indian Railway.

The East Indian Railway Company recommends a dividend of 11s. 4d. per cent. on the deferred annuity capital, and the deferred annuity capital class "D," in addition to the guaranteed interest of £2 per cent. for the half-year ending July 31, and 4s. 2d. per cent. compensation paid by the Secretary of State for India on account of income-tax, making a total return for the year of £5 15s. 6d. per cent. Meeting, July 25.

Egyptian Hotels.

The report of the Egyptian Hotels, Limited, for the year ended April 30, 1923, states that after charging all expenses in connection with the working of the hotels the profits of the hotels were £47,347 0s. 1d., as compared with £52,852 12s. for 1922. After providing for the charges payable in London and Cairo, including taxation, the accounts show a profit of £45,187 7s. 2d. The balance of undivided profit brought forward from last account is £9,963 14s. 2d.—£55,144 1s. 4d. From this has to be deducted depreciation of plant, fixtures, and fitting at hotels, £3,810 17s., leaving an available balance of £51,333 4s. 4d. The directors recommend: (1) The payment of a dividend of 5 per cent. per annum on the preference shares for the year to April 30, 1923, absorbing £5,750; (2) the payment of a dividend on the ordinary shares of 30 per cent. for the year, which will absorb £37,500—£43,250, leaving a balance to be carried forward of £8,083 4s. 4d.

The Société des Grands Hôtels d'Égypte have recently acquired a large block of the ordinary shares in the company. It is now proposed that the business and undertaking of the Egyptian Hotels, Ltd., be sold to the Société des Grands Hôtels. The terms proposed are:—Ordinary shareholders in Egyptian Hotels, Ltd., will receive one ordinary share of £4 fully paid in the Société des Grands Hôtels for every three shares of £1 each fully paid held by them in Egyptian Hotels, Ltd. Preference shareholders in Egyptian Hotels, Ltd., will have the right to have allotted to them 5 per cent. debentures of the Société des Grands Hôtels (redeemable by means of a sinking fund) to the nominal value of £10 for each preference share of £10 fully paid held by them in Egyptian Hotels, Ltd. Preference shareholders are to have as an alternative the right to be paid the face value of their shares in cash in lieu of taking debentures in the Société des Grands Hôtels d'Égypte. The directors are of opinion that the scheme is a favourable one for the shareholders of the company, and a provisional agreement giving effect to the above proposals has been drawn up. This agreement requires to be sanctioned by the court and confirmed by the shareholders. If the sanction of the court is obtained, extraordinary general meetings will be summoned to obtain the shareholders' confirmation of the agreement, and in due course resolutions for the liquidation of the company will be submitted. Meeting, company's offices, 11, Remonger Lane, London, E.C., June 29, 11.30 a.m.

Egyptian Agricultural.

The report for the year to March 31, 1923, states that there has been little or no demand during the past year for agricultural land, and no offers for the Dekerness estate have been received which agents in Egypt have considered it worth while to transmit to the board. Further sales of "assets in suspense" have been made at prices which, on the whole, are considered satisfactory. Owing to the abnormally low Nile, the cultivation of rice was not permitted on the Dekerness estate last year. The limited area devoted to cotton gave a satisfactory yield, in spite of the shortage of water. As no rice could be sown, the opportunity was taken to steam-plough a large area of fallow land, with great benefit to it.

Egyptian and Foreign Trust.

The accounts for 1922 show a loss of £2,551, reduced by the recovery of income-tax to £293. The market value of investments at December 31, 1922, compared with that at December 31, 1921, shows an improvement of £42,851. Meeting, Winchester House, July 12, 11 a.m.

Aboukir Company.

The report of the Aboukir Company for 1922 states that the cotton crop was the worst on record, due chiefly to bad drainage. Unfavourable climatic conditions and insect pests also contributed to ruin the crop, which in the earlier months had given good promise. The price obtained was £6 15s. 2d. per kantar, as against £7 8s. 9d. The result of such a poor crop and the general depression is that there have been no sales of land. Estates account shows receipts from purchasers were less than in 1921, amounting to £12,310, of which £7,834 has been credited to profit and loss account, as against £23,392 the previous year. The amount realised of the rental of £25,829 for the year is £14,274, which has been carried to the profit and loss account. The area let shows a decrease of 187 feddans, and of rental £2,787, owing chiefly to deterioration in the drainage and insufficient summer water. The profit and loss account shows the balance brought forward was £10,022 and the loss for the year £1,463, leaving to be carried forward £8,559. Meeting, Palmerston House, E.C., July 2, noon.

British Burmah Petroleum.

The directors of the British Burmah Petroleum Company have declared an interim dividend at the rate of 6½ per cent. per annum, free of tax, payable July 16, to shareholders registered July 2. The directors state that the profits for the six months to January 31 last compare favourably with those of the corresponding period of last year, but the strike on the part of the Burmese drilling and production staffs is so seriously interfering with field operations that the profits for the current half-year are likely to show a considerable reduction.

NEW COMPANY.

Anglo-Greek Financial Company.

The Anglo-Greek Financial Co., Ltd., has been registered as a private company with a nominal capital of £120,000 in £5 shares, to carry on the business of banking in all its branches, etc. The first directors are D. Loverdos, S. Loverdos, and P. Economou. The secretary is T. J. Psimcuos. The registered office is at 101, Leadenhall Street, E.C.

Shipping Intelligence.

SYRIA'S SHIPPING FACILITIES.

Syria is well provided with shipping facilities, perhaps more than the existing state of trade justifies (says H.M. Consul-General at Beyrout in his report for 1922). Some lines, at any rate, must run more as an advertisement than as commercial undertakings. Regular services are maintained with Constantinople and Turkish ports, Egypt via Palestine and Europe.

The unloading of vessels at Beyrout has still to be carried out by lighters, which, while far from satisfactory, is the only possible arrangement under existing circumstances. It is, therefore, satisfactory to record that measures have been taken during the year intended to diminish the possibility of pilferage, which in the past has been a source of annoyance to all concerned. At the beginning of the year, a small harbour at Alexandretta built by a French company, the "Société Française d'Entreprises," was opened to trade, and the Custom House was moved to premises adjoining it, a move which is unpopular. This may be considered as a mere basin of the large port which is, it is said, one day to be constructed. No steamers, even of the smallest tonnage, can enter this harbour, which acts as a shelter rather than anything else, and the landing of goods continues to be effected into lighters outside the harbour. The tariff which is applied to both imported and exported goods is 6 francs per ton, but as this charge would probably have resulted in goods destined to Aleppo being landed at Tripoli instead of Alexandretta, the shipping agents have decided to reduce their landing charges by 6 francs a ton. There is also a charge of 3 piastres Syrian for every passenger.

NEW BRITISH INDIA STEAMER.

The launch took place at Hebburn on June 14, by Messrs. R. and W. Hawthorn, Leslie, and Co., Ltd., of the single screw-steamer Talma, which they are building to the order of the British India Steam Navigation Co., Ltd. The overall length of the vessel is 467 ft., breadth 59½ ft., and depth 40 ft. The vessel is being built to Lloyd's 100 A.1 class, and is constructed with straight stem and cruiser stern, with poop, bridge and forecastle decks, and promenade and boat decks above bridge decks. The 5-ton derricks are fitted on derrick posts, ten steam winches are provided for the rapid handling of cargo, and a 25-ton derrick is fitted at the foremast for dealing with special cargo.

Spacious accommodation will be provided for first and second class passengers, and, in addition, arrangements have been made for berthing a large number of Chinese passengers in the upper and second 'tween decks. The first-class passengers will be accommodated on the promenade and bridge decks, with dining saloon at the fore end of the bridge deck, and music-room on the promenade deck above the dining saloon. Both rooms will be tastefully decorated. The first-class smoke-room on the promenade deck will be panelled in oak and fitted up in the Jacobean style. The second-class passengers will be accommodated on the after end of the promenade deck, and on and under the bridge deck. The dining saloon is at the after end of the bridge deck, and the second class entrance hall and lounge on the promenade deck.

The vessel's propelling machinery consists of single-screw inverted direct-acting quadruple expansion engines, the cylinders of which are 29, 41½, 59, 85 by 54 in. stroke. The engines are designed throughout in accordance with the most up-to-date practice for reciprocating engines.

The ordinary general meeting of the Egyptian and Foreign Trust, Ltd., will be held on July 12.
